He has been an explorer among conductors, playing much new music and discovering things which had been allowed to gather dust on back shelves. He has been a champion of Mahler and Bruckner. Indeed, Claude Rostand in the Figaro Litteraire, declared, when Bernstein brought some rare (to Paris) Mahler that he was a "Porte-Mahler," a jeu de mots, if I do not offend by explaining, uttered with benign intention and not the unkind connotation which might obtain by 'porte-malheur.'

So Berkshire welcomes the return of the native. For a week the students of the Center and, we suspect, some of the faculty, will share the boons of his presence, his experience, his comprehension, his perspicacity and his visions of the future. On Sunday, July 5th, he will make his sole appearance of the summer as conductor, playing the Mahler "Resurrection" symphony, a massive, draining work, but one admirably suited to the unlimited nobility of his attributes. Anything less demanding would be anticlimactic.

To a man who has climbed the loftiest peaks of several musical continents, is his return to the scene of his initial triumphs just an engagement in a busy schedule or will there be a special poignancy to the event for him? There would be little point in attempting to predict his reaction but what does seem certain is the temper of the audience which will welcome him. Ovations are no longer novelties to Bernstein but we wonder if any have included the quality of affection in which his original Berkshire friends hold him.

Exuberance and white clothes are trademarks of Bernstein's rehearsals at Tanglewood.

Bernstein, at a Tanglewood party in the early '40s, when he was a protegé of Serge Koussevitzky

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 1 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein gains

Tangl te ... to ex

By Louis Snyder
Staff writer of The Christian Science

Near the end of the Boston Len ... Orchestra's (BSO) first open rehe ... summer at Tanglewood, a h ... Leonard Bernstein had clari ... points with the orchestra, and ... baton to begin the last mvt, ... Mahler's Second.

From the back of the ho ... Berkshire Festival Shed came ... sistent, not-to-be-assuaged cr ... Mr. Bernstein lowered his ar ... head, and hunched his sho ...

ity emphasized

The wailing continued the theme of Mr. King's campaign is ... conductor executed a thr ... of poor blacks and whites. He says ... toward the audience, and in ly have many needs and grievances in ... had been heard all morninmon. Like other moderates and liberals, ... "A-U-S-S!" to the rear holds that for too long Southern politi- ... The strident protests fac ns have nurtured and exploited the ... the green lawns, and the judices of low-income whites.

Let it not be thought n the platform with other candidates, Mr. ... indicates Mr. Bernstein' g is the epitome of decorum and pa- ... titude toward the place ce. He ignores in dignified silence the ... at Tanglewood. Far fro ial slurs of extremist candidate J. B. ... before, Mr. Bernstein, ner. ... Berkshire Festival here When candidate King takes the podium, ... ful words for young pro preaches goodwill and the unity of blacks ... come here to work a d whites. But in such phrases as: "The ... at the Berkshire Mu itimate requirements of the vast ma- ... himself had been a ity of Georgians are sacrificed to ex- ... in its first season, under Serge ... ky. (The galaxy of noted musicians who ... also benefited from early training at the ... center is legendary.)

The Albany attorney first gained promi- ... nce in 1962, when he represented voting- ... ghts demonstrators in that southwest ... eorgia city in 1962. In 1964 he unsuccessful- ... ran for Congress. Since then he has ... presented blacks in a number of civil- ... ghts cases that have drawn statewide at- ... tion.

The (black) Georgia Voters League, a ... sponsored by the Southern Christian ... adership Conference, drafted him as its ... ernatorial candidate last November. ... Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, SCLC presi- ... has endorsed Mr. King's candidacy. ... State Rep. Julian Bond (D) of Atlanta is ... ping the King campaign, mostly through ... appearances seeking much- ... ded campaign funds.

Power st

His popu ... Force Lt. ... is also a ... dispute wit ... black milit ...

Mr. Davi ... power stru ... cope with ...

It probabl ... with his fel ... concerned a ... spected Mr. ...

There is e ... Democrats n ... candidate aga ... election next ... tioned as a p ... unlikely he w ...

Almos ... riding a ... mayor o ... Negro n ... He bec ... by racia ... Novembe ... year terr ... he had w ... 1967.

Today, ... point of h ...

Spe ...

122

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 25 1970 New England

Tanglewood Awards

Students Capture $3,900 in Prizes

Some 21 students were honored Saturday when they were announced the winners of $3,900 in prizes presented annually at Tanglewood to outstanding students of the Berkshire Music Center.

21 Winners

This year's winners were Mesru Mehmedov, $300 Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Award for a conductor; Maria Kyprie, $100 Gregor Piatorsky Prize to a cellist; Soparno Linda Phillips, $100 High Fidelity Magazine award; Virginia Blakeman, $100 Benjamin H. Delson Memorial Prize for violist; Chinary Ung, $300 Margaret Grant Memorial Composition; Tibor Pusztai and Kurt Carpenter, $250 Koussevitzky Tanglewood Composition Prizes; Robert Routch, $100 Henry B. Cabot Award for french horn; Eugene Drucker, $300 Albert Spalding Prize for Instrumentalist; clarinetist David Stern, Sam Levenson Prize; Sharon Wood, $100 Joseph Silverstein Award for violinist.

Winners of the C. D. Jackson awards for $250 were violinist Stephen Wilkes, flutist Robert Stallman, contrabass Richard Fletcher, pianists Yasuo Watanabe and Kenneth Ziegenfuss, and trumpeter John Taber.

Winners of the same award for $100 were violinist Pascal Tortelier oboeist Frank Charnley, clarinetist Richard Wasley, percussionist Paul Berns, and soprano Joan Heller.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

Tanglewood Gets $75,000 Bequest

LENOX — Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Board of Trustees, announced that a bequest of $75,000 has been received by the orchestra from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield.

Phyllis Curtin Chosen

Mrs. Granrud left the bequest "with the hope that it will be used at one time, or from time to time, for the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer academy, with financial and audience support."

Banks further announced that the trustees recently voted the bequest be used to establish 'The Marian D. Granrud Fund.' The Granrud Fund will bring an artist-in-residence or an instructor to the Berkshire Music Center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

This summer, soprano Phyllis Curtin is the Granrud Artist-in-Residence and will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season.

All participants in the classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs.

Prospective participants in Miss Curtin's master classes may obtain further information by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, 02140.

TRIBUNE NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER
Sunday, August 30, 1970

$75,000 Left To Support Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

The first artist in residence is soprano Phyllis Curtin who is giving master classes 10 hours a week this summer.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210

SEP 3 1970 New England News

Curtin Is First 'Granrud Artist'

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

The first artist in residence is soprano Phyllis Curtin, who will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season this summer.

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324

MAY 12 1970 New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Music Federation Scholarship Info

Applications are now being made for summer music study opportunities offered by the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Among them is one at Kneisel Hall, Blue Hill, a $400 NFMC scholarship matched by the camp, to string students', ages 10 - 22, for eight weeks in July and August. Application should be made before the end of May by writing to Miss Marianne Kneisel, 190 Riverside Drive, New York, N.Y. 10024.

matched by camp for Berkshire matched by cap for Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., for instrumental, choral or opera study for ages 18 to 25 as of March 15. The course is seven weeks in July and August and is called the Ada Holder Miller Scholarship. Information may be obtained by writing Harry Kraut, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Six $150 scholarships are offered in each category for seven weeks study in piano, strings, organ, dance, voice at Chatauqua Music School. Contact is Joseph C. Clarke, director of education, Chautauqua Summer School, Chautauqua, N.Y. 14722.

UTICA PRESS
Friday, October 24, 1969

Scholarship Auditions Tomorrow

The young artists auditions for high school pupils will be conducted at 10 a.m. tomorrow in Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute.

The auditions are for the Young Artist High School scholarship for Tanglewood 1970. Music students from Binghamton, Syracuse, Rochester and the Utica-Rome area will compete.

The audition leads to nine weeks of study at the Bershire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony, at Lenox, Mass. Those selected will participate in the 70-member symphony orchestra chosen from audition winners from all parts of the nation.

Students also will be given lessons and chamber music training from members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Lee Chrisman, chairman of the Department of Music Education, Boston University, will hear the auditions.

Tanglewood Faculty Recital Sunday at 8.30

LENOX —The Berkshire Music Center will present a faculty recital Sunday at 8.30 in Tanglewood's theater-concert hall.

Artists will be Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Gilbert Kalish, pianist.

The program consists of Sonata in A major, Opus 162, by Schubert; Sonata in B flat major, K. 454, by Mozart.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 125,5 (M)

AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Fund Provides Resident Artist

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

OKLAHOMA PRESS PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

SUNDAY MORNING NEWS
ENID, OKLAHOMA
Circ. 24,596

CURTIN IS FIRST 'GRANRUD ARTIST'

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

The first artist in residence is soprano Phyllis Curtin, who will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season this summer.

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822

AUG 26 1970 New England Newsclip

CURTIN IS FIRST 'GRANRUD ARTIST'

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

SEP 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Curtin if First 'Granrud Artist'

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Mass., which she left for use at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home.

The money is going to be used to bring artists in residence or instructors to Tanglewood for seminars, workshops and master classes.

The first artist in residence is soprano Phyllis Curtin, who will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season this summer.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 35,055

JUL 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Bequeathed $75,000 Grant

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, has announced.

Mrs. Granrud left the bequest "with the hope that it will be used at one time, or from time to time, for the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer academy, with financial and audience support."

Banks also announced that the Trustees recently voted the bequest be used to establish "The Marian D. Granrud Fund." The Granrud Fund will bring an artist - in - residence or an instructor to the Berkshire Music Center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

This summer, soprano Phyllis Curtin is the Granrud artist - in - residence and will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season.

All participants in the classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs.

Prospective participants in Miss Curtin's master classes may obtain further information by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, 02140.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Has Soprano Instructor

LENOX, Mass. — Soprano Phyllis Curtin is the first Granrud artist-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center.

A bequest of $75,000 has been received from the estate of the late Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield to be used to provide an instructor at the center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

According to Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's board of trustees, Miss Curtin will offer master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood session. All class participants may attend rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony and other Center programs.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Springfield Woman Left $75,000 For Academy At Tanglewood

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's board of trustees, announced that a bequest of $75,000 has been received by the orchestra from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield. Mrs. Granrud left the bequest "with the hope that it will be used at one time, or from time to time, for the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer academy, with financial and audience support," at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Mr. Banks further announced that the trustees recently voted the bequest be used to establish 'The Marian D. Granrud Fund.' The Granrud Fund will bring an artist - in - residence or an instructor to the Berkshire Music Center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

This summer, soprano Phyllis Curtin is the Granrud Artist - in - Residence and will give Master Classes 10 hours each week during the eight - week Tanglewood season. She also offered a special Fourth of July Weekend Session, three Master Classes on July 3, 4 and 5. All participants in the classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs.

Prospective participants in Miss Curtin's Master Classes may obtain further information by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 02140.

$75,000 Bequest To Tanglewood

A bequest of $75,000 has been received by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Board of Trustees from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield, according to Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra.

Banks announced the trustees have voted the bequest be used to establish 'The Marian D. Granrud Fund.' The fund will bring an artist-in-residence or an instructor to the Berkshire Music Center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin is the Granrud Artist - in - Residence this summer and will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season.

Prospective participants in Miss Curtin's master classes may obtain further information by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, 02140.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 12 1970 New England Newsclip

$75,000 willed Berkshire Center

The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center has received a $75,000 bequest from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield and will use the money to establish, in the donor's name, an artist-in-residence program.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 8 1970 Ne Engl News

Berkshire Music Receives $75,000

The Berkshire Music Center has received a bequest of $75,000 from the estate of Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield. The money, according to Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees, will be used to bring an artist-in-residence or an instructor to the Center for special seminars, workshops and master classes. Soprano Phyllis Curtin will be the artist-in-residence this summer.

124

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

300 Boston Students to Tanglewood

Three hundred children from Boston's inner city will each spend four days at Tanglewood this summer in the first such program for Boston school children.

Costs are paid by part of a large grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation which will support the program for the next two years.

Children last week from the Emerson, Winthrop and Gibson schools, visited with Leonard Bernstein and other internationally known musicians and artists performing at the Berkshire summer home of the Boston Symphony.

Supervision for the youngsters is provided by the staff of the symphony and the music department of the public schools.

The program will run weekly through August 21.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,785 (S) 105,...

JU... 1970 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

300 Hub Students Visit Tanglewood

Nearly 300 students from 16 Boston schools have enjoyed a week's visit to Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer.

The Tanglewood visits were made possible through a grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation which has enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present concerts to Boston students throughout the school year.

At Tanglewood, the children visited members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in addition to attending drama and dance workshops held in the Berkshire location annually.

Whitestone Photo

Making a start

Eight-year-old Habib Davis gets the feel of a master musician's violin under the watchful eye of its owner, Michel Sasson, of the Boston Symphony. Habib and friends visited Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home, as part of a special youth program.

sional musicians. This BSO program, called "Days in the Arts," under development for several years by David Rockefeller Jr. and coordinated by Mary Jo Merseth, began in 1968 with one-day trips from Massachusetts cities to the festival. Kennedy Foundation sponsorship has made the expanded concept possible on a three-year basis.

Mrs. Merseth, whose assistants are themselves young professionals (singer Gwendolyn Lytle, actress Kathryn Haapala, and jazz musician Don Moors) emphasizes that bringing their young guests into active participation in the Tanglewood scene for such a short stay involves low-key exposure, rather than a dynamic cultural hard-sell. There is much to absorb: BSO rehearsals; theater games, and a Jacob's Pillow dance class, in which they take part; demonstrations by BSO musicians and woodwind or brass groups, with a chance for everyone to try the instruments and find out what makes them play; time to rap with friends; and perhaps a chance to perform at a talent show.

"Days in the Arts," watched with interest at Tanglewood and from greater distances, has already turned up enough observations to keep musical and social theoreticians busy for years.

A music center violinist, for instance, demonstrating for the group, was dumbfounded when a 10-year-old Boston boy, who had never touched a violin, immediately assumed hand positions with bow and fiddle that her own teacher had tried for years to explain.

And Mrs. Merseth, herself a flutist, had a similar surprise when a would-be player got the proper flute embouchure right the first time.

With several more contingents to arrive before the festival ends, she admits that it is problematical who is more inspired and enlightened by these visits—the youngsters or the musicians.

Editorials

A Few Pennies for the Arts

In the rush to get through the $1.7 billion state budget this week, the state Senate may give short shrift to dozens of small but important items.

One of these is money for the state Council on Arts and Humanities, which asked for $160,000 and was chopped back to $100,000 by the House.

To most people, the Council on Arts and Humanities may seem insignificant, but it is not. Among many other grants, it has made the following in the past two years:

— to the American Antiquarian Society, $2,300 for the restoration of priceless books, manuscripts, and oil portraits.

— to the Marlboro Historical Society, $125 for an architectural survey of the Peter Rice Homestead

— to the Grafton Historical Society, $225 for a similar study of the Willard Homestead.

— to the Petersham Historical Society, $267 for cataloguing and classification of its collection

—to the Worcester Art Museum, $6,526 toward the $10,000 raised for the "Arts Without Words" program —to the Shakerton society in Harvard, $1,000 for an architectural survey of the Shaker buildings there for restoration purposes.

—to the Worcester Symphony Orchestra, $1,500 for a youth concert two years ago at Assumption Preparatory school —to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for bus trips by children from all over the state to Tanglewood, to see rehearsals. Two hundred children from Worcester went.

—to the Hudson Public Library, $750 for a series of classical music concerts —to the Northboro Historical Society, $615 for restoration of oil paintings dating from the early 19th Century.

Small bequests and projects, yes. But far from insignificant. In fact the Council for the Arts and Humanities is the only agency that does this sort of thing on the local level. Its grants on projects to restore and preserve old houses and manuscripts are literally invaluable.

The Senate should take the time to restore the council's budget to the original $160,000. This is one budget item where not a single penny will be wasted.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP ... 1970 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70...
(S) 566,377

AUG 17 1970 New England Newsclip

Children at Pillow and Tanglewood

Lee, Mass.

A little-known activity of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival might be called "intake" rather than "outreach."

This season around 250 culturally deprived children of assorted sizes and colors, selected from the 5,200 who attended the winter Boston Symphony Youth Concerts, have been received at the Pillow Thursdays by executive director John Christian. They have visited the lovely wooded compound where the students of the University of the Dance are quartered. They have then gone to one of the big studios for a four-part lesson in dance: beginning technique, ballet, ethnic, and modern. They have been observed laughing aloud as they run, leap, and turn. They attend a matinee at the Ted Shawn Dance Theater, after which stars of the performance talk to them in the theater, answer questions, illustrate sequences, autograph programs.

Hopefully, the children have been made aware of the beauty and joy of movement. And they have seen dancers of different races and cultures living and working together in harmony and friendship.

This has been the beginning of a three-year project, "Days in the Arts," headed by David Rockefeller Jr. It is made possible by a grant to Boston Symphony Orchestra from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation. Its purpose is to expose the children to as many art forms as possible. Jacob's Pillow, which was chosen to present the art of dance, gives its services freely without support from the grant.

Each week also a new group has been taken to Tanglewood and housed at Windsor Mountain School. The children have attended a symphony concert, visited the Williamstown Theater, an art gallery, tried their hands at painting, viewed photographic art, and for recreation hiked and swum.

av., from the Joseph Hurley School, 70 Worcester st., and from the Philip Brooks School, 5 Perth st., Roxbury.

Tanglewood trips are made possible by a grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation, which has enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give concerts for Boston students throughout the school year. At Tanglewood, the children visit with members of the or- performing at the Tanglewood concerts. Letters from the young visitors are said to indicate a high degree of enthusiasm for the program.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

300 Boston Students to Tanglewood

Three hundred children from Boston's inner city will each spend four days at Tanglewood this summer in the first such program for Boston school children.

Costs are paid by part of a large grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation which will support the program for the next two years.

Children last week from the Emerson, Winthrop and Gibson schools, visited with Leonard Bernstein and other internationally known musicians and artists performing at the Berkshire summer home of the Boston Symphony.

Supervision for the youngsters is provided by the staff of the symphony and the music department of the public schools.

The program will run weekly through August 21.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 82,345 (S) 103,...

JUL 1970 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

300 Hub Students Visit Tanglewood

Nearly 300 students from 16 Boston schools have enjoyed a week's visit to Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer.

The Tanglewood visits were made possible through a grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation which has enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to present concerts to Boston students throughout the school year.

At Tanglewood, the children visited members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in addition to attending drama and dance workshops held in the Berkshire location annually.

Whitestone Photo

Eight-year-old Habib Davis gets the feel of a master musician's violin under the watchful eye of its owner, Michel Sasson, of the Boston Symphony. Habib and friends visited Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home, as part of a special youth program.

Making a start

sional musicians. This BSO program, called "Days in the Arts," under development for several years by David Rockefeller Jr. and coordinated by Mary Jo Merseth, began in 1968 with one-day trips from Massachusetts cities to the festival. Kennedy Foundation sponsorship has made the expanded concept possible on a three-year basis.

Mrs. Merseth, whose assistants are themselves young professionals (singer Gwendolyn Lytle, actress Kathryn Haapala, and jazz musician Don Moors) emphasizes that bringing their young guests into active participation in the Tanglewood scene for such a short stay involves low-key exposure, rather than a dynamic cultural hard-sell. There is much to absorb: BSO rehearsals; theater games, and a Jacob's Pillow dance class, in which they take part; demonstrations by BSO musicians and woodwind or brass groups, with a chance for everyone to try the instruments and find out what makes them play; time to rap with friends; and perhaps a chance to perform at a talent show.

"Days in the Arts," watched with interest at Tanglewood and from greater distances, has already turned up enough observations to keep musical and social theoreticians busy for years.

A music center violinist, for instance, demonstrating for the group, was dumbfounded when a 11-year-old Boston boy, who had never touched a violin, immediately assumed hand positions with bow and fiddle that her own teacher had tried for years to explain.

And Mrs. Merseth, herself a flutist, had a similar surprise when a would-be player got the proper flute embouchure right the first time.

With several more contingents to arrive before the festival ends, she admits that it is problematical who is more inspired and enlightened by these visits—the youngsters or the musicians.

Editorials

Pennies for the Arts

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 1 1970 New England Newsclip

Ossie Davis (second from left) and "Purlie" actors (in front of the Broadway Theater)

'Purlie Victorious' was 'almost a social experiment'

...ing in the past two ...

— to the American Antiquarian Society, $2,300 for the restoration of priceless books, manuscripts, and oil portraits.

— to the Marlboro Historical Society, $125 for an architectural survey of the Peter Rice Homestead

— to the Grafton Historical Society, $225 for a similar study of the Willard Homestead.

— to the Petersham Historical Society, $267 for cataloguing and classification of its collection

—to the Worcester Art Museum, $6,526 toward the $10,000 raised for the "Arts Without Words" program —to the Shakerton society in Harvard, $1,000 for an architectural survey, $615 for ... paintings dating from the early 19th Century.

Small bequests and projects, yes ... But far from insignificant. In fact th ... Council for the Arts and Humanities ... the only agency that does this sort ... thing on the local level. Its grants ... projects to restore and preserve ... houses and manuscripts are literally ... valuable.

The Senate should take the time ... restore the council's budget to the o... inal $160,000. This is one budget i... where not a single penny will ... wasted.

...nt thr...

...ose that was the first thing ...en that I saw staged.

"I guess the third big thing ...rst public appearance I e... ...roadway in a show called '... ...cquaintance with a young

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70...
(S) 566,377

AUG 17 1970 New England Newsclip

Student bus trips to Tanglewood ending

Tomorrow marks the end of a week of visits to Tanglewood in the Berkshires for nearly 300 pupils from 16 Boston schools.

The last buses will leave at 7:30 a.m. from the Mackey School, 90 Warren av., from the Joseph Hurley School, 70 Worcester st., and from the Philip Brooks School, 5 Perth st., Roxbury.

Tanglewood trips are made possible by a grant from the Frederick Kennedy Foundation, which has enabled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give concerts for Boston students throughout the school year. At Tanglewood, the children visit with members of the orchestra, and also attend drama and dance workshops at various places nearby.

This summer, students met and talked with Leonard Bernstein and other musicians conducting or performing at the Tanglewood concerts. Letters from the young visitors are said to indicate a high degree of enthusiasm for the program.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Notes on the festival scene

A seminar focusing on master classes and workshops in the performance of violin concertos will be conducted by violinist Roman Totenberg at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass., July 27-Aug. 7.

Mr. Totenberg, chairman of the string department at Boston University, began his performing career at the age of eight in Poland. He graduated from the Warsaw Chopin Conservatory and later studied at the Berlin Academy and the Instrumental Academy in Berlin.

He has appeared with many leading symphonies, including the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, and the Boston and Cleveland Symphony Orchestras. He has also recorded on the Deutsche Grammophon, Telefunken, Vanguard, and Musical Heritage labels.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute, now in its fifth season, is a cooperative venture in the arts and education between the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony, and the School of Fine and Applied Arts at BU. In addition to the program in applied music and education, the institute offers workshops and seminars in playwriting, dance, painting, and drawing.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Stockbridge

Laurel Hill Day Speaker To Be Silvio Conte

STOCKBRIDGE — Congressman Silvio O. Conte will be the speaker on Laurel Hill Day, Saturday, at 3 p.m. His topic will be "The Environment."

A brass quintet, made up of students from the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, will perform the "Canzone per Sonare" by Giovanni Gabrielli, and Sonata No. 2 by Johann Pezel. These students, all of high school age, are chosen by audition from all over the United States to participate in BU's Young Artist Program. There are 22 states represented in the program at Tanglewood this summer.

The Laurel Hill Association was founded 117 years ago by Mary Hopkins who later became Mrs. John Z. Goodrich. She conceived the idea for village improvement on taking notice of the deplorable conditions of the village burying ground and roads. She tacked up notices inviting all townspeople to assemble on Laurel Hill on Aug. 24, 1853 to take measures for the regular improvement of the burying ground, the streets, the walks, the public grounds and Laurel Hill. Laurel Hill had been given to the town by the Sedgwick family in 1834 for a public park.

As the first village-improvement society in the United States, Laurel Hill set the pattern for similar organizations all over the country.

Mrs. David E. Braman and her committee are in charge of refreshments. The public has been invited.

In case of rain, the program will be held in the Plain School gym.

University at Tanglewood Events

The public is invited without charge to two presentations by the playwrights' workshop of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute next week in the Nina Jacobson theatre of Windsor Mountain School in Lenox.

"Scenes from American Life," by A. R. Gurney Jr. will be performed Wednesday and Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Friday at 7 p.m., and Saturday at 8:45. Maxine Klein's "The Americans" will be presented Thursday afternoon at 2:30, Friday at 9 p.m., and Saturday at 7 p.m.

The workshop was founded four summers ago at Tanglewood by Boston University in connection with the Berkshire Music Center to give promising playwrights an opportunity to have their work staged by professional actors and directors.

Dance Concert

Three dance concerts will also be presented by members of the institute on Thursday, Aug. 6, at 8:30 p.m. and Saturday, Aug. 8, at 3 and 8:30 p.m. in the Windsor Mountain theatre. Students of the Berkshire Music Center will provide music for the program that features two modern premieres, one by Clyde Morgan, faculty member, and the other by Carla Maxwell, artist-in-residence. Works by José Limon, Anna Sokolow and Daniel Nagrin will also be performed.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

MAR 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston U. Names Tanglewood Heads

BOSTON — Boston University Tanglewood Institute, a cooperative effort in arts and education between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its fifth year on June 28, 1970, in Lenox, Mass.

An opera workshop, with Adelaide Bishop as stage director and Felix Popper as musical director, has been added to Boston University's 1970 Tanglewood program, along with three specialized courses in music education.

Miss Bishop, stage director of the opera department at Boston University, is a former soprano with the New York City Opera and the NBC-TV Opera. In past summers she has been stage director of the Lake George Opera Festival. Mr. Popper is administrator and musical conductor of the New York City Opera.

The six-week workshop in operatic techniques, running from July 6 to August 15, will also include instruction in movement for the stage by Joseph Gifford, head of the theater and dance program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute and associate professor of theater arts at Boston University.

The music education curriculum will feature a course in ethnological music, from June 29 to July 1, taught by David McAllester, a professor of anthropology at Wesleyan College and an internationally - known scholar in non-western music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., DAILY NEWS, THURSDAY, MARCH 26, 1970

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

APR 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Pianist Byron Janis, who will be at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

Dance festival lineup listed

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Ted Shawn has again balanced dance forms to include ballet, modern, mime and ethnic for the 38th season of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival at Lee, June 25 through Aug. 29.

The opening week, June 25-27, will be shared by Edward Villella and North Carolina Dance Theater. Pauline Koner and the North Carolina company will appear for the second week, July 2-4.

Seven Performances

From the third week through the 10th there will be seven performances — evenings Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday; matinees on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Matinees are at 3 p.m., and evenings at 8:40 p.m.

Third week, July 7-11 will be divided between Ritha Devi and Hindu musicians and an attraction to be announced.

July 14-18, Lupe Serrano and Royes Fernandez and the American Mime Theater.

July 21-25, Pearl Lang Dance Company.

July 28-Aug. 1, Kay Mazzo and Frank Ohman, Lonny Joseph Gordon, Bhaskar and Company.

Aug. 4-8, First Chamber Dance Company, Luis Rivera and Company.

Aug. 11-15, Murray Louis Dance Company.

Aug. 18-22, Arthur Mitchell's Dance Theater of Harlem.

Aug. 25-29, Jacob's Pillow Dancers with guests, Ruth Page, choreographer, Jean Leon Destine and Company from Haiti.

Tickets for Tuesday through Friday are $4.50. Saturday seats are $5. There are special prices for season tickets of six or more weeks.

Further information may be obtained by writing to the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Box 287, Lee, Mass. 01238.

MUSIC

Raymond Merin

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Tanglewood Institute, a cooperative effort in arts and education between BU's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its fifth year on June 28 in Lenox.

An opera workshop, with Adelaide Bishop as stage director and Felix Popper as musical director, has been added to the 1970 Tanglewood program, along with three specialized courses in music education.

Two familiar figures to the Worcester area concert scene will conduct workshops in applied music.

Pianist Byron Janis will have a piano seminar, July 27 to Aug. 21. Janis first appeared in Worcester on Becker Junior College concerts in 1949, when he was 21. The same year, he played on the Southbridge Community Concerts, and at the Worcester Festival in 1957.

From July 27 to Aug. 7, Roman Totenberg, chairman of the string departments at Boston University, will conduct a violin seminar for advanced performers and teachers.

Totenberg's small ensemble of strings and woodwinds played in Sturbridge in 1957, and the following season in Fitchburg. He also gave a solo violin recital on the Fitchburg Community Concerts series in 1964.

MORE THAN 10,000 STUDENTS from over 200 public and private schools throughout five New England states will be attending performances by the Metropolitan Opera during its one week engagement beginning tomorrow night in Hynes Civic Auditorium, Boston.

The Wednesday evening performance of Bellini's "Norma," with Joan Sutherland, is sold out.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUN 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Special Tanglewood courses Offered by Conservatory

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

A number of seminars and special music courses for auditors and credit-earning participants will be offered from July 13 through Aug. 23 by the New England Conservatory of Music Institute at Tanglewood.

These are with tuition and not to be confused with the Berkshire Music Center's fellowship program.

The Conservatory's main subjects are in jazz, music education and contemporary composition.

Music education in the 1970s will be discussed in sessions of five days each by Ian Strasfogel, John Heiss, Barbara Hurley, Michael Steinberg, Robert Ceely and Robert Cogan.

The courses in contemporary composition will be under the direction of Herbert Alper, and a two-part seminar in jazz will be conducted by David Baker and George Russell.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Participants in any of these programs will be able to attend all performances and events of the Berkshire Music Festival at no additional cost. The festival features the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE LIBRARY of Congress is exhibiting currently a collection of manuscripts, printed music, photographs, and colored stage designs honoring Richard Rodgers.

Over the years Rodgers has presented most of his original manuscripts to the Library of Congress, many of which are displayed in the exhibit.

Also on view are his first commercially published song, "Any Old Place With You" (1929), the gold record representing over a million sold of the original cast album of "The Sound of Music," the Pulitzer Prize, and the Antoinette Perry Award bestowed by the American Theater Wing for the best musical of 1959-60, "Sound of Music."

WHAT MAY BE a record-breaking concert for length will be given at the Newport Jazz Festival at Festival Field in Rhode Island on Saturday, July 11. The festival, July 10-12.

Starting at noon on Saturday, July 11, will be six solid hours of jazz. It will begin with three unamplified workshops running simultaneously on small stages. They will be on drums, trumpet and violin.

From 3 p.m. to 6 p.m. will be a concert on the main stage with the Sadao Watanabe Quartet, Gary Burton Quartet with guest Keith Jarrett, Chico Hamilton Quintet, Tony Williams Lifetime and Elvin Jones Trio.

PLANS are already underway for Leonard Bernstein's televised tribute to Beethoven on Dec. 16. It will honor the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth.

Portions of three of Beethoven's most important works will be offered by the Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna State Opera Chorus, and soloists — the opera, "Fidelio," Ninth Symphony, and First Piano Concerto. Bernstein will be soloist in the concerto.

INTERESTING DATA is contained in a "fact sheet"

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Youth Concert Features Pooh Bear

Gunther Schuller will direct members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program in a youth concert tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall.

The program features Kurt Carpenter's "Night Spell," Oliver Knussen's "Winnie-the-Pooh Songs," Paul Hindemith's Wind Quintet and Maurice Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp, Flute, Clarinet and String Quartet.

Tanglewood Sets Youth Concerts

A series of four Youth Concerts by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will again be presented at Tanglewood. The Wednesday afternoon concerts, which begin at 2:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall, are slated for July 15 and 22 and Aug. 5 and 12.

The program and conductor for each concert will be different. Conductors scheduled in the series include James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Yannatos will conduct the July 15 concert, which features the Boston Artist Orchestra in a program of the Bartok concerto for orchestra, the fourth movement of the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

For tickets, send a stamped and self-addressed envelope to Miss Marilyn Wilt at Tanglewood, Lenox. The fee is under $1. Large groups are requested to call in advance, but tickets will be available at the Tanglewood information booth on the day of each concert.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

785

Four Youth Concerts

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Tanglewood will present a series of four Youth Concerts by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The concerts, all held on Wednesdays at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall, present a different program and conductor for each show.

Conductors include James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas, 25 - year - old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert takes place on Wednesday when James Yannatos conducts the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra. The program consists of excerpts from the Bartok Concerto for orchestra, the fourth movement of the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, and excerpts from Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

Dates for the other concerts are: July 22, August 5, and 12. Admission may be ordered in advance from Miss Marilyn Wilt, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Please include a stamped, self - addressed envelope with your mail orders. Tickets are also available at the Tanglewood Information Booth the day of the concert. For large groups, please call in advance for reservations.

MUSIC CENTER ENDS SEASON

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — Except for a final bit of chamber music this morning the Berkshire Music Center wound up its summer at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon with a 100-minute concert by its 90-member orchestra and the announcement of prizes.

Not given this year was the most prestige-laden prize usually awarded here, the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize.

There were 22 other recipients, however, each receiving a cash prize as well as the honor.

The program included an overture by Reznicek and one of impressionism's great classics, Debussy's La Mer conducted by Isaiah Jackson of New York, Copland's Concerto For Clarinet And String Orchestra, and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks conducted by Mesru Mehmedov.

Both conductors have been studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center during the summer.

The prizes were awarded as follows:

Mesru Mehmedov, 35, of Bulgaria, winner of the Mitropoulos Prize and Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Award for a conductor, $300.

Chinary Ung, 27, of Cambodia, Margaret Grant Memorial Composition Prize, $300.

Eugene Drucker, 17, of New York Albert Spalding Prize for most promising and outstanding instrumentalist, violin, $300.

Tibor Pusztai, 23, of Hungary and Kurt Carpenter, 21, of Orchard Lake Michigan, Koussvitzky Tanglewood Composition Prizes, $250.

David Stern, 19, of Great Neck, N.Y., Clarinetist, for Best Player With Everything But Money, $200.

Robert Routch, 21, of Allentown Pa. French Horn Henry B. Cabot Award, $100.

Sharon Wood, 21, of Seattle, Violin, Joseph Silverstein Award for Violinist, $100.

Maria Kyprie, 22, of Ann Arbor, Mich., Cellist of Extraordinary Merit, Gregor Piatorgorsky Prize, $100.

Linda Phillips, 29, of Morgantown Sorpano, to a Talented Member of Any Department, High Fidelity Magazine Award, $100.

Virginia Blakeman, 21, Fremont O, Violinist, Benjamin H. Delson Memorial Prize, $100.

C. D. Jackson Awards: $250 to Stephen Wilkes, 22, Cincinnati, violinist; $250 to Richard Fletcher, 19, of Natick Contrabass; $250 to Robert Sallman, 23, Storrs, Conn. Flute; $250 to Yasuo Watanabe, 21, of Japan, Piano ; $250 to Kenneth Iziegenfuss, 25, of Stanford, Calif., Piano; $250 to John Taber, 29, of Marion Trumpet; $100 to Paul Berns, 24, of Fairview Park, Ohio, Percussion; $100 to Joan Heler, 26, of Avis, Pa. Soprano; $100 to Pascal Tortelieer, 23, of Paris, France, Violin; $100 to Frank Charnley, 21, of Framingham Center, Oboe; $100 to Richard Wasley, 25, of Boyertown, Pa., Clarinet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,751
AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Season Ends At Berkshire Music Center

LENOX — Except for a inal bit of chamber music Sunday morning the Berkshire Music Center wound up ts summer at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon with a 100-minute concert by its 90-member orchestra and the announcement of prizes.

Not given this year was the most prestige-laden prize usually awarded here, the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize.

There were 22 other recipients, however, each receiving a cash prize as well as the honor.

The program included an overture by Reznicek and one of impressionism's great classics, Debussy's La Mer conducted by Isaiah Jackson of New York, Copland's Concerto For Clarinet And String Orchestra, and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks conducted by Mesru Mehmedov.

Both conductors have been studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center during the summer.

The prizes were awarded as follows:

Mesru Mehmedov, 35, of Bulgaria, winner of the Mitropoulos Prize and Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Award for a conductor, $300.

Chinary Ung, 27, of Cambodia, Margaret Grant Memorial Composition Prize, $300.

Eugene Drucker, 17, of New York Albert Spalding Prize for most promising and outstanding instrumentalist, violin, $300.

Tibor Pusztai, 23, of Hungary and Kurt Carpenter, 21, of Orchard Lake Michigan, Koussvitzky Tanglewood Composition Prizes, $250.

David Stern, 19, of Great Neck, N.Y., Clarinetist, for Best Player With Everything But Money, $200.

Robert Routch, 21, of Allentown Pa. French Horn Henry B. Cabot Award, $100.

Sharon Wood, 21, of Seattle, Violin, Joseph Silverstein Award for Violinist, $100.

Maria Kyprie, 22, of Ann Arbor, Mich., Cellist of Extraordinary Merit, Gregor Piatorgorsky Prize, $100.

Linda Phillips, 29, of Morgantown Sorpano, to a Talented Member of Any Department, High Fidelity Magazine Award, $100.

Virginia Blakeman, 21, Fremont O, Violinist, Benjamin H. Delson Memorial Prize, $100.

C. D. Jackson Awards: $250 to Stephen Wilkes, 22, Cincinnati, violinist; $250 to Richard Fletcher, 19, of Natick Contrabass; $250 to Robert Sallman, 23, Storrs, Conn. Flute; $250 to Yasuo Watanabe, 21, of Japan, Piano ; $250 to Kenneth Iziegenfuss, 25, of Stanford, Calif., Piano; $250 to John Taber, 29, of Marion Trumpet; $100 to Paul Berns, 24, of Fairview Park, Ohio, Percussion; $100 to Joan Heler, 26, of Avis, Pa.. Soprano; $100 to Pascal Tortelieer, 23, of Paris, France, Violin; $100 to Frank Charnley, 21, of Framingham Center, Oboe; $100 to Richard Wasley, 25, of Boyertown, Pa., Clarinet.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
AM) 52,185 (S) 168,576
JUN 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Special Tanglewood courses Offered by Conservatory

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

A number of seminars and special music courses for auditors and credit-earning participants will be offered from July 13 through Aug. 23 by the New England Conservatory of Music Institute at Tanglewood.

These are with tuition and not to be confused with the Berkshire Music Center's fellowship program.

The Conservatory's main subjects are in jazz, music education and contemporary composition.

Music education in the 1970s will be discussed in sessions of five days each by Ian Strasfogel, John Heiss, Barbara Hurley, Michael Steinberg, Robert Ceely and Robert Cogan.

The courses in contemporary composition will be under the direction of Herbert Alper, and a two-part seminar in jazz will be conducted by David Baker and George Russell.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Participants in any of these programs will be able to attend all performances and events of the Berkshire Music Festival at no additional cost. The festival features the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE LIBRARY of Congress is exhibiting currently a collection of manuscripts, printed music, photographs, and colored stage designs honoring Richard Rodgers.

Over the years Rodgers has presented most of his original manuscripts to the Library of Congress, many of which are displayed in the exhibit.

Also on view are his first commercially published song, "Any Old Place With You" (1929), the gold record representing over a million sold of the original cast album of "The Sound of Music," the Pulitzer Prize, and the Antoinette Perry Award bestowed by the American Theater Wing for the best musical of 1959-60, "Sound of Music."

WHAT MAY BE a record-breaking concert for length will be given at the Newport Jazz Festival at Festival Field in Rhode Island on Saturday, July 11. The festival, July 10-12.

Starting at noon on Saturday, July 11, will be six solid hours of jazz. It will begin with three unamplified workshops running simultaneously on small stages. They will be on drums, trumpet and violin.

From 3 p.m. to 6 p.m. will be a concert on the main stage with the Sadao Watanabe Quartet, Gary Burton Quartet with guest Keith Jarrett, Chico Hamilton Quintet, Tony Williams Lifetime and Elvin Jones Trio.

PLANS are already underway for Leonard Bernstein's televised tribute to Beethoven on Dec. 16. It will honor the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth.

Portions of three of Beethoven's most important works will be offered by the Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna State Opera Chorus, and soloists — the opera, "Fidelio," Ninth Symphony, and First Piano Concerto. Bernstein will be soloist in the concerto.

INTERESTING DATA is contained in a "fact sheet"

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Youth Concert Features Pooh Bear

Gunther Schuller will direct members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program in a youth concert tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall.

The program features Kurt Carpenter's "Night Spell," Oliver Knussen's "Winnie-the-Pooh Songs," Paul Hindemith's Wind Quintet and Maurice Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp, Flute, Clarinet and String Quartet.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

Four Youth Concerts

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Tanglewood will present a series of four Youth Concerts by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The concerts, all held on Wednesdays at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall, present a different program and conductor for each show.

Conductors include James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas, 25 - year - old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert takes place on Wednesday when James Yannatos conducts the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra. The program consists of excerpts from the Bartok Concerto for orchestra, the fourth movement of the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, and excerpts from Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

Dates for the other concerts are: July 22, August 5, and 12. Admission may be ordered in advance from Miss Marilyn Wilt, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Please include a stamped, self - addressed envelope with your mail orders. Tickets are also available at the Tanglewood Information Booth the day of the concert. For large groups, please call in advance for reservations.

Tanglewood Sets Youth Concerts

A series of four Youth Concerts by the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will again be presented at Tanglewood. The Wednesday afternoon concerts, which begin at 2:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall, are slated for July 15 and 22 and Aug. 5 and 12.

The program and conductor for each concert will be different. Conductors scheduled in the series include James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Yannatos will conduct the July 15 concert, which features the Boston Artist Orchestra in a program of the Bartok concerto for orchestra, the fourth movement of the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

For tickets, send a stamped and self-addressed envelope to Miss Marilyn Wilt at Tanglewood, Lenox. The fee is under $1. Large groups are requested to call in advance, but tickets will be available at the Tanglewood information booth on the day of each concert.

MUSIC CENTER ENDS SEASON

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — Except for a final bit of chamber music this morning the Berkshire Music Center wound up its summer at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon with a 100-minute concert by its 90-member orchestra and the announcement of prizes.

Not given this year was the most prestige-laden prize usually awarded here, the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize.

There were 22 other recipients, however, each receiving a cash prize as well as the honor.

The program included an overture by Reznicek and one of impressionism's great classics, Debussy's La Mer conducted by Isaiah Jackson of New York, Copland's Concerto For Clarinet And String Orchestra, and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks conducted by Mesru Mehmedov.

Both conductors have been studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center during the summer.

The prizes were awarded as follows:

Mesru Mehmedov, 35, of Bulgaria, winner of the Mitropoulos Prize and Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Award for a conductor, $300.

Chinary Ung, 27, of Cambodia, Margaret Grant Memorial Composition Prize, $300.

Eugene Drucker, 17, of New York Albert Spalding Prize for most promising and outstanding instrumentalist, violin, $300.

Tibor Pusztai, 23, of Hungary and Kurt Carpenter, 21, of Orchard Lake Michigan, Koussvitzky Tanglewood Composition Prizes, $250.

David Stern, 19, of Great Neck, N.Y., Clarinetist, for Best Player With Everything But Money, $200.

Robert Routch, 21, of Allentown Pa. French Horn Henry B. Cabot Award, $100.

Sharon Wood, 21, of Seattle, Violin, Joseph Silverstein Award for Violinist, $100.

Maria Kyprie, 22, of Ann Arbor, Mich., Cellist of Extraordinary Merit, Gregor Piatorgorsky Prize, $100.

Linda Phillips, 29, of Morgantown Sorpano, to a Talented Member of Any Department, High Fidelity Magazine Award, $100.

Virginia Blakeman, 21, Fremont O, Violinist, Benjamin H. Delson Memorial Prize, $100.

C. D. Jackson Awards: $250 to Stephen Wilkes, 22, Cincinnati, violinist; $250 to Richard Fletcher, 19, of Natick Contrabass; $250 to Robert Sallman, 23, Storrs, Conn. Flute; $250 to Yasuo Watanabe, 21, of Japan, Piano ; $250 to Kenneth Iziegenfuss, 25, of Stanford, Calif., Piano; $250 to John Taber, 29, of Marion Trumpet; $100 to Paul Berns, 24, of Fairview Park, Ohio, Percussion; $100 to Joan Heler, 26, of Avis, Pa.. Soprano; $100 to Pascal Tortelieer, 23, of Paris, France, Violin; $100 to Frank Charnley, 21, of Framingham Center, Oboe; $100 to Richard Wasley, 25, of Boyertown, Pa., Clarinet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,761
AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Season Ends At Berkshire Music Center

LENOX — Except for a final bit of chamber music Sunday morning the Berkshire Music Center wound up its summer at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon with a 100-minute concert by its 90-member orchestra and the announcement of prizes.

Not given this year was the most prestige-laden prize usually awarded here, the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize.

There were 22 other recipients, however, each receiving a cash prize as well as the honor.

The program included an overture by Reznicek and one of impressionism's great classics, Debussy's La Mer conducted by Isaiah Jackson of New York, Copland's Concerto For Clarinet And String Orchestra, and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks conducted by Mesru Mehmedov.

Both conductors have been studying on a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center during the summer.

The prizes were awarded as follows:

Mesru Mehmedov, 35, of Bulgaria, winner of the Mitropoulos Prize and Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Eleanor R. Crane Memorial Award for a conductor, $300.

Chinary Ung, 27, of Cambodia, Margaret Grant Memorial Composition Prize, $300.

Eugene Drucker, 17, of New York Albert Spalding Prize for most promising and outstanding instrumentalist, violin, $300.

Tibor Pusztai, 23, of Hungary and Kurt Carpenter, 21, of Orchard Lake Michigan, Koussvitzky Tanglewood Composition Prizes, $250.

David Stern, 19, of Great Neck, N.Y., Clarinetist, for Best Player With Everything But Money, $200.

Robert Routch, 21, of Allentown Pa. French Horn Henry B. Cabot Award, $100.

Sharon Wood, 21, of Seattle, Violin, Joseph Silverstein Award for Violinist, $100.

Maria Kyprie, 22, of Ann Arbor, Mich., Cellist of Extraordinary Merit, Gregor Piatorgorsky Prize, $100.

Linda Phillips, 29, of Morgantown Sorpano, to a Talented Member of Any Department, High Fidelity Magazine Award, $100.

Virginia Blakeman, 21, Fremont O, Violinist, Benjamin H. Delson Memorial Prize, $100.

C. D. Jackson Awards: $250 to Stephen Wilkes, 22, Cincinnati, violinist; $250 to Richard Fletcher, 19, of Natick Contrabass; $250 to Robert Sallman, 23, Storrs, Conn. Flute; $250 to Yasuo Watanabe, 21, of Japan, Piano ; $250 to Kenneth Iziegenfuss, 25, of Stanford, Calif., Piano; $250 to John Taber, 29, of Marion Trumpet; $100 to Paul Berns, 24, of Fairview Park, Ohio, Percussion; $100 to Joan Heler, 26, of Avis, Pa.. Soprano; $100 to Pascal Tortelieer, 23, of Paris, France, Violin; $100 to Frank Charnley, 21, of Framingham Center, Oboe; $100 to Richard Wasley, 25, of Boyertown, Pa., Clarinet.

J.Y. Times August 18, 1970

Music: Moderns' Orgy

George Crumb's Pulitzer Composition Heard at Tanglewood Fete

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 17—Contemporary music, outside the academic cloisters to which it has been condemned by the culture industry in this country, is generally to be found, when at all, on its back and breathing heavily.

So the continued existence of an oxygen tent here at Tanglewood, in the form of the Berkshire Music Center's Festival of Contemporary Music, is one of the healthy signs discernible on the American horizon.

This summer's festival, a five-day orgy of modernity co-sponsored as usual by the Fromm Music Foundation, opened Sunday night with Gunther Schuller conducting four works, two quite recent and American, and two that gave one a look backwards at what was going on in Europe a decade or more ago, just for perspective.

The triumph of the evening came in a beautiful performance of George Crumb's 1968 Pulitzer Prize winner, "Echoes of Time and the River." A four-movement masterpiece first performed in 1967 by the Chicago Symphony and since then unheard, Mr. Crumb's work came to life here in its music-theater form, complete with mysterious processionals by solemn wind players of the music center orchestra, which performed the delicate score with apparent ease under Mr. Schuller's expert hand.

The ritualistic aspect had touches of vaudeville fun (at one moment, for instance, nine wind players march onstage, position themselves portentously, puff windily but tonelessly into their instruments, then march off).

So the professionals, which in the Chicago premiere were omitted, possibly because the orchestra could not enter into the spirit of the thing, did add a theatrical dimension to "Echoes." As in the earlier performances, however, one was caught and held in the grip of Mr. Crumb's fantasty by the art with which he exploited the orchestra's sound potential. This is "ear music." Understandably, the audience in the theater-concert hall gave the composer, who was present, an ovation of the prolonged sort that new music rarely provokes.

For an up-to-the-moment report on what's happening out there in academic America, there was Olly Wilson's "Voices," dated 1970, and commissioned by the Fromm Foundation. Mr. Wilson, who teaches at Oberlin Conservatory and joins the faculty of the University of California at Berkeley in the fall, swept technical devices of every contemporary kind into "Voices," and wove them together expertly.

Fingers drummed on fiddles, hands clapped, mouths whistled chords (as in Mr. Crumb's "Echoes"), and so on. The blocklike progressions of sound recalled Varése somewhat, jazz rhythms cropped up, and the ghost of "Petrushka" appeared now and then.

In the end, Mr. Wilson's work did not manage to sublimate all these elements into a fresh or individual eclecticism, though one could hear skill and talent in it all.

For his quick retrospective look at Europe's older trend-setters, Mr. Schuller (who at intermission received the Alice M. Ditson conducting award for 1970 from Columbia University), brought out Luigi Nono's 1956 Cantata, "Il Canto Sospeso" and Krzvsztof Penderecki's "Anakklasis," both United States premieres.

The nine-movement Nono came to life fitfully, particularly in Elsa Charlston's soprano solo, but elsewhere depended too much on its anti-Nazi sentiments for impact. Penderecki's "Anaklasis," a 1960 piece, was a 10-minute trip to the land of microtones, instrumental extremes, sliding tones and other techniques much used by Penderecki and fellow travelers such as Ligeti.

Mr. Penderecki's catalogue of effects seemed too often that, all surface sheen and not enough substance. Still, in its way, a good listenable piece from the usable past.

DONAL HENAHAN.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC.: 1,000,000

AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Music: The 20th Century

Contemporary Festival at Tanglewood Offers Appealing Mix of Old and New

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 21—Festivals of contemporary music are sometimes neither very contemporary nor very musical, and only festive in the loosest use of the word.

But the 1970 Tanglewood week allotted to Gunther Schuller and his Berkshire Music Center students has made an admirable show of balancing the required elements. In among premieres and other totally unfamiliar pieces, the festival sprinkled enough older music and works in older idioms to keep one's ears off balance and receptive to newer sounds.

Last night's concert roared to a finish with Michael Tilson Thomas leading a chamber orchestra through Edgard Varése's "Intégrales," one of the early trend-pointing works by Varèse that have exercised so pervasive an influence on composers of the last decade. Mr. Thomas, who conducts 20th-century music with great accuracy as well as laudable ebullience, paced the still-explosive 1924 score so that its peaks of excitement came soon and often. The performance tended to tail off near the end, but it was a powerful one, nonetheless, and an appropriate one to end a 1970 festival in spite of its age of 46 years.

●

In the more recent category, last night's program offered Philip Bezanzon's "Five Miniatures for Clarinet and Cello" (1960), performed sensitively and deftly by Donald Green, cello, and Richard Wasley, clarinet. The Bezanson pieces, lucidly constructed and wonderfully strong in musical impulse, threw their germinal ideas back and forth between the instruments in fine imitative, contrapuntal style and let the cello draw long melodic bows.

Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive" (1963), for piano and flute, made its peace with both Webern and Debussy and drew soft, delicate lines that the flute's quarter-tone trills embellished. The prepared piano contributed a harpsichordy jangle during a lovely middle section.

Electronic music, sparsely represented at this festival, drew itself up to full height with Charles Wuorinen's Pulitzer prize winner. "Time's Encomium," which was played at full half-hour length in a darkened hall with only speakers and tape technician on stage. This was an odd entry in the festival since it is known on records in its electronic version and took up time that lesser known pieces could have used. A really valuable idea would have been to present the Wuorinen piece in the orchestral version that he made out of his electronic prize-winner.

Time, no doubt, pressed in on the festival's planners, making such large-scale projects impossible. But they mounted 19 works in four concerts, including four first performances and five first United States performances, a staggering schedule to prepare adequately, let alone brilliantly.

Under the circumstances, the performances proved almost uniformly well polished, even when the problems were as complex as those raised by Richard Felciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," a 1970 piece in which electronic sound sedved as a unifying element while conventional instruments carried on raucous, angry-sounding dialogues. The work often succeeded in proving its composer's concern for small details while loverlooking large effects, but ended in quiet dratma with the orchestra whispering "Jani Christou," the name of a Greek composer who was killed in an auto accident last year.

●

Wednesday's program bowed to Aaron Copland with his 10-year-old "Nonet for Strings," a serial piece with early Schoenberg overtones that did not quite cohere at times but still cried out that a genuine composer was at the controls. Jürg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (1968) mixed interesting sonorities out of flute, bass flute and piccolo in tandem with piano and electric organ. But its all-stops-out climax fizzled—the two performers were instructed to play to the point of "exhaustion" and in an "uncontrolled" manner; their frenzy proved mild and pointless.

Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen" (1966), an expertly made piece for seven instruments, got extraordinarily involved rhythmically and was full of striking instants, which however, did not add up to much beyond frustration. Les Thimmig's "Seven Profiles" for string quartet (1967) put together seven brief movements into a pleasant suite that did not go much beyond conventional post Webern wisdom, but used its idiom wisely and well.

It would be impossible to list all the student performers who brought the 1970 festival to life and kept it there since dozens of young artists were involved. Fortunately for American music, we now take such excellence for granted.

NEW YORK TIMES 8-19-70

Music: Moderns' Hearing

Young Leaders and Virtuoso Playing Enhance New Works at Lenox

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 18—In the last half dozen years there has been no more significant development in music than the appearance of imposing numbers of young performers who are both willing and able to play new works whose difficulties would have been beyond the reach of renowned virtuosos a generation ago.

Last night's concert at the Berkshire music center, the second of the current Festival of Contemporary Music, might have been planned as an exhibit to dramatize the present happy state of affairs.

Gunther Schuller, director with Seiji Ozawa of Tanglewood, shared the night's conducting duties with two gifted youngsters, Isaiah Jackson and George Monseur, and the six pieces on the program brought a seemingly endless flow of talent.

Great composers need great audiences, of course—though they will settle for less when necessary—but more pressingly today, composers need great performers. There is nothing more cheering than the indications that they are being brought together here and elsewhere

●

Last night's program was extraordinary in many ways, but particularly in that the two world premieres turned out to be as good as the best older music presented. Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No 6" for Piano and Electronic Sound (1970), with Robert Miller at the piano playing a trio with two loudspeakers, struck these ears as the finest piece yet heard in this mixed medium.

Mr. Davidovsky's taped sounds did not burble along aimlessly, but transformed the piano's ideas, commented on them, echoed them, and otherwise kept the ear and mind involved in his music's progress. The other first performance, Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" (1970), was commissioned by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation, co-sponsors of this festival within a festival.

●

"Trobar Clus" was a Provencal poetic form developed by the troubadours in the 11th and 12th centuries. Miss Kolb turns its circular structure to musical purposes, much as Ernst Krenek did more austerely some years ago in his "Sestina." "Trobar Clus" aims at "a rather positive staticism," in the composer's words, and achieves that seemingly contradictory state. Staticism implies something neutral and gray, but this piece for 13 instruments, spaced about the stage in four groups, mixed colors in ways that emphasized the separateness of each mini-orchestra and yet let them merge in long, slowly changing lines and textures. A sensitively imagined, quite elegant piece.

John Heiss's "Movements for Three Flutes" (1969) was a bit older, but similarly absorbing piece in which Nadine Asin, Nora Shulman and Robert Stallman manned the flutes—if such a verb can be used. Every traditional and avant-garde technique known to flutists came into play, but Mr. Heiss used devices such as overblowing, percussive tapping on the keys and the like to more organic purpose than is customary. Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen" (1968) required a soprano who could sing quarter tones and sound comfortable around E above High C, and it had her in Joan Heller.

●

Two pianos tuned to produce microtones (the notes that hide in the cracks of the piano keys, between the traditional half steps) provided appropriate wailing commentary as Miss Heller sang a text by Blake into which lines from the Requiem Mass were woven as a kind of interlinear. The quartet-tone effect often made striking sense, as when it gave a particular chill to the final word in a line such as "and the night is cold."

"Concatenations," a 1967 piece by George Wilson made much capital of an electrified accordion and a guitar, alongside traditional orchestral instruments, and reflected the composer's work with electronic instruments and how they let one shape a sound. It was quite easy to like, in spite of the intimidating foreknowledge that much of the piece was composed in mirror-like style, with reversible musical ideas. The night's only blank cartridge to these ears, was fired by Jean-Etienne Marie, whose "Obediens Usque ad Mortem" (1968) seemed clotted and pointless, and far less interesting than similar mathematical works by Xenakis. It may be retrograde thinking to believe, but one suspects that stochastic probabilities still cannot compose as good a piece as a composer can.

Modern Composers Seek Out An Identity

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

"This music's least virtue is its length, of which there should be none!" came the whispered comment behind me. I recognized it as a garbled version of what the late Olin Downes of the New York Times had once written about a new Stravinsky work. I couldn't resist turning around to see who had offered the new dictum and lo and behold! — I admit it hesitatingly —I recognized a former student of mine.

The occasion was one of the four concerts in the Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood (August 16-20), under the direction of composer-conductor Gunther Schuller. It is a festival within the annual summer festival at the Berkshire Music Center, initiated in 1963, sponsored by both the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and the Fromm Music Foundation, headed by its president-founder, Paul Fromm of Chicago.

My former student, incidentally, was quite wrong in his comment, for most of the music heard was comparatively brief and to the point, except possibly Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I & II" (1969). Wuorinen's work was realized at the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center in New York, using the RCA Synthesizer which is "prejudiced by its design towards 12-tone equal temperament," later interlarded with analog-studio transformations.

★ ★ ★

You don't follow, you don't understand?

You are still not alone, although this sort of sound experimentation has been around for some time. But don't fall into the trap of not liking the music, not listening to it because it doesn't use the traditional language.

This particular piece, besides its structural problems and solutions, has little else to offer during 30 minutes of organ and bagpipe-like sounds surging from two loudspeakers, double stops, fluttering, panning of the sound, the echo-effects, and all that is actually already old hat.

In fact, many pieces, while using traditional instruments, were out to prove that untraditional sounds could be produced in a series of frankly mechanistic studies that tax the players.

For example, there were compositons for the flute, such as John Heiss' "Movements for Three Flutes" and Juerg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" — the least successful in this category — and the completely realized "Cursive," written in 1763 by Chou Wen-Chung who moved from civil engineering via architecture into music, using the new language of calligraphic curves and loops.

All these works made use of glissandos, microtonal trills, overblowing tapping of the keys, double stops, fluttering, and just about every avant-garde technique known. But to me at least, none seemed to make as much sense as did Chou Wen-Chung's piece despite its bird-calls aflight and fragmented lines.

cal poetic form developed by the troubadours in the 11-12th centuries, knew exactly what she was about when she applied this circular structure to music.

She achieved what she was after, "a rather positive staticism" she calls it, however contradictory this term may sound at first in application to the temporal art of music, by grouping 12 traditional instruments (violin, viola, cello, contrabass, flute, trumpet, trombones, guitar, harpsichord, and various percussion) in four ensembles which work independently yet manage to merge their colors in extended, sensitively mixed textures and lines.

Here is an elegant piece, suggestive, imaginative, and quite beautiful. Immediately accessible, it demonstrated as perhaps no other work in the entire week that the new language can reach out in traditional terms, it can speak directly to the sensibilities of the listener. No wonder it was greeted with thunderous applause.

Another commissioned work was Richard Felciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," a very emphatic composition for 12 instruments and electronics, with the composer at the tape console. This is an elegy for a young Greek composer who was killed before his creative promise could be fulfilled. It is a lucid and meaningful mixture of non-pitched elements with some huge climaxes, achieved by maximal sound densities. There permeates an electronic wail as befits a lament, accessed by instrumental accents — some harmonics and avant-garde bits seemed needless — and quite programmatic.

One must mention the amazing proficiency of the young professionals, all students at the Berkshire Music Center, who as soloists or in ensembles played this music under student conductors with as few as two to four rehearsals, with amazing elan, know-how, and empathy. It would be quite unfair to single out any one, although there were differences, of course, particularly among the conductors, none of whom impressed me in a very special way. But these youngsters — and they seem to be getting younger every year — are amazing in that they can handle anything a composer puts before them, right down to the aleatory demands almost every composer makes on them as well.

★ ★ ★

There were other compositions, making up the four programs of around two hours each, and it would take miles of words to describe, annotate, explain them all.

One disappointment to me was the opening work, "Anaklasis" (1960), by Krzysztof Panderecki, which, despite its orientalism and bell sounds, seemed opaque.

George Crumb's Pulitzer-award winning "Echoes of Time and the River" (1967), on the other hand, proved rewardingly vaporous with its gimmickry, especially as it was splendidly performed.

GUNTHER SCHULLER
Arranged the programs

On the other hand, the concluding work of the week was Edgard Varese's "Integrales," composed in the comparative antiquity of 1925. With its 11 wind and 17 percussion instruments divided among 4 players, the piece remains a monstrosity — and a perfectly marvelous monstrosity at that. It is still avant-garde, 45 years later, in that it completely breaks with the past. This exploration in sonorities, "organized sound" he termed it, remains of immense impact. It may even set your teeth on edge, but showed what can be done with traditional instruments in a completely new way.

★ ★ ★

Gunther Schuller, who shared artistic responsibilities with Seiji Ozawa this summer, midwifed the entire proceedings with his usual musical insights and astounding energy. It was most appropriate that Schuller should receive during these concerts the previously announced Columbia University's Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award for 1970 for noteworthy attention to the music of 20th-century American composers.

It would be presumptuous for me to claim that I understood it all with equal ease and comfort. I did not, but I was fascinated more perhaps than in past seasons with the various attempts by composers to go ahead, to experiment, to explore, to pay in the realm of sound.

What is the new language? There isn't any one language, but multiples, individualized personal, tentative, seeking, testing, perhaps even a bit insecure as old traditions and values disappear and new, valid ones have not yet emerged in their place.

★ ★ ★

Another novelty — and I do consider it as such — was a very successful piece by Mario Davidovsky, who has been around for some time in the electronic music category. His "Synchronisms No. 6 for Piano and Electronic Sound" turned out to be an excellently integrated work between what almost sounded like equal partners. The electronic voice seemed humanized and, as such, in perfect dialogue with the piano, which was played with great aplomb by Robert Miller of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, for whom it was composed.

One of the commissioned works, and a fantastically ingratiating work it turned out to be, was "Trobar Clus" by Barbara Kolb. This young lady, making use of a Proven-

Two old-timers in the world of composition also appeared on the programs and with reason. There was Aaron Copland's Nonet for Strings, one of his first pieces with a 12-tone series, written in 1960. It proved that Copland knows his craft, as if there ever was any doubt about it, but also that whatever system he selects, it remains Copland — post-romantic and delightful, but hardly avant-garde.

But it is a serious endeavor, with very little put-on or put-down, and where else but in Tanglewood and on this occasion can we find such a high-minded and successful festival that throws the spotlight on what's happening now in music? Not that all of it can be successful — it never is, but it is challenging, often surprising, at times very rewarding.

One learns a new language only by using it.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492
AUG 30 1970

MONITOR
CONCORD, N. H.
(E) 13,361
MAR 11 1970
New England Newsclip

Rock Music Described As 'Protest'

"Rock" is a sociological protest movement rather than a musical development, the president of New England Conservatory, Boston, told an audience of about 200 persons Monday night at the Unitarian Church.

Gunther Schuller, "Third Stream Music" composer, and successor to Aaron Copeland as professor of composition at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., gave the first address in a lecture series being made possible by a fund set up as a memorial to the late Atty. Atlee F. Zellers.

As for rock, he said, 85 per cent of it is bad, but, he added, the message is the important thing. And 85 per cent of all the music ever composed has been, or is, bad. Today, rock composers are becoming "creative and interesting," and what is good will remain. Rock today, he said, is where jazz was in 1917.

Schuller traced the history of 20th Century music, stating that "contemporary" began in 1910, before which melody was the most important element, and harmony and rhythm were second. At this time, he said, the new freedom began, and composers began to choose their own forms — without designated key, and with changing rhythms throughout a composition.

The break with tradition, Gunther said, has now become "radical," with music more complex for both audiences and musicians. He spoke of electronic music, the development of new instruments and "new sound," He included among the derivations of jazz, soul music, gospel, rock, folk music and "phoney commercial folk."

The composer gave illustrations of the development of modern music, beginning with a recording of a Schoenberg composition of 1908. He described himself musically as "hybrid," as he played recordings of some of his own compositions, indicating that he represented a middle position in contemporary music, halfway between the 12-tone technique of Schoenberg and the neo-classicism of Stravinsky.

Schuller, who is artistic director of Tanglewood, is the founder of the Jazz and Classical Music Association, in which he hoped to bring together both performers and composers of jazz and classic music in a "Third Stream." He plays the French horn, and has performed with the Cincinnati Symphony and the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and has been a guest conductor of a number of symphony orchestras in the United States.

Last Week at Tanglewood

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — From Week at Tanglewood in the Berkshires began auspiciously last night when the festival's artistic director Gunther Schuller led the Music Center Orchestra and Chorus through one world and two U.S. premiere performances of contemporary music.

Coming during the last week in Tanglewood's season, Fromm Week accents music which is being performed today, and always with interesting results. Critics and music patrons, generally inundated by a plethora of Beethoven (six solid concerts this festival alone) took advantage of the pace change to sample a less familiar kind of music.

As a stimulus to new music, the Berkshire Music Center and Fromm Music Foundation commissioned works by young composers who are on the brink o establishing themselves. Because of the importance of the commission, Schuller and his directors must choose wisely. They did so Sunday night.

First Nighter

Tonight Tanglewood audiences will hear a world premiere of a work commissioned from Barbara Kolb, Hartford born composer.

Highlighting Sunday night's program was a world premiere "Voices" by Olly Wilson. The piece is basically an exercise of diverse timbral combinations which open with simple statements and become more complex, rising to a final tutti climax. The piece generated great tension, never relaxing — in this sense lacking variety, unless, however, this was the composer's intention.

"Il Canto Sospeso" by Luigi Nono, which is a contata on letters written by European resistance fighters condemned to death, had a U.S. premiere only slightly marred by pitch and metric difficulties in the chorus. The work is an especially difficult one; in fact, very renowned for its challenging choral writing. Soloists Elsa Charleston and Pamela Gore provided the finest performances in the piece.

Also on the program were "Anaklasis" by Penderecki, a U.S. premiere, and "Echoes Of Time and The River" by George Crumb.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 20 1970
New England Newsclip

Kolb Work Modern, Yet Lyrical

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — Critics who scorn contemporary music for its apparent lack of stylized unity, lyricism and emotional content should have heard Monday's program performed by the Berkshire Music Center students at Tanglewood.

Of the six pieces played two were world premieres, the rest were written after 1967, and all incompassed the variety of instruments in unorthodox groupings that are becoming familiar to today's atonal music.

They were "contemporary," with the exception of the opening piece, Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens useque ad morten," which presented brass and percussion choirs in mathematically contrived and seemingly constipated objection to each other, all possessed hallmarks of beauty.

Hartford-born composer Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" emerged from recent (and considerable) re-working by her to become the most lyrical piece played. The gentle sounds rose from groups of strings, percussion, electronic harpsichord and brass, passing from one to another with a natural fluidity interrupted occasionally by jazz statements and solo speeches by the instruments. Soft guitar arpeggios over a rising flute and vibraharp reminded one of Caribbean nights. Sensuous entwinings of brass and strings absorbed the gentler tones then pushed for a forte climax and warm reception from the audience.

Mario Davidovsky wrote "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound" for Robert Miller, a member of the BMC faculty this summer, and pianist Monday night. One-word description of the new work is "romantic," an adjective infrequently applied to this decade's music. Mr. Miller's pianist and concentration are commendable, especially when the other "musician" in Synchronisms was amplified tape.

Briefly, also performed with excellence by the students were John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen" (soprano Joan Heller's perfect pitch had her successfully sustaining quarter tones against two pianos, one tuned a quarter tone sharp), and George Wilson's "Concatenations."

The week of contemporary music continues with nightly concerts through Thursday.

Modern Composers Seek Out An Identity

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

"This music's least virtue is its length, of which there should be none!" came the whispered comment behind me. I recognized it as a garbled version of what the late Olin Downes of the New York Times had once written about a new Stravinsky work. I couldn't resist turning around to see who had offered the new dictum and lo and behold! — I admit it hesitatingly — I recognized a former student of mine.

The occasion was one of the four concerts in the Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood (August 16-20), under the direction of composer-conductor Gunther Schuller. It is a festival within the annual summer festival at the Berkshire Music Center, initiated in 1963, sponsored by both the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and the Fromm Music Foundation, headed by its president-founder, Paul Fromm of Chicago.

My former student, incidentally, was quite wrong in his comment, for most of the music heard was comparatively brief and to the point, except possibly Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I & II" (1969). Wuorinen's work was realized at the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center in New York, using the RCA Synthesizer which is "prejudiced by its design towards 12-tone equal temperament," later interlarded with analog-studio transformations.

★ ★ ★

You don't follow, you don't understand?

You are still not alone, although this sort of sound experimentation has been around for some time. But don't fall into the trap of not liking the music, not listening to it because it doesn't use the traditional language.

This particular piece, besides its structural problems and solutions, has little else to offer during 30 minutes of organ and bagpipe-like sounds surging from two loudspeakers, double stops, fluttering, panning of the sound, the echo-effects, and all that is actually already old hat.

In fact, many pieces, while using traditional instruments, were out to prove that untraditional sounds could be produced in a series of frankly mechanistic studies that tax the players.

For example, there were compositons for the flute, such as John Heiss' "Movements for Three Flutes" and Juerg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" — the least successful in this category — and the completely realized "Cursive," written in 1763 by Chou Wen-Chung who moved from civil engineering via architecture into music, using the new language of calligraphic curves and loops.

All these works made use of glissandos, microtonal trills, overblowing tapping of the keys, double stops, fluttering, and just about every avant-garde technique known. But to me at least, none seemed to make as much sense as did Chou Wen-Chung's piece despite its bird-calls aflight and fragmented lines.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,038 SUN. 200,192
AUG 30 1970

cal poetic form developed by the troubadours in the 11-12th centuries, knew exactly what she was about when she applied this circular structure to music.

She achieved what she was after, "a rather positive staticism" she calls it, however contradictory this term may sound at first in application to the temporal art of music, by grouping 12 traditional instruments (violin, viola, cello, contrabass, flute, trumpet, trombones, guitar, harpsichord, and various percussion) in four ensembles which work independently yet manage to merge their colors in extended, sensitively mixed textures and lines.

Here is an elegant piece, suggestive, imaginative, and quite beautiful. Immediately accessible, it demonstrated as perhaps no other work in the entire week that the new language can reach out in traditional terms, it can speak directly to the sensibilities of the listener. No wonder it was greeted with thunderous applause.

Another commissioned work was Richard Felciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," a very emphatic composition for 12 instruments and electronics, with the composer at the tape console. This is an elegy for a young Greek composer who was killed before his creative promise could be fulfilled. It is a lucid and meaningful mixture of non-pitched elements with some huge climaxes, achieved by maximal sound densities. There permeates an electronic wail as befits a lament, accessed by instrumental accents — some harmonics and avant-garde bits seemed needless — and quite programmatic.

One must mention the amazing proficiency of the young professionals, all students at the Berkshire Music Center, who as soloists or in ensembles played this music under student conductors with as few as two to four rehearsals, with amazing elan, know-how, and empathy. It would be quite unfair to single out any one, although there were differences, of course, particularly among the conductors, none of whom impressed me in a very special way. But these youngsters — and they seem to be getting younger every year — are amazing in that they can handle anything a composer puts before them, right down to the aleatory demands almost every composer makes on them as well.

★ ★ ★

There were other compositions, making up the four programs of around two hours each, and it would take miles of words to describe, annotate, explain them all.

One disappointment to me was the opening work, "Anaklasis" (1960), by Krzysztof Panderecki, which, despite its orientalism and bell sounds, seemed opaque.

George Crumb's Pulitzer-award winning "Echoes of Time and the River" (1967), on the other hand, proved rewardingly vaporous with its gimmickry, especially as it was splendidly performed.

GUNTHER SCHULLER
Arranged the programs

On the other hand, the concluding work of the week was Edgard Varese's "Integrales," composed in the comparative antiquity of 1925. With its 11 wind and 17 percussion instruments divided among 4 players, the piece remains a monstrosity — and a perfectly marvelous monstrosity at that. It is still avant-garde, 45 years later, in that it completely breaks with the past. This exploration in sonorities, "organized sound" he termed it, remains of immense impact. It may even set your teeth on edge, but showed what can be done with traditional instruments in a completely new way.

★ ★ ★

Gunther Schuller, who shared artistic responsibilities with Seiji Ozawa this summer, midwifed the entire proceedings with his usual musical insights and astounding energy. It was most appropriate that Schuller should receive during these concerts the previously announced Columbia University's Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award for 1970 for noteworthy attention to the music of 20th-century American composers.

It would be presumptuous for me to claim that I understood it all with equal ease and comfort. I did not, but I was fascinated more perhaps than in past seasons with the various attempts by composers to go ahead, to experiment, to explore, to pay in the realm of sound.

What is the new language? There isn't any one language, but multiples, individualized personal, tentative, seeking, testing, perhaps even a bit insecure as old traditions and values disappear and new, valid ones have not yet emerged in their place.

MONITOR
CONCORD, N. H.
(E) 13,291
MAR 11 1970
New England Newsclip

★ ★ ★

Another novelty — and I do consider it as such — was a very successful piece by Mario Davidovsky, who has been around for some time in the electronic music category. His "Synchronisms No. 6 for Piano and Electronic Sound" turned out to be an excellently integrated work between what almost sounded like equal partners. The electronic voice seemed humanized and, as such, in perfect dialogue with the piano, which was played with great aplomb by Robert Miller of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, for whom it was composed.

One of the commissioned works, and a fantastically ingratiating work it turned out to be, was "Trobar Clus" by Barbara Kolb. This young lady, making use of a Proven-

Two old-timers in the world of composition also appeared on the programs and with reason. There was Aaron Copland's Nonet for Strings, one of his first pieces with a 12-tone series, written in 1960. It proved that Copland knows his craft, as if there ever was any doubt about it, but also that whatever system he selects, it remains Copland — post-romantic and delightful, but hardly avant-garde.

But it is a serious endeavor, with very little put-on or put-down, and where else but in Tanglewood and on this occasion can we find such a high-minded and successful festival that throws the spotlight on what's happening now in music? Not that all of it can be successful — it never is, but it is challenging, often surprising, at times very rewarding.

One learns a new language only by using it.

Rock Music Described As 'Protest'

"Rock" is a sociological protest movement rather than a musical development, the president of New England Conservatory, Boston, told an audience of about 200 persons Monday night at the Unitarian Church.

Gunther Schuller, "Third Stream Music" composer, and successor to Aaron Copeland as professor of composition at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., gave the first address in a lecture series being made possible by a fund set up as a memorial to the late Atty. Atlee F. Zellers.

As for rock, he said, 85 per cent of it is bad, but, he added, the message is the important thing. And 85 per cent of all the music ever composed has been, or is, bad. Today, rock composers are becoming "creative and interesting," and what is good will remain. Rock today, he said, is where jazz was in 1917.

Schuller traced the history of 20th Century music, stating that "contemporary" began in 1910, before which melody was the most important element, and harmony and rhythm were second. At this time, he said, the new freedom began, and composers began to choose their own forms — without designated key, and with changing rhythms throughout a composition.

The break with tradition, Gunther said, has now become "radical," with music more complex for both audiences and musicians. He spoke of electronic music, the development of new instruments and "new sound," He included among the derivations of jazz, soul music, gospel, rock, folk music and "phoney commercial folk."

The composer gave illustrations of the development of modern music, beginning with a recording of a Schoenberg composition of 1908. He described himself musically as "hybrid," as he played recordings of some of his own compositions, indicating that he represented a middle position in contemporary music, halfway between the 12-tone technique of Schoenberg and the neo-classicism of Stravinsky.

Schuller, who is artistic director of Tanglewood, is the founder of the Jazz and Classical Music Association, in which he hoped to bring together both performers and composers of jazz and classic music in a "Third Stream." He plays the French horn, and has performed with the Cincinnati Symphony and the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and has been a guest conductor of a number of symphony orchestras in the United States.

Last Week at Tanglewood

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — From Week at Tanglewood in the Berkshires began auspiciously last night when the festival's artistic director Gunther Schuller led the Music Center Orchestra and Chorus through one world and two U.S. premiere performances of contemporary music.

Coming during the last week in Tanglewood's season, Fromm Week accents music which is being performed today, and always with interesting results. Critics and music patrons, generally inundated by a plethora of Beethoven (six solid concerts this festival alone) took advantage of the pace change to sample a less familiar kind of music.

As a stimulus to new music, the Berkshire Music Center and Fromm Music Foundation commissioned works by young composers who are on the brink o establishing themselves. Because of the importance of the commission, Schuller and his directors must choose wisely. They did so Sunday night.

First Nighter

Tonight Tanglewood audiences will hear a world premiere of a work commissioned from Barbara Kolb, Hartford born composer.

Highlighting Sunday night's program was a world premiere "Voices" by Olly Wilson. The piece is basically an exercise of diverse timbral combinations which open with simple statements and become more complex, rising to a final tutti climax. The piece generated great tension, never relaxing — in this sense lacking variety, unless, however, this was the composer's intention.

"Il Canto Sospeso" by Luigi Nono, which is a contata on letters written by European resistance fighters condemned to death, had a U.S. premiere only slightly marred by pitch and metric difficulties in the chorus. The work is an especially difficult one; in fact, very renowned for its challenging choral writing. Soloists Elsa Charleston and Pamela Gore provided the finest performances in the piece.

Also on the program were "Anaklasis" by Penderecki, a U.S. premiere, and "Echoes Of Time and The River" by George Crumb.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 20 1970
New England Newsclip

Kolb Work Modern, Yet Lyrical

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — Critics who scorn contemporary music for its apparent lack of stylized unity, lyricism and emotional content should have heard Monday's program performed by the Berkshire Music Center students at Tanglewood.

Of the six pieces played two were world premieres, the rest were written after 1967, and all incompassed the variety of instruments in unorthodox groupings that are becoming familiar to today's atonal music.

They were "contemporary," with the exception of the opening piece, Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens useque ad morten," which presented brass and percussion choirs in mathematically contrived and seemingly constipated objection to each other, all possessed hallmarks of beauty.

Hartford-born composer Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" emerged from recent (and considerable) re-working by her to become the most lyrical piece played. The gentle sounds rose from groups of strings, percussion, electronic harpsichord and brass, passing from one to another with a natural fluidity interrupted occasionally by jazz statements and solo speeches by the instruments. Soft guitar arpeggios over a rising flute and vibraharp reminded one of Caribbean nights. Sensuous entwinings of brass and strings absorbed the gentler tones then pushed for a forte climax and warm reception from the audience.

Mario Davidovsky wrote "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound" for Robert Miller, a member of the BMC faculty this summer, and pianist Monday night. One-word description of the new work is "romantic," an adjective infrequently applied to this decade's music. Mr. Miller's pianist and concentration are commendable, especially when the other "musician" in Synchronisms was amplified tape.

Briefly, also performed with excellence by the students were John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen" (soprano Joan Heller's perfect pitch had her successfully sustaining quarter tones against two pianos, one tuned a quarter tone sharp), and George Wilson's "Concatenations."

The week of contemporary music continues with nightly concerts through Thursday.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,859

New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 18 1970 New England Newsclip

Schoenberg's Music at Tanglewood

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

LENOX,—Arnold Schoenberg once remarked that the trouble with his music was not that it was difficult but that it was badly performed. His statement was not entirely a joke and its truth is borne out, in a very positive sense, by Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music, which opened Sunday night and concludes this Thursday.

THERE IS NO getting away from the fact that some of the music performed at the festival is exceedingly difficult—difficult for the performers who are sometimes asked too deal with staggering problems of coordination, and for the listener, who is sometimes given very little in the way of traditional or easily recognized organizational patterns.

What distinguishes the festival is a vibrancy and commitment one seldom encounters in the performance of contemporary music. How accurately the music is played this listener cannot say, but it would seem reasonable to assume that the level of execution is quite high, by relative standards at least.

THE MUSIC RECEIVES weeks of loving preparation—not ordinarily feasible or even possible with professional orchestras—and it is played by a group of impressively talented young people—fellowship members of the Berkshire Music Center—who have not yet acquired the cynical attitide of their elders toward new music.

The net result is that one hears the music in the kind of fresh, vital context that make its difficulties a thing worth coping with.

Sunday night's opening concert was a program of orchestral music conducted by Gunther Schuller, which included two U.S. first performances and one world premiere. For this listener the most impressive work of the eveing was Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso" ("The Suspended Song"), for vocal soloists, chorus and orchestra, to a text based on the final letters of condemned World War II resistance fighters.

IN NINE MOVEMENTS, the work makes use of chora/ polyphonic techniques in whic works, or even syllables, reac their conclusion only after passing successively through several sections of the chorus. With this kind of treatment the text itself tends to become unintelligible, and the listener is forced to rely on its visual reproduction.

Musically, the sense of the words is projected most forcefully by means of Nono's extraordinarily sensitive and dramatic orchestral commentary, rather than by soloists and chorus, who, though given the most heartrending utterances, sing as though disembodied, ethereal beings. The effect is strangely disquieting and moving, as though one were hearing a message from the dead, which was in fact the case with the recipients of the letters.

KRZYSZTOF PENDERECKI'S "Anaklasis," a work for strings and percussion, dates from 1960 and is one of this composer's first mature works involving the extensive use of exotic string effects which has come to be regarded as a hallmark of his style.

The program notes referred to "Anaklasis" as presenting "one aspect of contemporary avant-garde thinking in its original and pristine form," which stands as an accurate summary—especially for those to who Penderecki's later work seems repetitious and, to an extent, factitious.

Of the program's two remaining works—Olly Wilson's "Voices" and George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River"—there is a great deal to be said, which space does not permit in the present article. This writer would like to pay tribute here to the consummate craftsmanship of the orchestral writing in both works.

The delicacy and imaginativeness of the scoring invested the music with an immediacy and appeal that is too often lacking in works of comparable intellectual content.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 82,185 (S) 170,976

AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Fromm festival

Firsts at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

On Sunday evening at Tanglewood, Beethoven gave way to music none of which was composed more than 14 years ago. The crowds that had filled the Shed and covered the lawns in the afternoon were replaced by a smaller group, interested in the "now" music, which nevertheless occupied most of the Theater-Concert Hall. This was the beginning of the annual Festival of Contemporary Music, begun in 1963, and sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

Four works, of which two were United States premieres (Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis," and Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso"), one a first performance anywhere of a piece commissioned for the festival (Olly Wilson's "Voices"), and George Crumb's Pulitzer-Prize-winning "Echoes of Time and the River," made up the opening program, conducted by Gunther Schuller. During an intermission, he, in turn, was presented on behalf of the trustees of Columbia University, with the Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award for 1970 — a citation for service to American music, and a check for $1,000.

With the exception of the Crumb style which is becoming familiar, one must rely on first impressions of what essentially seems to be a restricted scope of musical means, prodigally used, in the new works. There are the slithering strings, whispered and breathy sounds, percussion in multiple aspects, the voice as an instrument, solo or en masse, and a somewhat labored effort to include everything within reach (i.e. hand claps, knocks on wood, etc.) to fill out the sonic spectrum. No harm in enlarging it, of course, but preoccupation with the means, as intriguing as it may be for craftsmen, frequently leads composition and audience nowhere.

Exhibit A was the Penderecki "Anaklasis," composed in 1960 and already something of a much-imitated and expanded museum piece, where effects are concerned. Handsomely played by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra (as indeed all of the program was), "Anaklasis" filled its stated refractive function, if little else.

In "Voices," Mr. Wilson has written a strong, rhythmically bracing blockbuster, employing many of the ingredients now in favor, but with a difference that indicates an individual style and a discerning taste. There are excesses, and a few surprises (were those the anvils of Nibelheim?), but "Voices" is rewarding as a recognizable entity, with some rattling good percussion passages to boot.

Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso," settings for vocal soloists and chorus of letters of condemned World War II resistance fighters, interspersed with orchestral interludes, was composed in 1956. As befits its subject matter, it is sparse and bleak and extenuated with an almost tensile thread of lyricism to bind the horror and pathos of the words to the underlying orchestral texture. The text, in Italian, has not been made easily comprehensible by the composer, although Sunday's soloists—soprano Elsa Charlston, contralto Pamela Gore, tenor Manuel Melendez, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus—did what they could, admirably, to convey meaning. However, high purpose would seem to have been defeated by mechanics of composition.

Mr. Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," an extension of his earlier "Eleven Echoes of Autumn 1965," a simpler and more effective piece in the same idiom, achieves its ends with a great deal of use of the stage-managerial trappings of the "now" music — parading musicians (if slightly sheepishly), thumping on instruments, winds played into pianos' innards, chanting, whispering, shouting, and whistling (Crumb asks for 40 orchestral musicians to intone perfect fourths). These "Echoes," albeit oxerextended, still bear the marks of compositional originality and audience availability, despite the parade of chic effects, but if ever a piece ought to be played in-the-round, instead of on a concert platform, this is it.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Modern Music Given at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — This is the eighth consecutive summer in which the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago have sponsored a festival of contemporary music.

The festivals have provided a forum for new ideas, helped to nurture the creative mind, and kept the life stream of music alive.

Music Review

Since success is not commensurate, apparently, with quality, the above goals have been met in four concerts during the past week. The programs were given in the Theater-Concert Hall. The Boston Symphony holds forth "across the campus" in the music shed.

No shed audience, no matter how huge, could surpass the comparative tiny group of contemporary music devotess for rapt attention and blunt judgement.

In most cases the contemporary composers were on hand to take the credit or the blame.

Charles Wuorinen was not present Thursday night for his tape recorded "Time's Encomium I and II." It was a full half-hour of nightmarish sounds ranging from piercing squeals to cavernous blasts.

The whole mess was dished out in semidarkness. A few persons left. The rest were determined to weather it. There was a light sprinkling of applause. It made you wonder whether the applause was for performers — all of it immensely deserved — or if it was an expression of relief over the merciful end.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT

Nonet for Strings	Copeland
Reflexionen	Reimann
Paraphrase	Wyttenbach
Seven Profiles for String Quartet	Thimmig
Lamentations for Jani Christou	Feliciano

THURSDAY NIGHT

Five Miniatures for Clarinet and Cello	Bezanson
Time's Encomium I and II	Wuorinen
Cursive	Wen-Chung
Integrales	Varese

Work Stands Out

Most of the music played on Wednesday and Thursday nights was shocking, gross, virulent and offensive to the conventional ear.

Because the objective was to achieve new spectrums of sound, one can only conclude that the composers were ingenious, imaginative, courageous, sincere — and successful.

One of the most credible was Philip Bezanson's "Five Miniatures for Clarinet and Cello." The 54-year-old composer from Athol combined independent melodies that merged and made sense in communion. There was emotion, freshness and locomotion to this music.

Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou" (a young Greek composer killed in an automobile accident) was commissioned by the sponsors and world-premiered.

It permitted no boredom. Strings, winds and percussion (12 in all) hurled out fascinating sounds — clangor, siestas of quiet, recurring blasts, with the composer running a tape recorder to spice the mixtures.

Much too long for its own good was Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings." Early in the piece Copland established an emotional mood (in spite of perpetually present alien tones), and kept the thing alive with approaches and recessions of tension. But soon the embers of good ideas just went on smoldering.

Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen" would engage the interest of a sound technician. Beyond that, nothing.

It's a historical fact that about ninety percent of new music eventually winds up in the dustbin. The past week's festival indicates that the percentage of fade-outs is on the increase.

Of course, it will take time to prove it.

Music at Tanglewood

Festival of Contemporary

By HARRY NEVILLE

LENOX — Writing about last year's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, thi swriter noted at the time the extraordinarily attracive quality of the opening night orchestral program. On the festival's three succeeding evenings, a total of between 15 and 20 chamber works was performed and yet, with the exception of a masterful piece of Claudio Spies, not one of those works seemed to achieve the distinguished level of ethe initial evening.

only the first two concerts of this year's festival, but the story is pretty much the same as with last year: brilliantly crafted and vividly conceived orchestral works followed by chamber works which, by and large, conveyed not a great deal more than the composers' rather glum determination, to structure a certain amount of time.

Of the chamber works played last Monday night only two, it seemed to this listener, displayed the workings of keen musical imaginations. Mario Davidovsky's "Synchromisms No. 6 for Piano and Electronic Sound" is an absorbing exploration of the sonic possibilities of conventional and electronic sounds, while "Movements for Three Flutes," by John Heiss, is a work of great charm and delicacy that would seem to exhaust the dimbral possibilities of those instruments.

As for the rest of the works, the best that can be said is tha some displayed at least th ecomposer's knowledge of instrumental resources. Others showed a lack even of that elementary expertise.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 17 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Contemporary Music Festival

THE SEVENTH FESTIVAL of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation started last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, directing the Berkshire Music Center orchestra.

The program consisted of four compositions dating from 1956 to this year. The oldest was Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso" (The Interrupted Song). This was the composer's transcription into music of a series of letters written by European Resistance fighters condemned to death, many being the last communications to dear ones permitted by the prison officials.

Nono uses an orchestra and a chorus in various sonority combinations and is successful to a degree in his purpose. His choice of texture is ingenious and, at times, effective. The greatest indictment that may be made is one of unemployment. The strings are not called upon for long stretches and are only asked to pluck an ineffective note at the top of their fingerboard or slide a finger along a string, touching it but weakly.

On the credit side are some groups of brass simultaneously playing half-steps in an ascending idiom, which conveyed to some of us, at least, the sense of anguish the composer obviously wished to express. Mr. Schuller worked very hard to get the chorus to maintain an undeviating sustained note in unison, which could well have been wails of lamentation.

* * *

KRZYSZTOF Penderecki's "Anaklasis" dates from 1960 and had not been played in this country previously. The term refers to a deflection of accoustical sounds. It employs quarter tones, and each string player has an individual assignment. There is amusement watching the various methods of disturbing the air waves.

Having failed to make notes on the spot and retaining imperfect attributions, there is confusion as to who did what and where. However, either in the Penderecki, or George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River" (1967) or in Olly Wilson's "Voices" (1970), this last a commission by the Center and the Fromm Foundation, air without sound was blown through a dozen wind instruments, viols were tapped delicately on the back and front, and the players instructed to whisper strongly, in one case shout, clap hands and resort to many devices to avoid using the skills for which their training had prepared them.

* * *

IT BECOMES a moot point to ask by what criteria these serious efforts should be evaluated. Nono's chorus may be an artistic descendant of "Wozzeck" and there are other points of departure audible, but it is difficult to measure any fresh thinking and novel inspiration against the traditions of the past. Paul Fromm's foundation has made it possible for many composers to write and be heard. Many otherwise would be neglected and ignored.

There are possibly two benchmarks by which avant-garde music may be measured, expressiveness and methods. If the composer is merely making explorations in sound, then the technique of writing deserves careful attention. If there is a message of a literary background, there is another kind of reception necessary. A large audience remained throughout the long evening and had the opportunity of conveying their enthusiastic approval to two of the composers present in person, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Crumb.

* * *

AFTER THE intermission, Otto Luening of the Columbia University School of Music stepped to the stage, representing Andrew Cordier, president of the college, to present to Mr. Schuller the 1970 Alice M. Ditson conductor's award. Luening read the deservedly flattering citation and also handed to Mr. Schuller the $1,000 check which accompanies the award.—J.C.R.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Fest Review

Copland's 'Nonet' Under the Baton

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE THIRD PROGRAM of contemporary music being presented at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation started last night with Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings." Copland, born in 1900, is the oldest composer — with the exception of Varese, who will be played tonight — whose music is being heard in this miniature festival. However, the "Nonet" was written only in 1960, and thus postdates some of the music of younger men on the program.

Copland wrote his "Nonet" for three each of violins, violas and cellos. The sonority is rich and lavish. One might say this is his "Verklaerte Nacht." Furthermore, Copland's talent to write for instruments stood out against all the other exhibits during the evening. The others seemed to be seeking to extend the limits of the potential of the respective instruments, not an unfavorable goal to be sure, but in so doing, they avoided their normal capacities.

For instance, in Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" for flute and piano, the composer distinctly makes the flute sound "Pfui." In this latter duet, the flutist doubles on bass flute, and the pianist on electric organ. In the final section, it becomes "increasingly aleatoric, hectic and chaotic, with the flutist reaching a climax of physical exhaustion and the pianist's activities uncontrolled."

* * *

COPLAND'S "Nonet" was well conducted by Paul Zukofsky.

Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen" is for seven instruments, strings, reeds and harpsichord and was conducted by Tibor Pusztai. However, the work is so impoverished that it is not evident why it should be conducted at all. The violinist from her chair could easily indicate the various semaphoric signs. Regardless of the message Reimann may have had in mind, he just did not employ the instruments with adequate insight.

* * *

"SEVEN PROFILES" for string quartet by Leslie Thimmig are miniatures, no one exceeding a minute in duration. Obviously patterned on the Webern "Five Pieces," their difficulty of execution defeats them to start. To achieve coordination was in itself a victory.

* * *

RICHARD FELCIANO'S "Lamentations for Jani Christou" uses a dozen instruments in an elegy for a young Greek composer, who died before the promise of his imaginative mind and sensitive spirit could be fulfilled. The composer resorted to excesses in his purpose of expressivity. Kotaro Sato's baton technic was the most professional of the evening. However, the monotonous and invariable use of harmonics in the piece — plucked strings and "col legno," striking the strings and even the tail-piece with the wood of the bow — needs clarification, whether it is for sound effect or an expressive medium.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Fest Review

Variations on Chamber Music

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SECOND program of the Festival of Contemporary Music being presented in the Theatre-Concert Hall by the Berkshire Music Center of Tanglewood in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, consisted of chamber music. In this instance the term ranged from a remarkable performance of a "Synchronism" by Mario Davidovsky for piano, played brilliantly by Robert Miller, and electronic sound, to three compositions for various groupings of 12 instruments.

There was rewarding novelty during the evening but also some pointless efforts at change for change's sake. The "Obediens usque and mortem" of Jean-Etienne Marie for 12 brass instruments informed a stochastic method of composition. The program notes described this as "music based on mathematical formulae"; the dictionary, as something "arrived at by conjecture, random or aim." This is an example of music getting involved more in words than in sounds. Yet, it was unique even if not "very unique." As the program denoted, "a mathematical rigor of composition and an acoustical treatment of traditional instrumental ensemble."

* * *

"TROBAR CLUS," described by its composer, Barbara Kolb, as a "Provencal poetic form developed by the Troubadors" in the 11th and 12th century, was much more kind to one's ears and seeks appreciation by grace rather than by the preceding overpowering assault. Miss Kolb allows moments of aleatoric (catch-as-catch-can) improvisation, to the dozen musicians. She requires strings, wind, percussion, guitar and harpsichord, a process in which the talented performers could doodle musically in a pleasing and instructive style. This was enjoyable without rhetorical problems.

* * *

"MOVEMENTS FOR THREE FLUTES" by John Heiss was pretentious. It purports to present novel sounds by the instruments. They were not always patent unless what sounded like three persons pitting drupes may be so considered. "Lines for the Fallen" by Donald Lybbert for two pianos "with the micro-tones fixed by the tuning" and with a singer "able to make quarter-tone differentiations" asks for a receptive apparatus of which these ears were not capable. Yet there was a coherence, even if the poem taken from the "Mass for the Dead" by William Blake was not clearly enunciated.

George Wilson's "Concatenations" was an attempt to present a theme by 12 instruments in many conceivable distortions, but this is not exactly an exploration into virgin musical territory. Music has been written for centuries with the subject repeated in reverse, retrograde, mirrored, cancrizans, but it is not justifiable per se unless it is interesting on grounds other than as an exercise. One might question the advisability of opposing a muted string against a full-blown trumpet or clarinet. These examples of midnight oil which smell of the laboratory are not convincing. However, the evening provided adequate amends to atone for some of the drier spells.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 21 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Fest Review

Pioneers in Sound

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FINAL CONCERT of the Contemporary Music Festival sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation was played last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. For the concluding work of the evening, musical archaeologists went way back to 1926 to revive "Integrales" of Edgard Varese (1883-1965), one of the pioneers in sound of his day and a man whose prophetic vision foresaw the direction that music of decades later would take. This does not preclude opposition nor prove that his vision was veridical.

Eleven wind instruments are required for the piece and 17 percussion instruments played by four executants. Repetitions are varied by the use of unequal metrical units, and the thematic material is scattered like shrapnel.

Varese lived the last 50 of his 82 years in the United States and was always the darling of an inner circle from which he has made little progress in escaping. The performance was necessarily intensely crude, and the conducting, by Michael Thomas, extremely vehement.

"CURSIVE" by Chou Wen-Chung is for flute and piano. "Cursive," in this instance, is explained as "a type of script in which the joined strokes and rounded angles result in expressive and contrasting curves and loops." It was not easy to discern such qualifications in the performance. Indeed, the flute made long but sure leaps like a chamois. The pianist spent some of his time away from the keyboard groping within the entrails of the instrument so that any coherence seemed more digressive than valid.

My "Emily Post" does not suggest proper behavior at a performance of music by other than human means. Not only were the lights in the house lowered, but also those on the stage for the purely electronic "Time's Enconium I and II", Charles Wuorinen. Common courtesy, of course, imposes consideration of one's neighbors at home or in a theatre. Yet must one sit in attitudes of respect, or may he doze, sleep, walk around the aisles? Must he give his total attention to the speaker-boxes as though they were live performers? Should one applaud an empty stage? Should a person moderately secure mentally be able to sit quietly under such circumstances for 30 minutes?

* * *

THE FOUR CONCERTS the Fromm Foundation provided are but one facet of its continuing encouragement and support of our best talented and trained musical minds. The cooperation proffered by the Berkshire Music Center, of which the president, Gunther Schuller, makes such a major contribution to this project, is an ideal and forward-looking effort. The audiences, consistently large, have been obviously appreciative and sympathetic to the trends shown in the concerts, and all concerned have a right to feel deeply justified in the labor and trials and achievements of the week.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, AUGUST 30, 1970

Music

A Cross-Country Week of Music—Then, What Do You Play Again?

By Thomas Willis

● LENOX, Mass. — The longer I stay in the music reviewing business, the more important becomes the question "Do I want to hear it again?" That pronoun "it" can have various antecedents, sonic or print-based, individual or collective, personal or abstract. The material involved may be as historic as a Renaissance puzzle canon or as immediate as a chancey contemporary experiment. It may pique my intellect, tickle my inner ear, or excite my easily Freudened psyche. It can affront me or bore me, crinkle my sense of fitness, or shake up my comfortable mental cushions. But the admittedly personal and highly egocentric question persists.

A long week of new music has just finished for me. Beginning with the Berio "Opera" premiere in Santa Fe, N. M., it took a jet-age stride to New England and the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Here at Tanglewood, still shaded by the Koussevitzky memory, the students and faculty have performed 19 contemporary works including four first performances and five American premieres. As this is being written, the festival has been over for four days. Free from a daily deadline, I am luxuriating on the veranda of Stephanie Barber's Wheatleigh, formerly the summer estate of a countess and a perfect off-season retreat for sybaritic reviewers. There is a cool breeze, a warm sun, and, from the parlor, the relaxed rambling noodling of a would-be pianist. . . .

Oh, yes. What would I like to hear again? Well, let's see. The Berio opera, certainly, altho it is most doubtful that any major company will ever repeat it. It is imaginative and conceptually interesting, but the reality is only occasionally absorbing. With costs as they are in opera houses and managers traditionally conservative, the chances of repeating a failure are few.

• • •

Of the new works at Tanglewood, Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clos" was the strongest magnet. The premiere took place last Monday on an impressive program which included the most effective music of the series. Miss Kolb's piece borrows its title from Provencal poetry, but there is little old fashioned or derivative in her music. It is a wordless poem, cyclic in construction and with six possible starting points.

During the initial performance, one only gradually became conscious of the work's skillful sense of balance. At times, the chamber ensemble seemed to be improvising, but the structure never sprawled. Now and then, the first-time listener became aware of organizational subtleties. But these never intruded.

A subsequent look at the score confirmed the initial impression. Miss Kolb is an exceptionally cunning manipulator of musical texture, as able to negotiate the intricacies of a palindromic tone as to find idiomatic timbers for her carefully selected group of strings, brass, percussion, and electric piano. But the importance of this work lies not in its construction but in its effect. On the basis of this one, hardly perfect performance, I would be willing to hear not only a repetition, but all six performance possibilities. The Chicago premiere already has been scheduled next season at the University of Chicago's annual Fromm concert.

There were several other works which belong on a "Deserved Repeated Hearing" list. Mario Davidovsky has been combining conventional instruments and tape syntheses for some time now, with varying degrees of success. His newest, "Synchronisms No. 6," teams the electronic generator with a live pianist. The interplay between the two sound sources is just short of adhesive. At times, the electronic sound seems to grow directly from the piano string. In other segments, the loudspeakers are polyphonic relatives of the live instrumentalist, engaging him in serial stereophonic composition. The composer does not overpower the soloist with high-volume levels and changing registration as so many of his colleagues have. With a soloist as capable as Robert Miller, the total experience becomes an exciting double display of virtuosity.

The favorite virtuoso instrument this year was not the piano, but the flute. To some extent, this fact mirrors the situation as it exists today. There are many fine, adventurous flutists around, and composers seem to enjoy working with a pure sound devoid of prominent overtones. But of the three works heard, only Chou Wen-Chung's 1963 "Cursive" resisted the temptation to exploit an overblown gimmickry. Mr. Chou builds his piece around a calligraphic brush stroke of sound which tapers off to a microtonal point. The total statement is at once severe and compelling.

• • •

Two other compositions demonstrated similarily idiomatic understanding of their performance media. Leslie Thimmig's Seven Profiles for String Quartet, composed earlier this year, took Webern's cameos as a point of departure for intricate constructions of sound and silence. Webern casts a long shadow, and Mr. Thimmig has just about made it to the penumbra, but that is certainly far enough to justify rehearing. The same should be said in favor of Philip Bezanson's Five Miniatures for Clarinet and Cello which uses familiar contrapuntal devices in ways particularly well suited to the contrasting instruments.

One cannot overlook Varese's flamboyant "Intergrales," altho Michael Tilson Thomas did not fare as well with students as he did with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at Ravinia earlier this summer. George Crumb's prize-winning "Echoes of Time and the River," familiar to Chicago Symphony goers, was presented here with most of its playful processions intact. Both its fun and its magic are untarnished by repetition.

So much for the works I want to rehear. There remains a set to be considered which might be called "Works I Should Want to Rehear." Foremost among these would be Luigi Nono's "11 Canto Sosteso," which was being sung and played for the first time in America under the direction of Gunther Schuller. Mr. Nono's European reputation is formidable. The "Canto," already in the history books, is a nine-movement setting of letters from condemned Resistance fighters. Its words are inspiring examples of simplicity and immediate emotional communication of a sense of finality. With more capable soloists and chorus, it is possible that the strongly intellectualized design might have carried beyond the pages of the score. As it was, Elsa Charlston's soprano bore the brunt of the complex, vocal message. By the end, listening had become not so much a bore as a chore.

• • •

After such a series as this it is always tempting to pontificate or prophesy. Getting one's music together with a series of convenient labels is a popular pastime for reviewers as well as composers. "Post serialism is dead," one might say, or, "Happenings have at last had it." Generalizing from Nono's—who could resist the pun—to Copland's equally no-no Nonet, one might conclude that young composers know better than their elders how to turn away from musical dead ends. But that sort of statement tells more about the critic than about the music. What is important, now as always, are the recognizable new friends in the aging musical crowd.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 150,616 SUN. C. 77,059

AUG 30 1970

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, right, talks with Paul Fromm, president of Fromm Foundation, which sponsored program on music criticism at Tanglewood, Mass.

Music Notes

Clarifying Critics' Role

By ELLIOTT W. GALKIN

E. M. Forster once said that criticism's central job seems to be education through precision." And Roger Sessions wrote that the music critic "is essentially the composer's collaborator."

The implications of both observations were certainly recognized during the recent Fromm Foundation Fellowship Program in Music Criticism which concluded last Sunday at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under the program, six critics, young in years and experience, were invited to Tanglewood. Their expenses were paid by the Fromm Foundation. Selected from a national group of candidates who were screened for writing ability and musical knowledge, the fellows in music criticism were subjected to a regimen of attendance at rehearsals and concerts of contemporary music, conferences with composers and performers and examination of their scores.

They were also assigned to write reviews of the performances, which were then analyzed and criticized in roundtable discussions among themselves as well as with five senior critics—Harold Schonberg, of the New York Times; Boris Nelson, of the Toledo Blade; Irving Lowens, of the Washington Evening Star; Thomas Willis, of the Chicago Tribune and this writer.

Amateur Sponsor

The program was made possible by the Fromm Foundation, whose president, Paul Fromm, a Chicago wine importer, also subsidizes the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music which takes place at Tanglewood each year.

During the Fromm Festival, about three dozen young performers and composers whose activities during the summer are supported by the foundation, present concerts of contemporary music. Much of it is being played for the first time and was commissioned for performance at Tanglewood.

Paul Fromm, born and educated in Germany, is a musical amateur of discernment and sophistication whose dedication to the cause of contemporary music is intense and whose commitment to its creation and performance is fervent. 'He has written, "I have a profound longing to live in a community where the significance of music is recognized as an integral part of cultural and intellectual life, where the sustenance and development of the music is a deeply-felt responsibility." To help achieve such objectives, and because he believes that the music critic's obligation to his readers is "to inform and educate," he created the summer program, the only one of its kind in the world.

Quickly, the sense of Fromm's responsibilities to the cause to today's music was reflected in the fellowship program's seminars and discussions. Quickly, too, it became apparent that the senior critics were concerned with the same fundamental considerations; each began, more or less, with the same basic questions.

Basic Question

"What is the nature and function of music criticism in the press? For whom is the critic writing? What is the relationship of the critic to the work of art? How can the critic find objective criteria for evaluation? Is it possible to reconcile loyalty to the cause of contemporary music, sympathy for its composers and performer and ruthless personal commitment to prejonceived standards of excellence?"

The discussions were uninhibited, animated and soul-searching. There was no doubt that each of the critics, young and old, deeply felt an obligation to the musical community of which he is part.

For the young composers and performers, the frank talks with the critics provided stimulating insights into the responsibilities of the music critic as a creative member of the musical community and, as a result, three developed a welcome sense of enthusiastic mutual appreciation.

For the young critics, the sessions were particularly self-revelatory. Some learned that they were incapable of reading the new, complicated scores with their novel notational systems; some were unable to understand or analyze the complex sounds which they heard. How could they describe or explain them let alone evaluate them for their readers?

For all participants, this was a program filled with opportunity for self examination and self renewal. It emphasized that the act of criticism is also one of creation a gesture of imagination, sympathy and skill, in which, as Paul Claudel has observed, the essence and implications of art may be restored in the form of intelligible words.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,021 SUN. 1,131,752

AUG 30 1970

Music

A Cross-Country Week of Music—Then, What Do You Play Again?

By Thomas Willis

● LENOX, Mass. — The longer I stay in the music reviewing business, the more important becomes the question "Do I want to hear it again?" That pronoun "it" can have various antecedents, sonic or print-based, individual or collective, personal or abstract. The material involved may be as historic as a Renaissance puzzle canon or as immediate as a chancey contemporary experiment. It may pique my intellect, tickle my inner ear, or excite my easily Freudened psyche. It can affront me or bore me, crinkle my sense of fitness, or shake up my comfortable mental cushions. But the admittedly personal and highly egocentric question persists.

A long week of new music has just finished for me. Beginning with the Berio "Opera" premiere in Santa Fe, N. M., it took a jet-age stride to New England and the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation. Here at Tanglewood, still shaded by the Koussevitzky memory, the students and faculty have performed 19 contemporary works including four first performances and five American premieres. As this is being written, the festival has been over for four days. Free from a daily deadline, I am luxuriating on the veranda of Stephanie Barber's Wheatleigh, formerly the summer estate of a countess and a perfect off-season retreat for sybaritic reviewers. There is a cool breeze, a warm sun, and, from the parlor, the relaxed rambling noodling of a would-be pianist. . . .

Oh, yes. What would I like to hear again? Well, let's see. The Berio opera, certainly, altho it is most doubtful that any major company will ever repeat it. It is imaginative and conceptually interesting, but the reality is only occasionally absorbing. With costs as they are in opera houses and managers traditionally conservative, the chances of repeating a failure are few.

● ● ●

Of the new works at Tanglewood, Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clos" was the strongest magnet. The premiere took place last Monday on an impressive program which included the most effective music of the series. Miss Kolb's piece borrows its title from Provencal poetry, but there is little old fashioned or derivative in her music. It is a wordless poem, cyclic in construction and with six possible starting points.

During the initial performance, one only gradually became conscious of the work's skillful sense of balance. At times, the chamber ensemble seemed to be improvising, but the structure never sprawled. Now and then, the first-time listener became aware of organizational subtleties. But these never intruded.

A subsequent look at the score confirmed the initial impression. Miss Kolb is an exceptionally cunning manipulator of musical texture, as able to negotiate the intricacies of a palindromic tone as to find idiomatic timbers for her carefully selected group of strings, brass, percussion, and electric piano. But the importance of this work lies not in its construction but in its effect. On the basis of this one, hardly perfect performance, I would be willing to hear not only a repetition, but all six performance possibilities. The Chicago premiere already has been scheduled next season at the University of Chicago's annual Fromm concert.

There were several other works which belong on a "Deserved Repeated Hearing" list. Mario Davidovsky has been combining conventional instruments and tape syntheses for some time now, with varying degrees of success. His newest, "Synchronisms No. 6," teams the electronic generator with a live pianist. The interplay between the two sound sources is just short of adhesive. At times, the electronic sound seems to grow directly from the piano string. In other segments, the loudspeakers are polyphonic relatives of the live instrumentalist, engaging him in serial stereophonic composition. The composer does not overpower the soloist with high-volume levels and changing registration as so many of his colleagues have. With a soloist as capable as Robert Miller, the total experience becomes an exciting double display of virtuosity.

The favorite virtuoso instrument this year was not the piano, but the flute. To some extent, this fact mirrors the situation as it exists today. There are many fine, adventurous flutists around, and composers seem to enjoy working with a pure sound devoid of prominent overtones. But of the three works heard, only Chou Wen-Chung's 1963 "Cursive" resisted the temptation to exploit an overblown gimmickry. Mr. Chou builds his piece around a calligraphic brush stroke of sound which tapers off to a microtonal point. The total statement is at once severe and compelling.

● ● ●

Two other compositions demonstrated similarily idiomatic understanding of their performance media. Leslie Thimmig's Seven Profiles for String Quartet, composed earlier this year, took Webern's cameos as a point of departure for intricate constructions of sound and silence. Webern casts a long shadow, and Mr. Thimmig has just about made it to the penumbra, but that is certainly far enough to justify rehearing. The same should be said in favor of Philip Bezanson's Five Miniatures for Clarinet and Cello which uses familiar contrapuntal devices in ways particularly well suited to the contrasting instruments.

One cannot overlook Varese's flamboyant "Intergrales," altho Michael Tilson Thomas did not fare as well with students as he did with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at Ravinia earlier this summer. George Crumb's prize-winning "Echoes of Time and the River," familiar to Chicago Symphony goers, was presented here with most of its playful processions intact. Both its fun and its magic are untarnished by repetition.

So much for the works I want to rehear. There remains a set to be considered which might be called "Works I Should Want to Rehear." Foremost among these would be Luigi Nono's "11 Canto Sosteso," which was being sung and played for the first time in America under the direction of Gunther Schuller. Mr. Nono's European reputation is formidable. The "Canto," already in the history books, is a nine-movement setting of letters from condemned Resistance fighters. Its words are inspiring examples of simplicity and immediate emotional communication of a sense of finality. With more capable soloists and chorus, it is possible that the strongly intellectualized design might have carried beyond the pages of the score. As it was, Elsa Charlston's soprano bore the brunt of the complex, vocal message. By the end, listening had become not so much a bore as a chore.

Gunther Schuller

Elsa Charlston

● ● ●

After such a series as this it is always tempting to pontificate or prophesy. Getting one's music together with a series of convenient labels is a popular pastime for reviewers as well as composers. "Post serialism is dead," one might say, or, "Happenings have at last had it." Generalizing from Nono's—who could resist the pun—to Copland's equally no-no Nonet, one might conclude that young composers know better than their elders how to turn away from musical dead ends. But that sort of statement tells more about the critic than about the music. What is important, now as always, are the recognizable new friends in the aging musical crowd.

Mostly Music

BY KENNETH ROBERTS
Associate Professor of Music, Williams College

I have Gunther Schuller to thank for most of the music heard this past week; as organizer of the Fromm-backed Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and as conductor of the Boston Symphony in an unusually excellent and interesting regular concert in the Shed at Tanglewood. For several seasons now, in mid-August, the BMC has hosted a week-long series of concerts, the most-prestigious of showcases for composers in this country. It doesn't make any difference who or how many are there to hear (though a significant portion of the small but devoted audiences are related professionally to the world of music). The fact remains that nowhere else in America have we such a showcase for young composers, unknown works of master composers of the century, and for performances of such items which are of unfailing high quality (sometimes the quality of performance far outshadowing the base quality of the music, itself!). It is for us, a kind of Darmstadt, Donaueschingen, and Glock's Dartington, all put on by student musicians, and for several seasons now, guided by Mr. Schuller. The financial help (mainly for scholarships for the students, fees for performance licenses, etc.) comes from the wise and patient Paul Fromm, whose wine business makes it possible. His hobby is new music, and may we all drink on.

This year, Schuller decided to let us hear several recent winners of the Pulitzer Prize for musical composition. . .notably George Crumb (1968) and Charles Wuorinen (1970) whose winning pieces were programmed. Crumb's theatrical piece - large orchestra, small ensembles (marching about the stage), and extensive percussion - including speech and song by the orchestra itself, proved a hit, and an interesting addition to the repertoire. Its subject is Time - in several phases - and if it does not fully convince in the matter of its programmatically titled sections, at least it holds attention, with its happenings. Wuorinen's all-electronic work - rather too long (30 minutes) for its medium - suffers from the RCA-Synthesizer adherance to the semitone. . .one longs for additional sounds, in an all-electronic composition, also dealing with Time. . .its passing (Encomium), rather than phases as in the Crumb.

There were the usual pretentious works (Reimann, Wyttenbach) and some that didn't come off, though the score holds promise (Copland's Nonet for Strings 1960, Luigi Nano's 'Canto sospeso', with its anti-fascist texts, written before executions), but the stealer was on the final, and fourth program: a high-powered performance of Edgard Varese's Integrales, for brass, woodwind and percussion ensemble. After some forty-odd years, it is still bracing. . .and what a good performance it got under Michael Tilson Thomas' direction. Four programs, a dozen and a half compositions: a decent survey, a chance to measure, and thanks to Fromm and Schuller and those wonderful Tanglewood student musicians, a chance at more education as well as amusement. Schuller wrote succinct program notes, and if he favors certain kinds of music at the expense of other streams in the 20th-century, it's his festival.

Friday last, he led the full Boston Symphony in a regular concert, not part of the Fromm festival, but a fascinating program including 3 works of this century: the Szymanowski 1st Violin Concerto (World War I era), the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy (1907), and Schuller's own 'Spectra', a tone-poem for multi-orchestras written for the New York Philharmonic in 1958. One always wonders why a composer-conductor plays certain works. . .even when he begins a program with the Wagner Rienzi Overture (the earlier-programmed Weber Freischutz I could explain due to his French-horn background). Perhaps the one thread uniting all works was an interest in texture. . .the Wagner was a spacious, well-proportioned (in tempo and timbre) reading; the unknown Polish concerto a melange of various textures common at the beginning of the century - Paul Zukofsky making his BSO soloist debut as violinist here; Schuller's own piece of interest for the varied groupings of instruments (and stage positions) and their combinations; and the Scriabin, well, suffice it to say that it was emblazoned upon our ears, hearts, minds, and bodies. Each composer (in this program) had his own bag of tricks. . . sequences, favored instrumental combinations, additive construction methods, and in each work, we listened for the same, controlled items. . .but each within a different style period and vocabulary. It was a good program, and included some of the very best playing I have ever heard from the Boston Symphony.

Next week, a summation and question: where do we go from here in America's musical life?

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
AUG 12 1970
New England Newscl

Contempory Music Festival Scheduled

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored annually by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago takes place Monday through August 20.

The intensive presentation of new works during the five-day festival turns Tanglewood into the contemporary music capitol of the world.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 8 1970
New England Newsclip

Schuller To Review Premiere Work

Gunther Schuller, artistic director at Tanglewood, will give a lecture demonstration on Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso," Thursday evening at 8:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall,

The work, described by Schuller as "one of the most important works of its time," will be given its American premiere Aug. 16 as part of the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music. The lecture will be illustrated by slides and performances by musicians.

MUSIC

(Continued from page 7)

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
AUG 12 1970
New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 15 1970
New Eng New

20 Music Works To Be Presented At Tanglewood

Bos Symphony

The Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation will present the seventh annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, with concerts Aug. 16, 17, 19 and 20 at 8:30 p.m. Of more than 20 electronic, orchestral and chamber music works to be presented, five are U.S. premieres, three have been commissioned especially for the festival, and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 6, is a world premiere.

The opening concert will be devoted to orchestral music of Penderecki, Wilson, Crumb and Nono. The remaining concerts, all chamber music, will include first performances of works by Marie, Davidovsky, Kolb, Reimann, Felciano and Wyttenbach. All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
AUG 13 1970
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Bos Symph

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from August 16 through August 20.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 16 1970

Lew Merrim from Monkmeyer

Gunther Schuller, director of the Berkshire Music Center's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, will lead a series of programs that include five American premieres. Tonight, tomorrow, Wednesday, Friday at Lenox, Mass.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
MAY 29 1970

Felciano Honored

5454

Princeton, New Jersey

Bay Area composer Richard Felciano will be honored as a Fellow of Westminster Choir College at commencement exercises today at Princeton University Chapel, New Jersey.

Felciano, associate professor of music at the University of California, Berkeley, and co-director of the university's Electronic Music Studio, is currently in New York City on a Guggenheim Fellowship.

The composer's "Lamentations" for 12 players and electronic tape, commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, will be premiered in August at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Massachusetts.

TIMES
HOLBROOK, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
AUG 13 1970
New England Newsclip

Electronic Music, Too

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from August 16 through August 20.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Festival of contemporary music set at Tanglewood

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from Aug. 16 through 20. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs. Of the more than twenty works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms no. 6, receives its world premiere.

'The Festival within a Festival' opens Sunday evening, Aug. 16 at 8.30 p.m. in the theatre-concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premier), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Mmonday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the second program of the Festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. Premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound," Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus," (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival Wednesday evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes", and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music, Thursday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, includes Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (U.S. Premiere).

All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Mr. Schuller.

Theatre Movies TV Art

Tanglewood Annual

Music Fest Has Varied Program

The 1970 festival of contemporary music, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will open at Tanglewood, Aug. 16. The four-day program includes electronic, orchestra and chamber music, three specially commissioned works, five American premieres and one world premiere. All of the works will be performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program, and will be directed by Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood.

The program for the festival is as follows:

Sunday, Aug. 16, Krzysztot Penderecki's "Anaklasis" and Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso" (both American premieres), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (new work) and George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River."

Aug. 17, chamber music, Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens Usque ad Mortem" (American premiere), Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 6 for piano and electronic sound (world premiere), Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" (new work), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Wednesday, Aug. 19, chamber music, Copland's "Nonet for Strings," Chow Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen" (American premiere), John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," Richard Felciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou (new work).

Aug. 20, chamber music, Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations," and Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (American premiere).

All programs begin at 8:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall.

Mostly Music

BY KENNETH ROBERTS
Associate Professor of Music, Williams College

I have Gunther Schuller to thank for most of the music heard this past week; as organizer of the Fromm-backed Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and as conductor of the Boston Symphony in an unusually excellent and interesting regular concert in the Shed at Tanglewood. For several seasons now, in mid-August, the BMC has hosted a week-long series of concerts, the most-prestigious of showcases for composers in this country. It doesn't make any difference who or how many are there to hear (though a significant portion of the small but devoted audiences are related professionally to the world of music). The fact remains that nowhere else in America have we such a showcase for young composers, unknown works of master composers of the century, and for performances of such items which are of unfailing high quality (sometimes the quality of performance far outshadowing the base quality of the music, itself!). It is for us, a kind of Darmstadt, Donaueschingen, and Glock's Dartington, all put on by student musicians, and for several seasons now, guided by Mr. Schuller. The financial help (mainly for scholarships for the students, fees for performance licenses, etc.) comes from the wise and patient Paul Fromm, whose wine business makes it possible. His hobby is new music, and may we all drink on.

This year, Schuller decided to let us hear several recent winners of the Pulitzer Prize for musical composition. . .notably George Crumb (1968) and Charles Wuorinen (1970) whose winning pieces were programmed. Crumb's theatrical piece - large orchestra, small ensembles (marching about the stage), and extensive percussion - including speech and song by the orchestra itself, proved a hit, and an interesting addition to the repertoire. Its subject is Time - in several phases - and if it does not fully convince in the matter of its programmatically titled sections, at least it holds attention, with its happenings. Wuorinen's all-electronic work - rather too long (30 minutes) for its medium - suffers from the RCA-Synthesizer adherance to the semitone. . .one longer for additional sounds, in an all-electronic composition, also dealing with Time. . .its passing (Encomium), rather than phases as in the Crumb.

MUSIC

(Continued from page 7)

There were the usual pretentious works (Reimann, Wyttenbach) and some that didn't come off, though the score holds promise (Copland's Nonet for Strings 1960, Luigi Nano's 'Canto sospeso', with its anti-fascist texts, written before executions), but the stealer was on the final, and fourth program: a high-powered performance of Edgard Varese's Integrales, for brass, woodwind and percussion ensemble. After some forty-odd years, it is still bracing. . .and what a good performance it got under Michael Tilson Thomas' direction. Four programs, a dozen and a half compositions: a decent survey, a chance to measure, and thanks to Fromm and Schuller and those wonderful Tanglewood student musicians, a chance at more education as well as amusement. Schuller wrote succinct program notes, and if he favors certain kinds of music at the expense of other streams in the 20th-century, it's his festival.

Friday last, he led the full Boston Symphony in a regular concert, not part of the Fromm festival, but a fascinating program including 3 works of this century: the Szymanowski 1st Violin Concerto (World War I era), the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy (1907), and Schuller's own 'Spectra', a tone-poem for multi-orchestras written for the New York Philharmonic in 1958. One always wonders why a composer-conductor plays certain works. . .even when he begins a program with the Wagner Rienzi Overture (the earlier-programmed Weber Freischutz I could explain due to his French-horn background). Perhaps the one thread uniting all works was an interest in texture. . .the Wagner was a spacious, well-proportioned (in tempo and timbre) reading; the unknown Polish concerto a melange of various textures common at the beginning of the century - Paul Zukofsky making his BSO soloist debut as violinist here; Schuller's own piece of interest for the varied groupings of instruments (and stage positions) and their combinations; and the Scriabin, well, suffice it to say that it was emblazoned upon our ears, hearts, minds, and bodies. Each composer (in this program) had his own bag of tricks. . . sequences, favored instrumental combinations, additive construction methods, and in each work, we listened for the same, controlled items. . .but each within a different style period and vocabulary. It was a good program, and included some of the very best playing I have ever heard from the Boston Symphony.

Next week, a summation and question: where do we go from here in America's musical life?

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
AUG 12 1970
New England Newsc

Contempory Music Festival Scheduled

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored annually by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago takes place Monday through August 20.

The intensive presentation of new works during the five-day festival turns Tanglewood into the contemporary music capitol of the world.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 8 1970
New England Newsclip

Schuller To Review Premiere Work

Gunther Schuller, artistic director at Tanglewood, will give a lecture demonstration on Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso," Thursday evening at 8:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall.

The work, described by Schuller as "one of the most important works of its time," will be given its American premiere Aug. 16 as part of the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music. The lecture will be illustrated by slides and performances by musicians.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
AUG 1 1970
New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 218,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 16 1970
N. Eng New

20 Music Works To Be Presented At Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation will present the seventh annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, with concerts Aug. 16, 17, 19 and 20 at 8:30 p.m. Of more than 20 electronic, orchestral and chamber music works to be presented, five are U.S. premieres, three have been commissioned especially for the festival, and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 6, is a world premiere.

The opening concert will be devoted to orchestral music of Penderecki, Wilson, Crumb and Nono. The remaining concerts, all chamber music, will include first performances of works by Marie, Davidovsky, Kolb, Reimann, Felciano and Wyttenbach. All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227
MAY 29 1970

Tanglewood

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from August 16 through August 20.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,415,507
AUG 16 1970

Lew Merrim from Monkmeyer

Gunther Schuller, director of the Berkshire Music Center's Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, will lead a series of programs that include five American premieres. Tonight, tomorrow, Wednesday, Friday at Lenox, Mass.

Festival of contemporary music set at Tanglewood

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from Aug. 16 through 20. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs. Of the more than twenty works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms no. 6, receives its world premiere.

'The Festival within a Festival' opens Sunday evening, Aug. 16 at 8.30 p.m. in the theatre-concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premier), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Mmonday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the second program of the Festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. Premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound," Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus," (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival Wednesday evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes", and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music, Thursday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, includes Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (U.S. Premiere).

All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Mr. Schuller.

Felciano Honored

Princeton, New Jersey

Bay Area composer Richard Felciano will be honored as a Fellow of Westminster Choir College at commencement exercises today at Princeton University Chapel, New Jersey.

Felciano, associate professor of music at the University of California, Berkeley, and co-director of the university's Electronic Music Studio, is currently in New York City on a Guggenheim Fellowship.

The composer's "Lamentations" for 12 players and electronic tape, commissioned by the Fromm Foundation, will be premiered in August at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Massachusetts.

TIMES
HOLBROOK, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
AUG 13 1970
New England Newsclip

Electronic Music, Too

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. —The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from August 16 through August 20.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Theatre Movies TV Art

Tanglewood Annual

Music Fest Has Varied Program

The 1970 festival of contemporary music, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will open at Tanglewood, Aug. 16. The four-day program includes electronic, orchestra and chamber music, three specially commissioned works, five American premieres and one world premiere. All of the works will be performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program, and will be directed by Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood.

The program for the festival is as follows:

Sunday, Aug. 16, Krzysztot Penderecki's "Anaklasis" and Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso" (both American premieres), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (new work) and George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River."

Aug. 17, chamber music, Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens Usque ad Mortem" (American premiere), Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 6 for piano and electronic sound (world premiere), Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" (new work), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Wednesday, Aug. 19, chamber music, Copland's "Nonet for Strings," Chow Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen" (American premiere), John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," Richard Felciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou (new work).

Aug. 20, chamber music, Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations," and Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (American premiere).

All programs begin at 8:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Festival of Contemporary Music

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in co - operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented today through Thursday. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs.

American Premieres

Of the more than 20 works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 6, receives its world premiere.

"The Festival within a Festival" opens this evening at 8.30 in the Theater - Concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premiere), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Monday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theater - Concert Hall, the second program of the festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean - Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. Premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 6 for Piano and Electronic Sound," Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus," (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Third Concert

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival Wednesday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theater - Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music, Thursday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theater - Concert Hall, includes Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jurg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (U.S. Premiere).

All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

PAUL ZUKOFSKY

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,636 SUN. 347,939

AUG 14 1970

Music Critic

Fromm Foundation Program Appoints Director

Elliott W. Galkin, music critic of the The Sun, has been appointed director of the second Fromm Foundation fellowship program in music criticism which will take place during the final two weeks of the Tanglewood Music Festival, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it has been announced by Dr. Boris Nelson, president of the Music Critics Association.

Dr. Galkin was also the director of the first fellowship program, which took place at Tanglewood last year.

Under the terms of the program, which is a project of the Music Critics Association and is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation, six young critics will be invited to be in residence at the Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood for a period of 10 days, when Tanglewood's Modern Music Festival will take place. Each fellow in the program will receive a stipend covering room, board and incidental expenses.

In co-operation with the Berkshire Music School and under the guidance of the five senior music critics who will serve as a faculty in music criticism during this period, the fellows in music criticism will attend rehearsals of the Tanglewood Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the various programs in the annual festival, which takes place under the direction of Gunther Schuller every year at the end of the Tanglewood season.

Roster Of Critics

The roster of senior critics includes Irving Lowens of the Washington Evening Star, Dr. Nelson of the Toledo Blade Harold Schonberg of the New York Times, Tom Willis of the Chicago Tribune and Dr. Galkin.

"The object," explained Dr. Nelson, who is also director of fine arts at the University of Toledo, "is to create a dynamic forum where young critics can be provided with opportunities to hear the most contemporary kinds of music under ideal conditions. From their discussions among themselves, and with the different performers and composers who will be present at Tanglewood, and from analysis of articles they will write which will be examined by the senior critics, they will be able to gain authoritative insights—and new sympathies—for the development of contemporary music in America."

One Baltimorean is among the six fellows in music criticism who have been selected. He is the Rev. James Burns, writer for various religious publications, among them The Voice, and Catholic Choirmaster. The other recipients are James E. Harvey, of the Flint Journal (Michigan) and formerly editor-in-chief of the Kalamazoo College newspaper; Peggy Ann McKay, record reviewer and writer for the Flint Journal; Linda Winer Pitcher of the Chicago Tribune; Susan Gay Raccoli, a student in the Rockefeller Foundation project for the training of music critics, at the University of Southern California, and writer for Contempo; and Carol Wesley Steiner, of the Buffalo Evening News, and a contributor to Current Musicology.

Tanglewood

Festival of Contemporary Music

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from August 16 through 20. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs. Of the more than twenty works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 6, receives its world premiere.

'The Festival within a Festival' opens Sunday evening, August 16 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premiere), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Monday, August 17 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the second program of the Festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms No. 6 for piano and electronic sound," Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus" (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival on Wednesday evening, August 19 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music, Thursday, August 20 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, includes Philip Bezanson's "Five miniatures for clarinet and cello," Charles Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jürg Wyttenbach's "Paraphrase" (U.S. premiere).

All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Festival Of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from Aug. 16 through 20. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs. Of the more than twenty works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms no. 6, receives its world premiere.

'The Festival within a Festival' opens Sunday evening, Aug. 16 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premiere), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Monday, Aug. 17 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the second program of the Festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. Premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound, Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus," (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival on Wednesday evening, Aug. 19 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music Thursday, Aug. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concer Hall, includes Philip Ben zanson's "Five miniatures fo clarinet and cello, Charle Wuorinen's "Time's Encomium I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jurg Wyttenback's "Paraphrase" (U.S. Premiere).

All programs are performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood.

Schuller To Receive $1,000 Award

B E 8/11

Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, will receive the 1970 Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award of $1,000 during the opening concert of the Festival of Contemporary Music this Sunday evening at 8:30 in the Berkshire Music Center.

Composer Otto Luening will make the presentation that is sponsored by Columbia University and includes a citation by Columbia President Andrew W. Cordier.

26th Recipient

The 44-year-old Schuller is the 26th recipient of the award. It is given to an American conductor who has particularly promoted music by 20th century American composers both here and abroad.

Schuller is well-known as conductor and composer. He is director of the Berkshire Music Center, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and author of "Early Jazz." He will conduct the Sunday concert which features the world premiere of "Voices" by Olly Wilson.

The citation praises Schuller for his career as a musician and for instructing others to follow in his path.

Bos Sym Orch

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 15 1970

New England

Composer Premieres Work

785

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — For Barbara Kolb, a Hartford-born composer, the world of music has definitely taken a turn for the better. It changed in 1969, when she was named simultaneously for the Guggenheim Award and the coveted Prix de Rome, or "Rome Prize". Both prizes, awarded after a general review of a composer's work, presented a delightful dilemma — which to pick?

"I picked the Rome Prize, which is given annually to only two composers," Miss Kolb explained. "Right after word got out about that prize I received a special delivery letter from Tanglewood. At first I though they were asking for repayment on a scholarship I once had. It was a pleasant surprise to find the Fromm Commission wanted to commission a work from me, instead."

The Fromm Music Foundation annually commissions works of 10 to 15-minute duration from contemporary composers for presentation during a week-long festival of modern music held at Tanglewood. Miss Glob's Rome Prize was a two-year grant which enables a composer to work in an atmosphere of some financial security.

That commission developed into "Trobar Clus," a ten-minute piece featuring conventional string instruments plus flutes, guitar, brass and an electric harpsichord. The form is along the lines of the troubador (trobar is troubador in Italian) song of the 11th and 12th centuries.

More important, "Tobar Clus" will be performed Monday night in a world premiere concert at Tanglewood. The exhuberant young composer is understandably excited, and She recently arrived from Rome to oversee rehearsals and the performance.

"'Clus is the most important piece I've written to date, and I'm a little anxious about it," Barbara admitted as we left one of the rehearsal halls for lunch.

The composer had reason to be anxious; it's tricky writing the "new music", as contemporary music is called, and through the years one problem facing composers has remained constant — you never can really be sure of what you've done until it's played and heard.

"After one rehearsal I realized that the piece didn't work in a few spots. Fortunately, I've been able to change it statisfactorily and it will be in good shape for the concert. And the players are good. But you never can be sure until the last moment," she added cautiously.

Like much of the music being written today by composers under 30, "Trobar" is described in Barbara's program notes as being in an "uncrystallized" rondo form allowing great flexibility, yet contained within a strict frame. The instruments are physically grouped into four sections surrounding the conductor, and the music flows from one to the other in individual statements that sometimes overlap.

"It's a constant cycling that I'm striving for," she explained carefully. "And I've written these special notes to help the audience, give them a guide so they can follow the music better."

Miss Kolb is acutely aware of difficulties experienced when people bring their 19th century conditioning into a hall where 20th century music is being played. However, loss of understanding or supposed "emotional response" to music is a temporary but unavoidable casualty of changing styles.

"I sympathize with the listener. Music these days is incoherent. Obviously that's because there's no longer a rigid basic form to follow — no logical container. Everybody's piece is different, yet alike in its differences. It's very complicated and paradoxical."

"Without the old style comparative examples, it's a momentary loss for the audience, but not for the composer who enjoys the new freedom," she continued.

Barbara admits much of her early instincts towards composing came from her father, Hal Kolb, who for years was staff pianist and organist for WTIC ("he could improvise anything!"). Her mother still lives in Hartford.

For Barbara, her presence at Tanglewood is a kind of homecoming. She was there in 1960 as a clarinetist and in 1964 and 1968 as a composer, studying under noted musicians Gunther Schuller and Lucas Foss.

Festival Of Contemporary Music At Tanglewood

The 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, sponsored for the seventh year by the Berkshire Music Center in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented from Aug. 16 through 20. Electronic, orchestral and chamber music will be included on the programs. Of the more than twenty works presented, five are American premieres, three have been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation for the Festival; and one, Davidovsky's Synchronisms no. 6, receives its world premiere.

'The Festival within a Festival' opens Sunday evening, Aug. 16 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The program includes: Krzysztof Penderecki's "Anaklasis" (American Premiere), Olly Wilson's "Voices" (one of three works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), George Crumb's "Echoes of Time and the River," and the United States premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso."

On Monday, Aug. 17 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the second program of the Festival presents chamber music. The program includes Jean-Etienne Marie's "Obediens usque ad mortem" (U.S. Premiere), the world premiere of Mario Davidovsky's "Synchronisms no. 6 for piano and electronic sound, Barbara Kolb's "Trobar Clus," (the second of the works commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation), Donald Lybbert's "Lines for the Fallen," Leslie Thimmig's "Seven profiles for string quartet," and Edgard Varese's "Integrales."

Aaron Copland's "Nonet for Strings" opens the third concert of the Festival on Wednesday evening, Aug. 19 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The remainder of the program includes: Chou Wen-Chung's "Cursive," Aribert Reimann's "Reflexionen," John Heiss' "Movements for three flutes," and Richard Feliciano's "Lamentations for Jani Christou," the third work commissioned for the Festival by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

The final concert of the 1970 Festival of Contemporary Music, Thursday, Aug. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concer Hall, includes Philip Ben zanson's "Five miniatures fo clarinet and cello, Charle Wuorinen's "Time's Encomiur I and II," George Wilson's "Concatenations" and Jurg Wyttenback's "Paraphrase" (U.S. Premiere).

All programs are performec by members of the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship program and are under the direction of Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood.

Schuller To Receive $1,000 Award

Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, will receive the 1970 Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award of $1,000 during the opening concert of the Festival of Contemporary Music this Sunday evening at 8:30 in the Berkshire Music Center.

Composer Otto Luening will make the presentation that is sponsored by Columbia University and includes a citation by Columbia President Andrew W. Cordier.

26th Recipient

The 44-year-old Schuller is the 26th recipient of the award. It is given to an American conductor who has particularly promoted music by 20th century American composers both here and abroad.

Schuller is well-known as conductor and composer. He is director of the Berkshire Music Center, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and author of "Early Jazz." He will conduct the Sunday concert which features the world premiere of "Voices" by Olly Wilson.

The citation praises Schuller for his career as a musician and for instructing others to follow in his path.

Berkshire Eagle
TIMES
PITTSFIELD, COURIER
AUG 15 1970

Composer Premieres Work

785

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — For Barbara Kolb, a Hartford-born composer, the world of music has definitely taken a turn for the better. It changed in 1969, when she was named simultaneously for the Guggenheim Award and the coveted Prix de Rome, or "Rome Prize". Both prizes, awarded after a general review of a composer's work, presented a delightful dilemma — which to pick?

"I picked the Rome Prize, which is given annually to only two composers," Miss Kolb explained. "Right after word got out about that prize I received a special delivery letter from Tanglewood. At first I though they were asking for repayment on a scholarship I once had. It was a pleasant surprise to find the Fromm Commission wanted to commission a work from me, instead."

The Fromm Music Foundation annually commissions works of 10 to 15-minute duration from contemporary composers for presentation during a week-long festival of modern music held at Tanglewood. Miss Glob's Rome Prize was a two-year grant which enables a composer to work in an atmosphere of some financial security.

That commission developed into "Trobar Clus," a ten-minute piece featuring conventional string instruments plus flutes, guitar, brass and an electric harpsichord. The form is along the lines of the troubador (trobar is troubador in Italian) song of the 11th and 12th centuries.

More important, "Tobar Clus" will be performed Monday night in a world premiere concert at Tanglewood. The exhuberant young composer is understandably excited, and She recently arrived from Rome to oversee rehearsals and the performance.

"'Clus is the most important piece I've written to date, and I'm a little anxious about it," Barbara admitted as we left one of the rehearsal halls for lunch.

The composer had reason to be anxious; it's tricky writing the "new music", as contemporary music is called, and through the years one problem facing composers has remained constant — you never can really be sure of what you've done until it's played and heard.

"After one rehearsal I realized that the piece didn't work in a few spots. Fortunately, I've been able to change it statisfactorily and it will be in good shape for the concert. And the players are good. But you never can be sure until the last moment," she added cautiously.

Like much of the music being written today by composers under 30, "Trobar" is described in Barbara's program notes as being in an "uncrystallized" rondo form allowing great flexibility, yet contained within a strict frame. The instruments are physically grouped into four sections surrounding the conductor, and the music flows from one to the other in individual statements that sometimes overlap.

"It's a constant cycling that I'm striving for," she explained carefully. "And I've written these special notes to help the audience, give them a guide so they can follow the music better."

Miss Kolb is acutely aware of difficulties experienced when people bring their 19th century conditioning into a hall where 20th century music is being played. However, loss of understanding or supposed "emotional response" to music is a temporary but unavoidable casualty of changing styles.

"I sympathize with the listener. Music these days is incoherent. Obviously that's because there's no longer a rigid basic form to follow — no logical container. Everybody's piece is different, yet alike in its differences. It's very complicated and paradoxical."

"Without the old style comparative examples, it's a momentary loss for the audience, but not for the composer who enjoys the new freedom," she continued.

Barbara admits much of her early instincts towards composing came from her father, Hal Kolb, who for years was staff pianist and organist for WTIC ("he could improvise anything!"). Her mother still lives in Hartford.

For Barbara, her presence at Tanglewood is a kind of homecoming. She was there in 1960 as a clarinetist and in 1964 and 1968 as a composer, studying under noted musicians Gunther Schuller and Lucas Foss.

BLANK PAGE

Berkshire Center Holds Tanglewood on Parade

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Reviews

LENOX — The big news of Tanglewood on Parade that started at 1:50 p.m. on Tuesday and ended at 10:45 p.m. was made on the side of the campus known as the Berkshire Music Center.

Climax was a gala 30th anniversary concert in celebration of the 70th year of American composer Aaron Copland who headed the composition department at the center for many years.

Combined Orchestras

Copland conducted the Boston Symphony of 133 players in the overture to "Candide" by Bernstein. He led the 120 members of the Berkshire Center Orchestra in Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber."

Huge as the Music Shed stage is, it must have been a miserably uncomfortable confinement for the combined orchestras which played Copland's suite from "The Tender Land" and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasie.

The humidity was oppressive, plus rain, lightning and thunder that started with the main event and continued throughout the entire program.

Lukas Foss performed as soloist and conductor of the Boston Symphny in Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor.

All of which was very glamorous.

But the really important events at Tanglewood on Tuesday took place before 8:30 p.m. They were in the theater concert hall, chamber music hall, steps of the center's main building and in the formal gardens.

Musicians of the Future

Here was a demonstration of music and musicians of the future given by 350 talented young people, 140 on fellowship.

Copland put his finger on the crux of the center's reason for being in a brief talk after intermission of the main concert.

He lauded the center's founder, the late Serge Koussevitzky, praising his "full sense of responsibility in being a musician, especially to young people."

During its 30 years, dozens of those now celebrities have gone from "student" status at the center to stars (conductors, instrumentalists and singers) of the Boston Symphony at Berkshire Music Festival concerts.

This year, "demonstrations" were space so that one could attend most of the five-ring circus. In past years, as many as three concerts were in progress at once and only a track star could have looked in on a little bit of each.

The Berkshire Music Center Chamber Orchestra was led by five young men from this country and England. Any one of them could conceivably be a Bernstein or Ozawa of the future, both of whom were once "students" at the center.

Astute Performance

Isaiah Jackson certainly has no impediments to reach the top. He conducted a sensitive and astute performance of the slow movement from Schumann's Fourth Symphony. Mesru Mehmedov did as well by Haydn's Symphony No. 82, "The Bear." In fact, the latter became so engrossed that there was difficulty interrupting him so that the time allotment schedule could be met.

If soprano Linda Phillips doesn't reach the top, it will be because singers go out of style. She sang Wagner's Mathilde Wesendonk songs in a sumptuous voice and commensurate intelligence.

As usual, the "Composers Forum" has its highs and abysmal lows. Knusen's "Vocalise With Songs of 'Winnie-the-Pooh'" may be remembered as a nonsense elegy with interred humor requiring soprano Elsa Charlston to shriek above a lamenting instrumental background. It might have helped if the words were understood.

Kurt Carpenter's "Night Spell" had some ingenious sounds culminating in a blast that must have moved the chamber music hall off its foundation.

The gala concert also had its ups and downs.

Copland devoted practical energy to get every ounce of zing out of the Bernstein Overture and Hindemith's "Metamorphosis." Both were played with bursting enthuaisam by their respective orchestras.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 30 1970
New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,053
JUL 29 1970
New England Newsclip

Berkshire Anniversary Concert One of Finest Musical Evenings

By RICHARD CONWAY

Inspired! That's the only word that can even begin to describe the 30th anniversary concert of the Berkshire Music Festival last night. It was one of the finest evenings with music that this reviewer has ever spent.

The evening began with Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man", played by a brass ensemble in front of the music shed before the concert proper began. The marvelously sonorous chords of this short work were a fitting beginning for the evening's festivities. Conducted by Roger Vodsin, of the Boston Symphony, the ensemble played with great clarity, strength and precision.

It was fitting, too, that the opening fanfare should be by Aaron Copland, for it was his anniversary night also. The great American composer is celebrating his 70th birthday year.

And how he celebraed it last night! With stunning energy and incisiveness he led the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra through four of the five scheduled works. While certainly not a great conductor, he established a sure rapport. The result was almost incredible.

Leonard Bernstein's "Overture to Candide" opened the program. The alternately spritely rhythms and flowing melody set the tone for what followed.

What followed was a masterful performance of the Bach Piano Concerto in D minor S. 1052. Lukas Foss was pianist and conductor for this work, with a Baroque size string ensemble accompanying. In terms of figurations in the first and last movements were models of clarity and precision. The beautiful second movement, Adagio, was exquisitely done Foss' playing of the driving pure music, this was the highlight of the night.

by solo piano and solo violin, viola, cello, and bass. It was Bach being played as Bach was meant to be played.

Copland then led the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra through Paul Hindemith's Symphonic metamorphosis of themes by Weber. These young people gave the Boston Symphony a good run for the money. They played with rich tone, great cleanness, and rhythmic precision. Especially well done were the second movement "Scherzo" and the third movement "Andantino". The latter featured an excellently played flute solo by Bonnie Boyd.

After the intermission came three pieces from Copland's own opera "The Tender Land." This is the Copland of the Americana period, when he wrote with such rich understanding of this nation, its history, and most of all its people. It is filled with the composer's beautiful folk like melodies and foot - tapping square - dance rhythms.

The final movement is stirring, with its broad, expansive melody that sings of "the promise of living". It is a deeply moving work, and the orchestra played it with great sensitivity.

The program ended with the Overture to Romeo and Juliet by Tchaikovsky. Copland dedicated the performance to the memory of Serge Koussevitsky, who founded the Berkshire Music Festival, 30 years ago. Under Copland's baton, the combined orchestras gave it a strong and appropriately Romantic performance.

A standing ovation greeted the end of the concert. It was richly deserved.

Whitestone

PRECONCERT PICNICS, a Tanglewood-on-Parade tradition, ran into rain trouble last night, but some groups gave it a go, among them, from left, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin M. England of Pittsfield, author William L. Shirer, Mrs. Martha Pelton and daughter Cathy, of Lenox, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard E. Ross of Richmond.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 29 1970
New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Young Musicians Have Eight-Hour Tanglewood Spree

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were seven concerts by 450 muscians at Tanglewood Tuesday. It was the annual dislay of young talent called Tanglewood-on-Parade, including the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Student Exhibition

Involved were 140 advanced students attending the Berkshire Music Center on Fellowships and about 200 younger students in the programs of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a few more than 100 members, and it joined the orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center (about 75 members) for the gala 30th anniversary concert at 8.30 conducted by Aaron Copland and Lukas Foss.

Aaron Copland, America's Best-known composer, was administrator and member of the faculty of the center from its inception in 1940. This year's parade is in celebration of his 70th birthday as well as the 30th birthday of the center.

Young Conductors

The concerts began at 2 in the Tanglewood Theater with the Center Chamber Orchestra (about 35 members) playing five pieces conducted by five student conductors. There were a couple of hundred listeners, the vanguard of an audience of several thousand that was arriving all afternoon and early evening.

The other concerts were in the chamber-music hall, the shed and on the lawn south of the main house overlooking the Stockbridge Bowl and Lake Mahkeenac.

The music covered the proverbial gamut from traditional to avant garde, small to large, short to long, happy to sad, soft to loud, bad to good. . . or, to put it more accurately, uncomfortable to satisfying.

Play by Play

Here is a quick rundown of the events: second concert, institute orchestra, four pieces, 60 members, in the shed; third concert (3.15), composers forum, four brand new pieces for small ensembles (one for unaccompanied oboe).

Fourth concert (4 p.m.) institute recital in theater, four pieces in 90 minutes played by a wind quintet, brass quintet, vocal quartet, string quartet by Piston, Mozart, Verdi and Parris.

Fifth concert, three soloists, contralto, bass and soprano, in chamber music hall; sixth concert, three peices for wind groups by Fine., Schuller and Mozart at 6 for picknickers siting on the lawn hear the main house.

Interspersed among the concerts were occasional brass fanfares intended to call attention to another program beginning. They were among the happiest moments of the afternoon being more like short, bright band pieces than the ra-ta-ta sound one expects from the word fanfare.

Also interspersed among the buildings, trees, lawns and gravel paths of Tanglewood were hundreds of people strolling from concert to concert or just sitting on the grass in the mellow air.

Dual Finale

The final concert of the evening in the great shed included five works, two conductors and two orchestras; Aaron Copland conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Bernstein's overture to "Candide"; Lukas Foss, at the piano, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Bach's Piano Concerto in D Minor; Copland conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Hindesmith's "Symphonic Metamorthosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber"; that was before intermission.

After intermission Copland conducted the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras (about 19[illegible] musicians) in performance of his own suite from "th[illegible] Tender Land'' an[illegible] Tchaikovsky's Overture "Romeo and Juliet."

(Foss is part of the 30 [illegible] anniversary. He was protege of the Center's founder, Serge Koussevitzky, was a student at Tanglewood in the first three years of the Center, and is now music director and conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.)

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,730

JUL 30 1970

CRITIC AT LARGE by Byron Belt

Tanglewood Anniversary

LENOX, Mass.—Class and quality have been the special glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the years, and they are what makes the summer Tanglewood Festival particularly enjoyable.

This week Tanglewood took time out to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the founding of the Berkshire Music Center by the late and legendary conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky. The summer educational activities through the years have produced many of today's major musical leaders, including Leonard Bernstein, who is serving as advisor to the artistic leadership of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuler.

In addition to enjoying it's own birthday party, it was decided that this year's annual "Tanglewood on Parade" would honor the upcoming 70th birthday of composer Aaron Copland, who, among his endless activities is chairman of the Faculty Emeritus of the Berkshire Center which he has headed for many years.

* * *

"TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE" offered a marvelous musical smorgasboard of delicacies and things not so fragile. It managed to play not only the caliber of the aristocratic Bostonians, but the exciting accomplishments of several hundred young composers, conductors and performers of all times.

Among the distinguished summer faculty, it was particularly enlightening to watch Leon Barzun shepherd five young conductors through rehearsal sessions with the center's chamber orchestra. It was also a special treat to see soprano Phyllis Curtin modulate from tense concern to hue-and-cry release and pride as several other student singers demonstrated the sort of progress which can be accomplished in the atmosphere of total concentration and dedication possible only in such a place.

Hovering over all, of course, was the director of the educational program, and one of America's top composers and conductors, Gunther Schuler. A program of works for chamber ensemble by various of the summer's young composers was particularly enjoyable, although as a creator sensitive to the difficulties young composers face, Schuler might insist that future programs offer at least the full names of each composer.

* * *

ONE COMPOSER whose name we discovered because he was also one of the young conductors (and performers always have their names and credentials given in fullest detail at Tanglewood!), was Oliver Knussen, and it is probably a name to remember. British to the core is "Vocalise with Songs of 'Winnie the Pooh'," which was a delightful musical evocation, sung enduringly and with vocal aplomb by soprano Elsa Charleston.

There were fanfares and serenades everywhere, and the exquisite Berkshire setting was hampered only by a day of incredible mugginess and threatening storm.

The storms materialized during the gala concluding concert, with thunder, lightning and rain, in dramatic sequence that managed to replace the scheduled fireworks with a heavenly spectacular that mere musicians could hardly challenge.

Challenge was offered aplenty during the evening's program which featured both Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra which performed gloriously both separately and together under the day's hero, Aaron Copland. Since we have always found Copland to be a singularly effective conductor (often under-appreciated by my colleagues, but never by the admiring musicians who perform under him), the evening proved a special delight.

The Tanglewood season runs through August and there are all-Beethoven programs galore, the Berlioz Requiem and enough new music to stimulate any music lover.

SAN BERNARDINO, CALIF.
SUN-TELEGRAM
SUN. 79,500 D.

AUG 9 1970

Robert Cole On Berkshire Center Podium

Robert Cole, Los Angeles conductor, directed the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra as part of the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program at the famed Tanglewood Music Festival sponsored by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cole is a member of a small group of conductors chosen from throughout the world to study conducting at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein and Leon Barzin for eight weeks.

Cole will return to Los Angeles about Sept. 1, at which time he will resume his duties as musical director of the West End Symphony, Ontario, Tulare County Symphony, Immaculate Heart College Orchestra, Riverside Opera Association and Los Angeles Ballet Society.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Copland's Parade

By JAY ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD - ON - PARADE yesterday was a veritable horn of plenty from 2 to 11 p.m. One might have called it a cornucoplandia, for the main and final event of the day was a massive concert in which the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center orchestras combined to play under the baton of Aaron Copland, who is soon to celebrate his 70th birthday. The program was chosen to honor him for the 25 years he devoted to the Center's organization and development.

The attendance was 5,608.

* * *

A SURVEY of the total events is necessary to discern the significance of the activities at Tanglewood. There were student fanfares by the brass instrument choirs to start both the afternoon and the evening sessions.

There were short programs by the BMC chamber orchestra in which five student conductors took turns; a program by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute Young Artists Symphony Orchestra with James Yannatos, conductor; a composers' forum prepared under the supervision of Gunther Schuller; the BU Institute presentation of a recital program of works for brass quintet and string and vocal quartets; a concert by the Center vocal department; an outdoor concert of music for winds; and then, to climax the day, the gala 30th anniversary concert.

It is always good for an argument to bring up the subject of whether an artist with a mail-order fiddle can make as good a sound as a moderately able violinist with a Stradivari. The same conditions hold for the variety of means used yesterday in the various programs. Young Mr. Yannatos made his orchestra of high-school age performers, who played competitive selections from the standard repertory, sound in very respectable comparison with the performances of the more mature Music Center and the professional orchestras.

* * *

COPLAND opened his program with the overture to Bernstein's "Candide." Lukas Foss played the solo and, conducting from the keyboard, directed the Bach D Minor piano concerto, a performance he has done five previous times on the Tanglewood grounds.

This is always a questionable procedure. For instance, after the initial orchestral tutti, Foss was so engrossed in his orchestra that he failed to articulate the supremely effective ascending five-step idiom which emerges from the orchestral introduction. He got into the piano soon later and gave a splendid rendition. However, one wonders whether the reduced Boston forces required all that arm-waving in the adagio.

* * *

BERKSHIRE MUSIC Center Orchestra took over the stage entirely and played the Hindemith Symphonic Variations on themes of Carl Maria von Weber for Copland.

After intermission, the two orchestras combined and played Copland's own suite from his opera "The Tender Land," three deeply inspired movements. The introduction and poignant love music; the party scene, a boisterously infectious hoe-down; and the very moving "The Promise of Living."

* * *

A STORM had been brewing most of the evening with faint rumbles of thunder audible from time to time. The greatest clap of the evening came as the combined forces launched into Tchaikovsky's overture to "Romeo and Juliet," just as Romeo started to breathe hard.

Before starting the second half of the evening, Copland stepped to the microphone and, in a few terse words, paid a tribute to the memory of the founder of the Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky. He stated that the performance of the Tchaikovsky overture would be dedicated to his memory.

July 28 Tanglewood Goes 'On Parade'

BOSTON, Mass. — The annual day- long Tanglewood-on-Parade program at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home on July 28, is to be a double celebration this year. It celebrates the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school for advanced music study, and it honors composer Aaron Copland, long associated with the center, as he approaches his 70th birthday.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by the Boston Symphony's then music director, Serge Koussevitzky, as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream. Talented young musicians from this country and abroad gather for an intensive eight-week session of study and performance. Aaron Copland recognized as one of America's great composers, headed the composition department for 25 years from the time of the Berkshire Music Center's founding. Pianist-conductor, Lukas Foss, also renowned as a composer, was a member of the center's first class in 1940, as was Leonard Bernstein, now advisor to Tanglewood. Seiji Ozawa, an artistic director for Tanglewood, came to study at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky's successor as music director of the Boston Symphony. While there as a student, Ozawa won the Koussevitzky prize, given annually to the year's outstanding young conductor at Tanglewood.

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
(M) 78,940

JUN 8 1970

New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh — Tanglewood Turns 30

By ROSE WALSH

Tuesday, July 28, will be a big celebration day at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lenox.

Featuring the annual day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade program of music, the event will celebrate the 30th anniversary of Berkshire Center, founded in 1940 by BSO's then music director, Serge Koussevitsky.

It will also honor Aaron Copland as he approaches his 70th birthday. He is widely recognized as one of America's best contemporary composers and long associated with the Center (summer school for advanced music study).

Each year Tanglewood-on-Parade begins at 2 p. m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center's students.

It culminates at 8:30 in the evening with a Gala Concert in the Music Shed and fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

This year Copland conducts the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras and Lukas Foss (a member of the Center's first class in 1940), widely known as a composer, is pianist-conductor with the BSO.

Another renowned 1940 alumnus, Leonard Bernstein, now adviser to Tanglewood, will have his Candide overture played by the BSO and conducted by Copland to open the program.

Copland will conduct his Suite from The Tender Land and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, a work closely associated with Koussevitsky.

Tickets for Tanglewood-on-Parade are priced at $3, $4.50, $5 and $6 with box seats $6.50. They are available by mail or in person at the box office, Tanglewood, Mass. 012401.

Rabbi Harold I. Saperstein, president of the New York Board of Rabbis, officiated at the nuptial ceremony of his son, Marc E. Saperstein, and Miss Roberta Shapiro, both graduate students at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, which took place last Wednesday at Temple Israel, Boston.

Rabbi Roland S. Gittelsohn of Temple Israel and president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis; Rabbi Sanford Saperstein, uncle of the bridegroom, and Rabbi Benzion Gold, director of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at Harvard University, assisted.

The bride, daughter of Dr. Robert Shapiro, an orthopedic surgeon, and Mrs. Shapiro of Brookline, is a graduate of the University of Chicago.

Her husband, a summa cum laude graduate of Harvard, is a rabbinical student on leave from the Hebrew Union College - Jewish Institute of Religion in New York.

A November wedding is in the planning for Mt. Ida College alumna Miss Shawna Mary Donovan and Robert Arthur Lavigne, as announced by the parents of the future bride, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Donovan, Jr., of Larchmont, N. Y. The prospective bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Omer D. Lavigne of Leominster.

Miss Donovan is a provisional member of the Junior League of Larchmont. Her fiance, a student at Babson Institute of Business Administration, Wellesley, was graduated from Notre Dame High School, Fitchburg. He was staff sergeant with the First Infantry Division in Vietnam.

More to Come Mon A. M.

Band.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 23 1970

New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, June 8, 1970

Kaleidoscope

By R. E. Krieger

THE TANGLEWOOD-on-Parade concert at Tangelwood this year will be on July 28 with usual demonstration of work by the students at the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2 p.m. the day-long celebration will culminate in the Gala Concert in the Music Shed beginning at 8:30 p.m.

Aaron Copland will conduct the Boston Symphony in the overture to "Candide" by Bernstein, the Berkshire Music Center orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber," and the combined Berkshire Center and Boston Symphony Orchestras in his own suite from "The Tender Land" and the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet."

Lukas Foss will also be on hand to conduct the Boston Symphony in Bach's "Piano Concerto in D Minor" in which he will also be piano soloist.

The concert is a double celebration . . . for the 30th anniversary of the Music Center and in honor of Copland as he nears his 70th birthday.

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE
a day-long celebration culminating with the . . .
GALA CONCERT
JULY 28/SHED/8:30 P.M. in honor of
AARON COPLAND'S
70th Birthday
The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Bernstein: 'Candide' overture
AARON COPLAND conductor
Bach: Piano concerto in D minor
LUKAS FOSS conductor/pianist
The BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
Hindemith: Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber
AARON COPLAND conductor
The Combined BOSTON SYMPHONY and BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRAS
Copland: 'The Tender Land' Suite
Tchaikovsky: Romeo and Juliet
Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl following the concert.
Tickets: $3, $4.50, $5, $6, $6.50
TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS. 01240
(413) 637-1600

B. E. 7/28/70

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUL — 1970

New England Newsclip

Fireworks and musical festivities culminate Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day-long demonstration of the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, which begins at 2:00 p.m. on Tuesday, July 28. The evening concert is performed by the Boston Symphony with the Music Center Orchestra (8:30 p.m.): Bernstein's Candide Overture, conducted by Aaron Copland; Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor conducted and played by Lukas Foss; Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber by Hindemith; Copland's Suite from The Tender Land; and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. Tickets ($4.50-$6.50) from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140. Unreserved tickets, $3.00, available at the gate. 413-637-1600.

BEST BETS

THE TANGLEWOOD - SARATOGA LAKE GEORGE area is in full cultural bloom during August, and the attractions are many, varied and of highest quality.

Tuesday is the annual Tanglewood-On-Parade salute to the Berkshire Music Center, with events starting at 2 p.m. The festivities this year are the inniversary of the center itself.

In the evening, Copland will conduct a concert featuring both the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. In addition the suite from his own opera "The Tender Land," Copland will conduct music of Bernstain, Hindemith and Tchaikovsky, and with Lukas Foss as soloist, the Bach D minor piano concerto.

The Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts will feature Beethoven, with conductors William Stainberg and Antal Dorati, and pianists Claude Frank, Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 4*1,961 SUN. 423,790

JUL 26 1970

Potpourri

Nothing Worthy Departs

By Celine Slator

A big celebration is planned at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center on July 28. The event marks the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Center which was founded on 1940 by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the BSO.

Also honored will be Aaron Copland as he approaches his 70th birthday. He is widely recognized as one of America's best contemporary composers and has long been associated with the Center which is a summer school for advanced music study.

The celebration takes the form of the annual day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade program of music which starts at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center students. It culminates at 8:30 p.m. with a Gala Concert in the Music Shed followed by fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

Copland will conduct along with Lukas Foss, member of the 1940 class and a noted composer, pianist and conductor, himself. Another well known alumnus, Leonard Bernstein, an adviser to Tanglewood, will have his Candide Overture played by the BSO. Copland's Suite from The Tender Land will be heard along with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, a work closely associated with Koussevitzky.

For at least three of us in Middlebury the 30th anniversary will be meaningful for we were a part of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940. All of us had the same interests but somewhat different immediate concerns. One thing we did share in common was the Berkshire Music Center chorus and it was this group that gave the Randall Thompson "Alleluia" chorus its first reading as the center officially opened and later appeared in the magnificent Bach Mass in B Minor toward the end of the summer.

It was a privilege to be at Tanglewood in 1940 for it marked the culmination of a dream of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to have a center of this kind where serious students could come to work with masters in various fields of music and the beginning of the dream burning reality. By later standards the group was not very large, about 400 of us. When we returned the next summer of 1941 that enrollment was larger and it increased even as we returned as a critic for a large daily before World War II forced the closing of the Center for the Duration.

Lukas Foss was certainly there that summer as was Leonard Bernstein. So, too, were Richard Horner Bales, long the distinguished conductor of the National Gallery Sinfonieta, Richard Korn, conductor of several major symphonies and guest conductor of many; Thor Johnson, then the conductor of the Michigan; Ariana Bronstein, daughter of the famous violin teacher in New York, who later became known as Ariana Bronne, a fine violinist; one of our rommates, Eunice Albert, who has gone on to be a top-notch contralto and oratorio luminary. And literally a host of others.

One of our courses was with the late Olin Downes, for years the famous music critic of The New York Times; This took the form of six lectures and discussions on the over-all topic of "Integrity and Music." These had to do with the composer, the interpreter, the listener, the critic, the culmination of a great epoch of music in Europe and visions and problems of American music today—or today of 1940.

We had several lectures by Aaron Copland, one having to do with American Music and another on Music and the Movies. Another was an in-depth study of Till Eulenspiegel of Strauss and another was on Contemporary Music. Randall Thompson also gave several lectures having to do with musical knowledge, general knowledge and spiritual knowledge, and Roy Harris spoke on neo-classicism and modern classicism and his own Third Symphony.

Abram Chasins was also at Tanglewood that summer and gave us an excellent talk on the Bach B Minor Mass which even then we were rehearsing. Stanley Chappell, with whom we studied conducting, also appeared in formal lecture classes several times, each time analyzing various scores.

We also had a course with Howard Abell in music for the schools which ran all six weeks of the summer session, a course shared by Malcolm Holmes who was then on the Harvard faculty. But a high point, and one of our toughest courses, was one on composing with the giant of his day, Paul Hindemith.

That first year we lived somewhat of a dormitory life in that the Lenox School for Boys was turned over to the girls. But after breakfast we would head out the mile or so to Tanglewood and spend the day there. Lunch came out in a truck and from it we were served cafeteria style. However, a few cars were available, and some of us soon found out that there was a great restaurant in Lenox. In time that restaurant became a common gathering place for faculty, BSO members and students alike.

We went all day long, either in classes, discussions or rehearsals. Most evenings there was some kind of concert or rehearsal or even lecture to attend. In other words, we slept, ate and bathed in music right up to and including the annual Festival, itself, when for three weeks concerts drawing several thousand people would be held about three times a week.

Towering over the whole Center was Koussevitzky. His stamp was everywhere. His figure was formal or informal as befitted the occasion. We can remember sitting under a tree talking with him very personally one day. We can remember sitting in awe of him as he swept out of his car with a cape flowing in the breeze headed for the podium in the Music Shed and the BSO rehearsal.

Late in the summer we were all invited to his beautiful home for afternoon tea, the grounds sweeping down the hills which fell to the waters of the lake in Lee. Koussevitzky was the most warm and genial of hosts, giving no clue of the stern perfectionist he was at work.

How many memories come swarming back over the years. Great moments and little moments. We recall a birthday party given by one of our dormitory friends. She came from a wealthy family and her father had told her to have a party for herself at the nicest place she could find. Well, she found a sort of beer parlor in Lenox which was big enough for a sizable crowd. And she invited students and faculty alike. And, unwittingly, she provided entertainment. Gregor Piatagorsky at the 'cello and Lennie Bernstein at the piano, playing the "pop" music of the day.

Copland also got into the act and gave us some of the tunes from his movie scores. Even Hindemith sat down and walloped out some Strauss waltzes. And we danced and sang while tanks rumbled across the African desert and war clouds slowly formed over the reaches of the Pacific.

Some of us were marked for greatness that night, and some of us for mediocrity in music. Some of us could never know what random options would face us and what ultimate road we would travel. One thing we all did share, however, was the richness of Koussevitzky's gift in bringing tyros and masters together in this beautiful period of sharing.

The recipe of Mrs. O. D. Anzalone of Whiting which placed in the recent Delmarva cooking contest, of which we wrote last week, follows.

ADDISON CO.
INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY 5,660

JUL 2 1970

New England Newsclip

July 28 Tanglewood Goes 'On Parade'

BOSTON, Mass. — The annual day- long Tanglewood-on-Parade program at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home on July 28, is to be a double celebration this year. It celebrates the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school for advanced music study, and it honors composer Aaron Copland, long associated with the center, as he approaches his 70th birthday.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by the Boston Symphony's then music director, Serge Koussevitzky, as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream. Talented young musicians from this country and abroad gather for an intensive eight-week session of study and performance. Aaron Copland recognized as one of America's great composers, headed the composition department for 25 years from the time of the Berkshire Music Center's founding. Pianist-conductor, Lukas Foss, also renowned as a composer, was a member of the center's first class in 1940, as was Leonard Bernstein, now advisor to Tanglewood. Seiji Ozawa, an artistic director for Tanglewood, came to study at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky's successor as music director of the Boston Symphony. While there as a student, Ozawa won the Koussevitzky prize, given annually to the year's outstanding young conductor at Tanglewood.

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
(M) 28,940
JUN 8 1970
New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh – Tanglewood Turns 30

By ROSE WALSH

Tuesday, July 28, will be a big celebration day at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lenox.

Featuring the annual day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade program of music, the event will celebrate the 30th anniversary of Berkshire Center, founded in 1940 by BSO's then music director, Serge Koussevitsky.

It will also honor Aaron Copland as he approaches his 70th birthday. He is widely recognized as one of America's best contemporary composers and long associated with the Center (summer school for advanced music study).

Each year Tanglewood-on-Parade begins at 2 p. m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center's students.

It culminates at 8:30 in the evening with a Gala Concert in the Music Shed and fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

This year Copland conducts the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras and Lukas Foss (a member of the Center's first class in 1940), widely known as a composer, is pianist/conductor with the BSO.

Another renowned 1940 alumnus, Leonard Bernstein, now adviser to Tanglewood, will have his Candide overture played by the BSO and conducted by Copland to open the program.

Copland will conduct his Suite from The Tender Land and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, a work closely associated with Koussevitsky.

Tickets for Tanglewood-on-Parade are priced at $3, $4.50, $5 and $6 with box seats $6.50. They are available by mail or in person at the box office, Tanglewood, Mass. 012401.

Rabbi Harold I. Saperstein, president of the New York Board of Rabbis, officiated at the nuptial ceremony of his son, Marc E. Saperstein, and Miss Roberta Shapiro, both graduate students at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, which took place last Wednesday at Temple Israel, Boston.

Rabbi Roland S. Gittelsohn of Temple Israel and president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis; Rabbi Sanford Saperstein, uncle of the bridegroom, and Rabbi Benzion Gold, director of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at Harvard University, assisted.

The bride, daughter of Dr. Robert Shapiro, an orthopedic surgeon, and Mrs. Shapiro of Brookline, is a graduate of the University of Chicago.

Her husband, a summa cum laude graduate of Harvard, is a rabbinical student on leave from the Hebrew Union College - Jewish Institute of Religion in New York.

A November wedding is in the planning for Mt. Ida College alumna Miss Shawna Mary Donovan and Robert Arthur Lavigne, as announced by the parents of the future bride, Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Donovan, Jr., of Larchmont, N. Y. The prospective bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Omer D. Lavigne of Leominister.

Miss Donovan is a provisional member of the Junior League of Larchmont. Her fiance, a student at Babson Institute of Business Administration, Wellesley, was graduated from Notre Dame High School, Fitchburg. He was staff sergeant with the First Infantry Division in Vietnam.

More to Come Mon A. M. . . .

Band.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
M-S 438,300
New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS FIRE
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, June 8, 1970

Kaleidoscope

By R. E. Krieger

THE TANGLEWOOD-on-Parade concert at Tangelwood this year will be on July 28 with usual demonstration of work by the students at the Berkshire Music Center beginning at 2 p.m. the day-long celebration will culminate in the Gala Concert in the Music Shed beginning at 8:30 p.m.

Aaron Copland will conduct the Boston Symphony in the overture to "Candide" by Bernstein, the Berkshire Music Center orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber," and the combined Berkshire Center and Boston Symphony Orchestras in his own suite from "The Tender Land" and the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet."

Lukas Foss will also be on hand to conduct the Boston Symphony in Bach's "Piano Concerto in D Minor" in which he will also be piano soloist.

The concert is a double celebration . . . for the 30th anniversary of the Music Center and in honor of Copland as he nears his 70th birthday.

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE
a day-long celebration culminating with the . . .
GALA CONCERT
JULY 28/SHED/8:30 P.M. in honor of
AARON COPLAND'S
70th Birthday
The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Bernstein: 'Candide' overture
AARON COPLAND conductor
Bach: Piano concerto in D minor
LUKAS FOSS conductor/pianist
The BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
Hindemith: Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber
AARON COPLAND conductor
The Combined BOSTON SYMPHONY and BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRAS
Copland: 'The Tender Land' Suite
Tchaikovsky: Romeo and Juliet
Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl following the concert.
Tickets: $3, $4.50, $5, $6, $6.50
TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS. 01240
(413) 637-1600

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500
JUL - 1970
New England Newsclip

Fireworks and musical festivities culminate Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day-long demonstration of the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, which begins at 2:00 p.m. on Tuesday, July 28. The evening concert is performed by the Boston Symphony with the Music Center Orchestra (8:30 p.m.): Bernstein's Candide Overture, conducted by Aaron Copland; Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor conducted and played by Lukas Foss; Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber by Hindemith; Copland's Suite from The Tender Land; and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. Tickets ($4.50-$6.50) from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140. Unreserved tickets, $3.00, available at the gate. 413-637-1600.

BEST BETS

THE TANGLEWOOD - SARATOGA LAKE GEORGE area is in full cultural bloom during August, and the attractions are many, varied and of highest quality.

Tuesday is the annual Tanglewood-On-Parade salute to the Berkshire Music Center, with events starting at 2 p.m. The festivities this year are the inniversary of the center itself.

In the evening, Copland will conduct a concert featuring both the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. In addition the suite from his own opera "The Tender Land," Copland will conduct music of Bernstain, Hindemith and Tchaikovsky, and with Lukas Foss as soloist, the Bach D minor piano concerto.

The Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts will feature Beethoven, with conductors William Stainberg and Antal Dorati, and pianists Claude Frank, Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 41,961 SUN. 423,790
JUL 26 1970

Potpourri

Nothing Worthy Departs

By Celine Slator

A big celebration is planned at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center on July 28. The event marks the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Center which was founded on 1940 by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the BSO.

Also honored will be Aaron Copland as he approaches his 70th birthday. He is widely recognized as one of America's best contemporary composers and has long been associated with the Center which is a summer school for advanced music study.

The celebration takes the form of the annual day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade program of music which starts at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center students. It culminates at 8:30 p.m. with a Gala Concert in the Music Shed followed by fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

Copland will conduct along with Lukas Foss, member of the 1940 class and a noted composer, pianist and conductor, himself. Another well known alumnus, Leonard Bernstein, an adviser to Tanglewood, will have his Candide Overture played by the BSO. Copland's Suite from The Tender Land will be heard along with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, a work closely associated with Koussevitzky.

For at least three of us in Middlebury the 30th anniversary will be meaningful for we were a part of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940. All of us had the same interests but somewhat different immediate concerns. One thing we did share in common was the Berkshire Music Center chorus and it was this group that gave the Randall Thompson "Alleluia" chorus its first reading as the center officially opened and later appeared in the magnificent Bach Mass in B Minor toward the end of the summer.

It was a privilege to be at Tanglewood in 1940 for it marked the culmination of a dream of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to have a center of this kind where serious students could come to work with masters in various fields of music and the beginning of the dream turning reality. By later standards the group was not very large, about 400 of us. When we returned the next summer of 1941 that enrollment was larger and it increased even as we returned as a critic for a large daily before World War II forced the closing of the Center for the Duration.

Lukas Foss was certainly there that summer as was Leonard Bernstein. So, too, were Richard Horner Bales, long the distinguished conductor of the National Gallery Sinfonieta, Richard Korn, conductor of several major symphonies and guest conductor of many; Thor Johnson, then the conductor of the Michigan; Ariana Bronstein, daughter of the famous violin teacher in New York, who later became known as Ariana Bronne, a fine violinist; one of our rommates, Eunice Albert, who has gone on to be a top-notch contralto and oratorio luminary. And literally a host of others.

One of our courses was with the late Olin Downes, for years the famous music critic of The New York Times, This took the form of six lectures and discussions on the over-all topic of "Integrity and Music." These had to do with the composer, the interpreter, the listener, the critic, the culmination of a great epoch of music in Europe and visions and problems of American music today—or today of 1940.

We had several lectures by Aaron Copland, one having to do with American Music and another on Music and the Movies. Another was an in-depth study of Till Eulenspiegel of Strauss and another was on Contemporary Music. Randall Thompson also gave several lectures having to do with musical knowledge, general knowledge and spiritual knowledge, and Roy Harris spoke on neo-classicism and modern classicism and his own Third Symphony.

Abram Chasins was also at Tanglewood that summer and gave us an excellent talk on the Bach B Minor Mass which even then we were rehearsing. Stanley Chappell, with whom we studied conducting, also appeared in formal lecture classes several times, each time analyzing various scores.

We also had a course with Howard Abell in music for the schools which ran all six weeks of the summer session, a course shared by Malcolm Holmes who was then on the Harvard faculty. But a high point, and one of our toughest courses, was one on composing with the giant of his day, Paul Hindemith.

That first year we lived somewhat of a dormitory life in that the Lenox School for Boys was turned over to the girls. But after breakfast we would head out the mile or so to Tanglewood and spend the day there. Lunch came out in a truck and from it we were served cafeteria style. However, a few cars were available, and some of us soon found out that there was a great restaurant in Lenox. In time that restaurant became a common gathering place for faculty, BSO members and students alike.

We went all day long, either in classes, discussions or rehearsals. Most evenings there was some kind of concert or rehearsal or even lecture to attend. In other words, we slept, ate and bathed in music right up to and including the annual Festival, itself, when for three weeks concerts drawing several thousand people would be held about three times a week.

Towering over the whole Center was Koussevitzky. His stamp was everywhere. His figure was formal or informal as befitted the occasion. We can remember sitting under a tree talking with him very personally one day. We can remember sitting in awe of him as he swept out of his car with a cape flowing in the breeze headed for the podium in the Music Shed and the BSO rehearsal.

Late in the summer we were all invited to his beautiful home for afternoon tea, the grounds sweeping down the hills which fell to the waters of the lake in Lee. Koussevitzky was the most warm and genial of hosts, giving no clue of the stern perfectionist he was at work.

How many memories come swarming back over the years. Great moments and little moments. We recall a birthday party given by one of our dormitory friends. She came from a wealthy family and her father had told her to have a party for herself at the nicest place she could find. Well, she found a sort of beer parlor in Lenox which was big enough for a sizable crowd. And she invited students and faculty alike. And, unwittingly, she provided entertainment. Gregor Piatagorsky at the 'cello and Lennie Bernstein at the piano, playing the "pop" music of the day.

Copland also got into the act and gave us some of the tunes from his movie scores. Even Hindemith sat down and walloped out some Strauss waltzes. And we danced and sang while tanks rumbled across the African desert and war clouds slowly formed over the reaches of the Pacific.

Some of us were marked for greatness that night, and some of us for mediocrity in music. Some of us could never know what random options would face us and what ultimate road we would travel. One thing we all did share, however, was the richness of Koussevitzky's gift in bringing tyros and masters together in this beautiful period of sharing.

The recipe of Mrs. O. D. Anzalone of Whiting which placed in the recent Delmarva cooking contest, of which we wrote last week, follows.

ADDISON CO.
INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY 5,660
JUL 2 1970
New England Newsclip

140

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Celebrate 2 Birthdays

Tanglewood-on-Parade will be a double celebration this season. The annual daylong affair, which begins at 2 p.m. on July 28, will mark the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center and will also honor composer Aaron Copland, who is approaching his 70th birthday. Copland headed the music department for 25 years after the Center was founded in 1940.

The program will begin with recitals by students at the Center, who spend eight weeks in summer training, and will conclude with a gala concert at 8:30 p.m. The concert will feature music associated with Tanglewood and Berkshire Music Center alumni. Copland will direct the Boston Symphony in performing Leonard Bernstein's "Candide," and Lukas Foss will both play and direct the symphony's presentation of Bach's Piano Concerto in D Minor. Both Bernstein and Foss were members of the Center's first graduating class.

Copland will also direct the Berkshire Music Center in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber," and will conduct the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras in his own suite from "The Tender Land," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Paul Hindemith taught at Tanglewood in 1940 and '41. The Tchaikovsky work is closely associated with Serge Koussevitzky, who founded the Berkshire Music Center.

Fireworks will follow the concert. Tickets for the event will be available after June 15, from the Tanglewood box office in Lenox.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS
(M) 62,455 (S) 1[illegible]

JUN 21 1970 New England Newsclip

Jacob's Pillow festival to offer varied fare

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The yearly pilgrimage to North America's mecca of the dance world is underway as dancers, choreographers, teachers, students and buffs are converging on Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival and School near Lee, Mass.

Founded 38 years ago by Ted Shawn, the festival is generally conceded to be the world's most comprehensive all-dance summer event.

The ten-week 1970 season of 65 performances runs from June 25 through Aug. 29.

Variety and scope of the program announced by Shawn and executive director John Christian should appeal to every taste. Internationally known dancers and new groups — from as far away as India and as near as New York's Harlem — will bring traditional and contemporary forms of ballet, modern and ethnic dance of the Ted Shawn Theater.

Principal Honors

Patricia McBride and Edward Villella, principals of the New York City Ballet will share first week honors with the North Carolina Dance Theater, directed by Robert Lindgren.

This versatile young professional company is an outgrowth of the North Carolina School of the Arts in Winston-Salem.

Opening gala matinee on Thursday, June 25 at 3 p.m. will be followed by repeat performances June 26 at 8:40 p.m.; also matinee and evening of June 27.

For tickets and information, write to Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Inc., Box 287, Lee, Mass. 01238, or phone (413) 24-0745.

MUSIC SCHOLARSHOPS and competition awards, adding up to thousands of dollars, are available annually in the Worcester area. For example, Young Artists Awards is giving $6,000 to 16 recipients for study during the 1970-1971 college year.

No scholarship is more heart-warming than the $200 given to a graduating senior by the mixed chorus of Doherty Memorial High School.

This is the chorus' own money given to one of its own on the basis of auditions and decided by a vote of the entire membership.

Miss Deborah Irvine is this year's recipient. She is a flutist and will major in music education at Boston University. This year, Miss Irvine was also co-winner of the first annual competition sponsored by the South Worcester Kiwanis. She is among the Young Artists Awards winners for the coming year.

THIS is a special year for anniversaries. First, it marks the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth in Bonn, Germany.

The first week in August, a gala will be held in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. to mark the 70th birthdays of the Philadelphia Orchestra and conductor Eugene Ormandy.

On July 28, Tanglewood-on-Parade will celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Misic Center and 70th birthday of composer Aaron Copland.

Tanglewood-on-Parade begins each year at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of students at the Center, summer educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It culminates at 8:30 p.m. with a gala concert in the huge Tanglewood music shed. This year, Copland conducts the Boston Symphony and Center orchestras in Bernstein's "Candide" Overture, Hindemith's Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber, his own suite from "Tender Land," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture.

Lukas Foss will be soloist while conducting the Boston Symphony in Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor.

BITTER PROTESTS are being heard from George Wein, producer of the Newport Jazz Festival.

"For over five years they have been burying jazz," says Wein. "By they, I mean music critics, Madison Avenue, and the communications media that are quick to promote whatever is the 'now' thing."

"The New York Times, for example, treats jazz as if it were an unwanted child, clamoring to be heard in the midst of louder and more popular musical brothers. The Times has its occasional reviews and articles on jazz, but it is obvious that its major concern is rock or pop, the music that celebrates the youth culture."

"Slowly but surely jazz is creeping back into the picture as topical music. Jazz does not need popularity to exist. All it needs is musicians to play it."

The 1970 Newport Jazz Festival is from July 10 to July 12.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Musical parade at Lenox

This week's events at the Berkshire Festival get under way Tuesday at 2 p.m. with Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual daylong demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, which concludes with a gala concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Aaron Copland conducts and Lukas Foss appears as piano soloist in works of Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky. A fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl follows the program.

A weekend of all-Beethoven concerts begins Friday at 7 p.m. with a chamber music program by violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode. William Steinberg conducts the orchestral concerts which begin Friday at 9 p.m. with Claude Frank as soloist in the Second Piano Concerto, and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. with Andre Watts as soloist in the Fourth Piano Concerto. Antal Dorati conducts the 2:30 p.m. concert next Sunday afternoon which features Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood takes place tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee and the University of Illinois Jazz Band.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Guide

LENOX, Mass. — Weekend concerts saluting Beethoven's bicentennial and festive Tanglewood-on-Parade program with a combined concert by the Boston Symphony and Music Center Orchestras highlight this week's performances at Tanglewood.

SUNDAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting; Haydn's Sym. 83; Mozart's Piano concerto A. P. 414, Christoph Eschenbach, soloist; Stravinsky's Concerto in D for orchestra; and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana."

TUESAY — Shed, gala concert at :30 p.m. A day-long demonstration of activities of the music center begin at 2 p.m. The concert program under the baton of Aaron Copland is as follows: Bernstein's "Candide" overture; Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor, Lukas Foss, soloist; Hindemith's Mathis der Mahler; Tchiakovk. y's Romeo and Juliet; and Copland's Suite from the Tender Land. Celebrates Copland's 70th birthday.

FRIDAY — Shed. Weekend prelude at 7 p.m., Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, Richard Goods; concert at 9 p.m., William Steinberg conducting; All Beethoven pro-3; Piano Concerto No. 2, Claude Frank, soloist; King Stephen Overture; and Sym. No. 8.

SATURDAY—Shed. Open rehearsal, 10 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg, conducting. All Beethoven program: Coriolan overture; Piano Concerto No. 4, Andre Watts, soloist; Sym. No. 4.

Phone (413) 637-1600 for reservations or tickets.

Tanglewood Parade Day Set Tuesday

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade activities wiill start Tuesday afternoon at 2. This year's festivities mark the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center as well as the 70th birthday of composer Aaron Copland. Copland was chairman of the faculty at the Center for 25 years.

The afternoon program will feature concerts, musical demonstrations and forums by students at the Center and Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Copland and Lukas Foss will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in the gala concert, starting at 8:30.

The evening will include Bernstein's "Candide," Bach's Piano Concerto in D Minor, Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber," Copland's suite from "The Tender Land" and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

A display of fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will follow.

berkshire week

The Summer Magazine of The Berkshire Eagle and Torrington Register

JULY 25 – AUGUST 2, 1970

The Who Takes Over at Tanglewood

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS

Fillmore at Tanglewood

Once again, Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting programs with outstanding contemporary artists.

Tuesday, July 7, Tuesday, July 21 and Tuesday August 18 in the Shed, music beginning at 6 pm

Additional artist information will be announced in the weeks prior to the concerts.

berkshire week

The Summer Magazine of The Berkshire Eagle and Torrington Register

JULY 25 – AUGUST 2, 1970

The Who Takes Over at Tanglewood

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS

Fillmore at Tanglewood

Once again, Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting programs with outstanding contemporary artists.

Tuesday July 7, Tuesday July 21 and Tuesday Aug. 4 in the Shed, music beginning at 6 pm

Additional artist information will be announced in the weeks prior to the concert.

Tanglewood Offers Rock Music Artists

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUN 26 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX —Once again Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting programs with outstanding contemporary artists.

The 1970 series of three Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood features The Who, Joe Cocker, and Stantana.

The Who having just completed two sold - out performances of their rock opera Tommy in Manhattan's Metropolitan Opera House, will be featured in the firs t concert on Tuesday, July 7.

Joe Cocker, the sensational English rock - blues artist, who appeared at Woodstock last summer and is now featured in the film "Woodstock," will be presented on Tuesday, July 21.

The final concert, Tuesday, August 18 headlines Santana, the newest sensation in the field of rock music. Remaining artists will be announced shortly.

Reserved seats are now on sale at the Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. Admission to the lawn goes on sale the day of the concert.

Coda: Richard Tucker Sings in Lynn June 28

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUN 19 1970 New England Newsclip

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

THE GREATEST — Enlivening this musically slack month will be the June 28 appearance in Lynn of Richard Tucker, once described by Time Magazine as "the greatest tenor in the world." His concert will take place at 7:45 p.m. in Lynn City Hall Memorial Auditorium. It is being sponsored by the North Shore Council of Hadassah Presidents, and tickets may be obtained from P.O. Box 43, Swampscott, 01907.

DEREVERBERATION — Dr. Thomas G. Stockham Jr., a computer scientist at the University of Utah, is perfecting a method of "resurrecting" the voices of recording artists from antique records of the distant past. According to Stockham, sound waves from recordings can be fed into a computer, converted into numbers and then rerecorded on numerical tapes. "By using a complex, delicate and precise program in the computer, we can manipulate these numbers with the hope of reversing the original recording process and coming back out with sounds that have objectionable resonances removed," he added.

The process is called "numerical dereverberation," and has been used successfully on pre-1921 recordings of the great Italian tenor Enrico Caruso.

SUMMER FESTIVALS — Vermont's Marlboro Music Festival will open its 20th Anniversary season Saturday, July 11. Pablo Casals, renowned 93-year-old cellist and conductor, will again be in residence, as will Rudolf Serkin, Leon Kirchner and many other distinguished musicians.

Unlimited rehearsal time is the rule at Marlboro. Programs are made up from works in progress only a day or two before performance and thus there is generally no advance information about works to be played. Ticket information may be obtained from Box R., Marlboro, Vermont 05344.

Bill Graham's Fillmore East is again collaborating with Tanglewood this summer in presenting a series of Contemporary Trends Concerts. Scheduled to appear this year are The Who (July 7), Joe Cocker (July 21), and Santana (August 18), the last of which is described by the ordinarily reserved BSO press release as "the newest sensation in the field of rock music."

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,818

JUL 2 1970

* * *

TRENDY: Bill Graham's Fillmore East brings three 6 p.m. Contemporary Trends concerts to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for rock and jazz fans. July 7 The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day; July 21—Joe Cocker, John Sebastian and The Preservation Hall Jazz Band; Aug. 18—Santana, Miles Davis, The Voices of East Harlem.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Modern Music At Tanglewood

Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood will feature The Who, Joe Cocker, and Santana.

Opening the series July 7, The Who will come from two sold-out performances of their rock opera "Tommy," at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. On July 21, Joe Cocker, English rock-blues artist who appeared at Woodstock last summer and is featured in the film "Woodstock," will be presented. Final concert will be August 18, when Santana will give a rock concert.

Tanglewood started this series the summer of 1968, and has attracted audiences of more than 20,000. Attractions have included The Who, Jefferson Airplane, and B.B. King.

WORLD MUSIC AT TRENDS CONCERT

Tanglewood is again presenting a series of Contemporary Trends concerts, with Bill Graham and Fillmore East again collaborating on two occasions: Tuesday evenings, July 21 and Aug. 18 with Joe Cocker and Santana respectively, as headliners.

These explorations into the world of contemporary non-classical music were initiated during the summer of 1968 when three concerts featured folk-singer Judy Collins, jazz artists Don Ellis and the Modern Jazz Quartet, Indian artist Ravi Shankar, and The Association. Last season, Contemporary Trends Concerts featured Janis Joplin, Tim Hardin, Joni Mitchell, and Mahalia Jackson.

Other Contemporary Trends Concerts this summer will be held in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall on July 14, July 27, and Aug. 4.

TRENDS CONCERT #1

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

18,874 Jam Tanglewood Rock Session

STOCKBRIDGE — Fans of The Who, Jethro Tull, the Jashua Light and the TV Show and "It's a Beautiful Day" gave state, Lenox and Stockbridge, trafic police a hard night Tuesday around Tanglewood.

20,000 Plus

A total of 18,784 paid customers attended the Fillmore East program. Determine d traffic headed toward the Tanglewood Music Shed late in the afternoon and large groups continued to arrive at the gate two hours after the contemporary trends concert began.

Buses came from many parts of New York state and Connecticut in addition to several dozen from Berkshire summer camps.

The audience consisted mainly of hippie-style youths, in a weird variety of dress and hairdos, but there was a noticeably large segment of the middle aged and elderly with their lawn chairs, blankets and picnic lunches.

Many of the young people arrived with knapsacks planning to stay overnight in the area. One young man had come from Kansas City, Mo.

As many as 200 were unpaid customers who made several charges on the fence and press gate. During one of the charges, a gate attendant was felled by the rush he attempted to block.

Several other attempts at gate-charging were stymied by Stockbridge police and the 40 Berkshire County deputy sheriffs who were assisting.

Some of the organizers paced the lines, shouting "Let's charge the pigs."

Tanglewood officials had 160 attendants on the grounds and traffic was controlled by radio-equipped special officers.

The Tanglewoood grounds were jammed to capacity with cars and additional vehicles were observed parked by the hundreds on adjacent meadows and lots. Police at Lenox were urging drivers not to approach the area unless they felt they had to attend the concert.

The American flag appeared in the form of shirts, skirts and other garb.

Many young children in the 4 to 10 age group played games on the well-kept lawns as their mothers concentrated on the music.

At a late hour, no injuries had been reported and no arrests made, although several agitators were escorted from the grounds before the concert was over.

(See Review on Page 8)

Whitestone

A YOUTHFUL CROWD of 18,784 Rock fans jammed Tanglewood last night for a contemporary concert by The Who. Many watched the concert on a giant television screen erected on the lawn. The youngsters, entranced by the music, were generally orderly with only one arrest reported. A review is on Page 17.

B.E July 8 1970

Tanglewood Offers Rock Music Artists

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
JUN 26 1970
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX —Once again Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting programs with outstanding contemporary artists.

The 1970 series of three Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood features The Who, Joe Cocker, and Stantana.

The Who having just completed two sold - out performances of their rock opera Tommy in Manhattan's Metropolitan Opera House, will be featured in the firs t concert on Tuesday, July 7.

Joe Cocker, the sensational English rock - blues artist, who appeared at Woodstock last summer and is now featured in the film "Woodstock," will be presented on Tuesday, July 21.

The final concert, Tuesday, August 18 headlines Santana, the newest sensation in the field of rock music. Remaining artists will be announced shortly.

Reserved seats are now on sale at the Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. Admission to the lawn goes on sale the day of the concert.

Coda: Richard Tucker Sings in Lynn June 28

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

THE GREATEST — Enlivening this musically slack month will be the June 28 appearance in Lynn of Richard Tucker, once described by Time Magazine as "the greatest tenor in the world." His concert will take place at 7:45 p.m. in Lynn City Hall Memorial Auditorium. It is being sponsored by the North Shore Council of Hadassah Presidents, and tickets may be obtained from P.O. Box 43, Swampscott, 01907.

DEREVERBERATION — Dr. Thomas G. Stockham Jr., a computer scientist at the University of Utah, is perfecting a method of "resurrecting" the voices of recording artists from antique records of the distant past. According to Stockham, sound waves from recordings can be fed into a computer, converted into numbers and then re-recorded on numerical tapes. "By using a complex, delicate and precise program in the computer, we can manipulate these numbers with the hope of reversing the original recording process and coming back out with sounds that have objectionable resonances removed," he added.

The process is called "numerical dereverberation," and has been used successfully on pre-1921 recordings of the great Italian tenor Enrico Caruso.

SUMMER FESTIVALS — Vermont's Marlboro Music Festival will open its 20th Anniversary season Saturday, July 11. Pablo Casals, renowned 93-year-old cellist and conductor, will again be in residence, as will Rudolf Serkin, Leon Kirchner and many other distinguished musicians.

Unlimited rehearsal time is the rule at Marlboro. Programs are made up from works in progress only a day or two before performance and thus there is generally no advance information about works to be played. Ticket information may be obtained from Box R., Marlboro, Vermont 05344.

Bill Graham's Fillmore East is again collaborating with Tanglewood this summer in presenting a series of Contemporary Trends Concerts. Scheduled to appear this year are The Who (July 7), Joe Cocker (July 21), and Santana (August 18), the last of which is described by the ordinarily reserved BSO press release as "the newest sensation in the field of rock music."

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
New England Newsclip

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 68,[illegible]
JUL 2 1970

* * *

TRENDY: Bill Graham's Fillmore East brings three 6 p.m. Contemporary Trends concerts to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for rock and jazz fans. July 7 The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day; July 21—Joe Cocker, John Sebastian and The Preservation Hall Jazz Band; Aug. 18—Santana, Miles Davis, The Voices of East Harlem.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247
JUL 2 1970
New England Newsclip

Modern Music At Tanglewood

Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood will feature The Who, Joe Cocker, and Santana.

Opening the series July 7, The Who will come from two sold-out performances of their rock opera "Tommy," at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. On July 21, Joe Cocker, English rock-blues artist who appeared at Woodstock last summer and is featured in the film "Woodstock," will be presented. Final concert will be August 18, when Santana will give a rock concert.

Tanglewood started this series the summer of 1968, and has attracted audiences of more than 20,000. Attractions have included The Who, Jefferson Airplane, and B.B. King.

WORLD MUSIC AT TRENDS CONCERT

Tanglewood is again presenting a series of Contemporary Trends concerts, with Bill Graham and Fillmore East again collaborating on two occasions: Tuesday evenings, July 21 and Aug. 18 with Joe Cocker and Santana respectively, as headliners.

These explorations into the world of contemporary non-classical music were initiated during the summer of 1968 when three concerts featured folk-singer Judy Collins, jazz artists Don Ellis and the Modern Jazz Quartet, Indian artist Ravi Shankar, and The Association. Last season, Contemporary Trends Concerts featured Janis Joplin, Tim Hardin, Joni Mitchell, and Mahalia Jackson.

Other Contemporary Trends Concerts this summer will be held in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall on July 14, July 27, and Aug. 4.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 8 1970
New England Newsclip

18,874 Jam Tanglewood Rock Session

STOCKBRIDGE — Fans of The Who, Jethro Tull, the Jashua Light and the TV Show and "It's a Beautiful Day" gave state, Lenox and Stockbridge, trafic police a hard night Tuesday around Tanglewood.

20,000 Plus

A total of 18,784 paid customers attended the Fillmore East program. Determine d traffic headed toward the Tanglewood Music Shed late in the afternoon and large groups continued to arrive at the gate two hours after the contemporary trends concert began.

Buses came from many parts of New York state and Connecticut in addition to several dozen from Berkshire summer camps.

The audience consisted mainly of hippie-style youths, in a weird variety of dress and hairdos, but there was a noticeably large segment of the middle aged and elderly with their lawn chairs, blankets and picnic lunches.

Many of the young people arrived with knapsacks planning to stay overnight in the area. One young man had come from Kansas City, Mo.

As many as 200 were unpaid customers who made several charges on the fence and press gate. During one of the charges, a gate attendant was felled by the rush he attempted to block.

Several other attempts at gate-charging were stymied by Stockbridge police and the 40 Berkshire County deputy sheriffs who were assisting.

Some of the organizers paced the lines, shouting "Let's charge the pigs."

Tanglewood officials had 160 attendants on the grounds and traffic was controlled by radio-equipped special officers.

The Tanglewoood grounds were jammed to capacity with cars and additional vehicles were observed parked by the hundreds on adjacent meadows and lots. Police at Lenox were urging drivers not to approach the area unless they felt they had to attend the concert.

The American flag appeared in the form of shirts, skirts and other garb.

Many young children in the 4 to 10 age group played games on the well-kept lawns as their mothers concentrated on the music.

At a late hour, no injuries had been reported and no arrests made, although several agitators were escorted from the grounds before the concert was over.

(See Review on Page 8)

Whitestone

A YOUTHFUL CROWD of 18,784 Rock fans jammed Tanglewood last night for a contemporary concert by The Who. Many watched the concert on a giant television screen erected on the lawn. The youngsters, entranced by the music, were generally orderly with only one arrest reported. A review is on Page 17.

Music Review

The Who Concert at Tanglewood

By ANNE-GERARD FLYNN

HARD ROCK hit Tanglewood last night and the stones are probably still crumbling from the impact. A near record of 18,784 young people, gathered since yesterday morning for the 6 p.m. concert of The Who, were completely hypnotized by the English group. Responding to the organic beat of the group's guitars and drums, the youngsters packed the Shed and surrounding lawn to chant, scream, dance and wave their hands in victorious solidarity.

Two other groups, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day, also appeared with The Who, who performed last year at Tanglewood to a record crowd of 22,173.

There were no major disturbances among the young people, many of them shirtless and smoking a variety of products. Among the 18,000 only one arrest was reported. George W. Jackson, an 18-year-old musician from Scotia, N.Y., was brought before Lee District Court Judge John J. Dwyer this morning on a charge of disturbing the peace.

The student marshals did their best to contain the crowd, which jammed forward toward the end of the concert.

Joshua Television had erected a large video screen on the lawn, and the teen-agers lounged in small groups, munching on bread and cookies. Many carried knapsacks and sleeping bags and wore dungarees. A few beach balls, Frisbees and bubbles passed among the crowd with its usual assortment of long-hairs, "dandelion tops" and bandana scarves. However, the teen-agers kept mostly to themselves, conveying the distinct impression that they were there not to make love or noise but to hear their favorite music.

Hear it they did. The Who was tribal, sensuous, loud. Their music was well-phrased, rising and falling like the soft outline of the surrounding Berkshire mountains. The group did arrangements from its rock-opera "Tommy," which ran last month at the Metropolitan Opera, and a few new songs.

* * *

HARD ROCK can be hard to take. It is not like Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," during which one's mind can escape into an idyllic nature. It is completely physical. The vibrations are first felt in the feet, then creep upward into the leg muscles until one's head is quite unconsciously gyrating with the blood music. The young audience seemed to thrive on this physical stimulus. They identified themselves with the songs of The Who ("I Don't Even Know Myself") and clapped intensely to the blaring music of Peter Townshend (lead guitar), Roger Daltry (lead vocals), John Enwistle (bass) and Keith Moon (drums).

I found The Who, geared for a high school audience, a bit too exploitive and commercialized. Rock is a very individual and physical experience. The Jethro Tull was my "bread" for the evening. Their name is derived from an 18th-century inventor who devised a seed-hole drill that incorporated an organ pedal. They gave a concert that was as professional and as demanding as any Boston Symphony performance. Their music was a kind of liquid version of hard rock, rather surrealistic and classic. Ian Anderson, who resembled a cross between Fagin and a satyr, played a most lively flute. His fingering was as flexible as his comic leaps across the stage, supposedly interpreting the music. Clive Bunker poured himself out on the drums for an outstanding 15-minute solo. The other members of the group, Glenn Cornick (bass), Martin Lancelot Barre (lead guitar) and John Evan (keyboard), teamed up to produce Rock as powerful as a train steaming down the tracks.

* * *

THE BEAUTIFUL DAY people were the epitome of Rock culture. Their music was forthright and atom-smashing. Indeed, you felt bombarded with sounds that, if they didn't blow your mind, were sure to blow your ears. Vocalist Dave LaFlamme seemed to be plugged into the socket meant for his electric violin. The six-man group did a variation on a barn dance, performed at Boeing 747 speed, which particularly aroused the audience.

Bill Graham of Fillmore East, which collaborates in producing Tanglewood's contemporary trends concerts, announced that Joe Crocker would not appear in the series, possibly being replaced by Jimi Hendrix.

Last night's concert was well-chosen to launch this year's Contemporary Trends. All the musicians were artists, producing sounds that reflect the vibrations of modern life. It was a liberating experience. If that's Who liberates you.

Whitestone

EVERYBODY KNEW WHO was performing on the Tanglewood stage last night as The Who, one of the country's leading rock groups, drew an audience of more than 18,000. Those outside the Shed saw the performance on a giant TV screen.

BILL GRAHAM PRESENTS
THE FILLMORE AT TANGLEWOOD
Tuesday, July 7, 1970 at 6 p.m.
THE WHO
&
JETHRO TULL
&
IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY
also Joshua Television
Reserved Seats: $5, $6, $7;
Lawn Seats are available Noon the day of concert at $4.
Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. (413) 637-1600

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

"Freakies" jam Tanglewood for music program

More than 25,000 spectators — most of them "freakies" — jammed Tanglewood last night for the first contemporary music program of the season at the Lenox music center.

The five-hour program, with such attractions as The Who, Jethro Tull, Joshua Light Show and It's a Beautiful Day, drew a paid attendance of 18,874 and several thousand other persons admitted after the intermission.

Although the audience was considered orderly by police, about 30 youths were arrested, including two who ran on stage shouting revolutionary slogans.

Several attempts at gate crashing by an estimated 200 youths occurred early in the evening, resulting in a gate attendant being knocked down, but otherwise the youths were unsuccessful.

Lenox police were aided by police from Lee and Stockbridge and by state police and deputy sheriffs in handling the crowd and motor traffic. Several cars had to be towed from alongside roadways in the

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Stomping on the Tanglewood Lawns

By GENIE ZUST

The Fillmore East came to Tanglewood for the second year last night with The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day and the Joshua Light and TV Show.

Apt Start

The show started aptly enough with the group named It's a Beautiful Day at 6 p.m.

The stage was crowded with the full electrified symphony of machines, mikes and mixers and the sellout audience of 18,784 played on classic lawns and informal gardens, tossing beach balls and frisbees and blowing colored soap bubbles.

Grey-haired ladies smiled at the beaded teen multitude.

It's a Beautiful Day warmed up the house. David Laflamme tuned up his electrified violin and the group got a weird sound mix of cornpone fiddle, acid rock and Saint-Saens Dance of Death.

Although the mikes went dead in their first set, they cotinued to play in a silent pantomime of frenzy until the sound returned.

On Camera

Three TV cameras took color pictures of all the live action, both on and off stage.

Jethro Tull came on to a standing ovation. The group launched into The Thing is Easy and the hall came to life. Ian Anderson, a manic pied piper in a tattered Dickensian maxicoat, enlivened the audience. He used his flute as an extension of his voice and turned his solos into a full orchestra plus chorus and sound effects.

Two young men then ran on stage shouting revolution and were promptly tossed off stage into the waiting arms of Chief Obie Obanhein of Alice's Restaurant fame. The Tull played a new song from a new album and moved their audience at will.

As a special Tanglewood feature they did a bit of Beethoven's Sonata in A, electrified and rocked. The audience roared its approval and wouldn't let them go. They encored to shattering stomping.

Then came The Who, who have written what is probably the first formal rock masterpiece, the Rock Opera Tommy. By this time the expectant thousands had jammed the aisles in anticipation and the scream of welcome may have been heard for at least two miles.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800
JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Rock Group Concert At Tanglewood

By GEORGE Wm. MURPHY

As part of this summer's Contemporary Trends at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center, in conjunction with the Fillmore East, presented The Who, Jethro Tull and It's A Beautiful Day, last night.

When It's A Beautiful Day started their performance shortly after 6 p.m. most of the 18,874 person audience had not settled themselves.

The three year old San Francisco group led by violinist David Lafilamme provided background music for thousands of picnickers out on the lawn.

Second on stage was Jethro Tull. The group includes Ian Anderson (flute, harmonica, vocals), Clive Bunker (drums), Glen Cornick (bass), Martin Barre (guitar) and John Evan (keyboards).

Only on the scene for two years, the group has released three albums in this country, their latest effort titled "Benefit." They wound through the majority of their recordings before a gleeful audience that in some cases had come to see only them.

Then came The Who. Nik Cohn of the New York Times summed up the group's most recent two albums by saying, "'Tommy' is rock's first formal masterpiece. 'Live at Leeds' is the definite hard rock holocaust. It is the best live rock album ever made."

There was a long wait for the equipment managers to get the stage set up. As the lights went down all the audience could see were over 10,000 watts worth of HiWatt amps stacked one on top of another, all across the stage.

"From England, The Who"

The audience rose to their feet, many standing on chairs. The group ground out a few songs from their up-coming album and then moved into a few oldies. Can't Explain (from The Magic Bus) and Young Man Blues (from Live At Leeds).

Then Peter Townsend, lead guitarist and author of most of the group's material, walked to his mike:

"This is the last conecrt on this tour, a tour that started in New York, at the Metropolitan. At the start of the tour we decided that the met would be our last performance of 'Tommy,' the rock opera. But we'd like to try one last bash at it."

Then what was probably the last performance ever of the now famous opera started.

The Who were more subdued than usual, and as a result they also sounded better than ever before. Townsend still did splits in the air and "windmilled" his guitar, but spent more time than usual just concentrating on playing.

Lead singer Roger Daltry put on his usual performance, spinning his microphone around like a lasso on 10 feet of cord, and frequently falling back into the amps. Bassist John Entwistle and drummer Kieth Moon just sat back quietly and played furiously, supporting the two leaders.

About two-thirds of the opera was performed. Among the songs eliminated were "Cousin Kevin" and "Underture." Overall, the group came across quite well and the audience loved it. At the completion of the opera, Townsend dedicated their first hit, "My Generation" to the audience. The song started off normally and then swung into a medley of songs from "Tommy" which completed their no encore performance that had lasted well over two hours.

Although The Who have abandoned their practice of destroying all their equipment Townsend completed the performance by smashing a $300 Gibson SG guitar on the stage.

For the benefit of the patrons on the lawn, there was a giant screen with video magnification in color, run by Joshua Television. The closed circuit channel is run by Joshua White, who organized the now famous Joshua Light Show, resident light show at the Fillmore East in New York.

Also for those on the lawn, The Who used a new sound system, which included a 4,000 watt P.A. system for lead singer Daltry.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Plays To Youth Tonight

Bos Symph.

LENOX — Forty deputy sheriffs will be on hand as Tanglewood rocks tonight, but their jobs are expected to be routine.

A larger-than-normal and younger-than-usual audience (for Tanglewood) is predicted as the classical music center offers the first of six "Contemporary Trends" concerts scheduled this year, the third for the program.

Last year more than 22,000 turned out to hear The Who, one of the groups to play tonight. Lenox police and festival officials see no problems such as a "Woodstock" rerun.

Police anticipate traffic problems instead of trouble. Sheriff John D. Courtney has assigned 40 deputies to assist in traffic control and general patrol duty in and around the grounds of the music center.

Harry Stedman of Dalton, personnel director for the festival, said he expects no tremendous influx of outsiders like those who turned a festival in Georgia into a pot celebration.

He said local summer camps buy up blocks of tickets for the Comtemporary Trends concerts, and there is expected to be a large influx of rock enthusiasts from the county area and nearby states but no mass invasion. There have been no problems in the past two years, Stedman said.

Performing tonight are The Who, It's a Beautiful Day, Joshua Television and Jethro Tull.

A spokesman at the Curtis Hotel, asked if there has been a deluge of lodging requests for the music said most of the "overnighters" sleep under the stars because they don't have enough money for rooms.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Contemporary Concert At Tanglewood

Bos Symph.

Tonight, the first of six "Contemporary Trends" concerts will be presented at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Area police are preparing for traffic problems, as last year more than 22,000 came to hear one of the rock groups that will perform tonight. Sheriff John D. Courtney will have 40 deputies on duty to direct traffic, and generally patrol the music center grounds.

Groups participating in the concert tonight include: The Who, It's a Beautiful Day, Joshua Television and Jethro Tull.

TONIGHT at 6 P.M.

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS

Berkshire Music Center

Bill Graham presents Fillmore at Tanglewood

THE WHO
JETHRO TULL
IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY

in the SHED / music begins at 6 p.m.

Tickets: $5, 6, 7 Lawn: $4 (available day of concept)

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,800

JUL 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Contemporary Trends Concerts Series Begin

The first of six Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood took place on Tuesday, July 7, at 6 p.m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed.

Contemporary Trends were first given at Tanglewood during the summer of 1968 when three concerts featured folk-singer Judy Collins, jazz artists Don Ellis and the Modern Jazz Quartet, Indian artist Ravi Shankar, and The Association. Last season, Contemporary Trends Concerts featured Janis Joplin, Tim Hardin, Joni Mitchell, and Mahalia Jackson. Bill Graham and Fillmore East first collaborated with Tanglewood for the final concert of last summer.

This season, Tanglewood and Bill Graham collaborate on two other occasions: Tuesday evenings, July 21 and August 18, with Joe Cocker and Santana, respectively, as headliners. Other Contemporary Trends Concerts will be held in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall on July 14, July 27, and August 4.

Reserved seats for the July 7 Trends Concert can be purchased from The Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Tickets for The Lawn are on sale the day of the concert only. Tickets can also be purchased in New York City at the Fillmore East Box Office, 105 Second Avenue.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

Tanglewood Schedules Rock Concert July 7

LENOX — "The Who" will make its second appearance at Tanglewood on July 7 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore Producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center.

Also on the bill for this 6 p. m. concert are Jethro Tull and "It's a Beautiful Day."

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office. Reserved seats are available by mail at $5, $6 and $7 with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc."

A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, 01240. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at noon the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4.

Last year's Fillmore concert, which featured "The Who," "Jefferson Airplane" and B.B. King drew a Tanglewood record crowd of 22,000 and since then "The Who" has presented the rock opera "Tommy" in the Metropolitan Opera House, also produced by Bill Graham and the Fillmore organization.

For the benefit of the lawn audience there will be two giant television screens providing complete simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Limited.

ROCK AT TANGLEWOOD: Returning Tuesday night for its second appearance at Tanglewood is The Who, sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham. Also on the bill for this 6 p.m. concert are Jethro Tull and It's A Beautiful Day. Anticipating a huge crowd (last year's Fillmore concert drew 22,000), the

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUL 1 1970

Rock Show at Tanglewood

The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's a Beautiful Day will appear at the Tanglewood Music Festival's Contemporary Trends Concert Tuesday at 6 p.m. at Lenox.

Tanglewood Schedules Top Name Rock Artists

LENOX — "The Who" will make its second appearance at Tanglewood, July 7 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore Producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center, Also on the bill for this 6 p.m. concert at "Jethro Tull" and "It's a Beautiful Day".

Last year's Fillmore Concert, which featured "The Who," "Jefferson Airplane" and "B. B. King," drew a featured crowd of 22,000 and since then "The Who" has gone on to even greater prestige and fame which was recently sonummated in a "farewell performance" of "Tommy" at the Metropolitan Opera House, also produced by Bill Graham and the Fillmore organization.

It is expected this year's bill will draw an equally enthusiastic crowd for the appearance of "Jethro Tull," who in the past year has replaced the "Rolling Stones" as England's second most popular group after the "Beatles" and "It's a Beautiful Day," a San Francisco group which has successfully assimilated jazz, rock and classical influences.

Who Concert Set Tonight In Lenox

Bill Graham's Fillmore East will feature The Who, Jethro Tull, It's a Beautiful Day, and Joshua Television in a Contemporary Trends concert tonight at 6 in the Tanglewood Music Shed in Lenox. Giant video screens will be provided for the lawn audience.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Pop notes . . .

HARVARD STADIUM: Mountain will replace Buddy Miles Big Band this Wednesday at the Schaefer Music Festival concert in Harvard Stadium. The performance as now scheduled includes Miles Davis, Mountain and Seatrain. Tickets are $2 and may be purchased at Gate 2 and at other locations throughout the area. Concerts begin at 8 p.m.

ROCK AT TANGLEWOOD: Returning Tuesday night for its second appearance at Tanglewood is The Who, sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham. Also on the bill for this 6 p.m. concert are Jethro Tull and It's A Beautiful Day. Anticipating a huge crowd (last year's Fillmore concert drew 22,000), the management has arranged simultaneous coverage of the concert on two giant television screens—for the benefit of the lawn audience.

CAPE LISTENING: After an earlier success at the Sheraton-Plaza, Him, He and Me have returned to Boston, this time to the Sheraton-Boston's Cafe Riviera. Offering its own unique sound in vocal and guitar music, the trio presents a variety of styles, including folk, country and pops.

At the Sheraton-Plaza's Merry-Go-Round one may now hear David Alexander, a young singer-pianist who has been described as "an American Charles Aznavour." The 24-year old entertainer has impressive credentials, having studied piano and theory at Juilliard and Eastman School of Music.

Providence Evening Bulletin, Thursday, July 2, 1970 coming up

By STUART FINE

BILL GRAHAM'S Fillmore Auditorium will move to Tanglewood. The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day will get it together next Tuesday evening, at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. Tickets are $4, $5, $6 and $7, and can be obtained by mail from Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood Event

BE 7-22-70

Contemporary Trends Concert Draws Well-Mannered 15,243

LENOX — A quiet, young, mostly well-mannered crowd of 15,243 persons turned out at Tanglewood last night for a 4½-hour concert, third in the Contemporary Trends series this season.

The attendance was considerably smaller, and less boisterous, than the 18,784 who turned out for the first concert of the season two weeks ago. As it was two weeks ago, however, the official attendance was swelled somewhat by persons who jumped fences to enter, such as the inviting four-foot fence to the right of the main gate.

Music Review on Page 10

Garb worn by the youngsters showed unconcern by some, who simply wore conventional clothes, to elaborate concern by others, who painted themselves, sewed decorations on their clothes or otherwise labored toward the exotic.

Almost lost in the variety of attire were the Levis and leather jackets of what was apparently a motorcycle club, which led to broadcast reports that the "Hells' Angels" were on hand.

Wine rather than beer seemed to be favored by last night's generation, although one young man lost an investment of at least $5 in hard liquor when he dropped his flask in the parking lot.

A small number of those spread about the lawn engaged in what was once called "necking," although with more passion than used to be commonly displayed in public. Most of the blanket crowd, however, seemed more interested in eating, talking, drinking, smoking, launching paper planes, looking at one another, and even listening to the music as the evening wore on.

Whitestone

Preservation Hall Jazz Band marches through the Shed.

group of girls from an area summer camp.

John Sebastian and Chicago seemed to arouse more interest in the crowd. At dusk, the efforts under way inside the Shed were projected via closed-circuit television onto screens mounted inside and outside.

This visual device, augmenting the acoustical devices which make rock music what it is today, also seemed to increase the audience's interest in the performers.

There were no arrests reported during the concert. Guards sporting T-shirts announcing "Fillmore at Tanglewood," who had accompanied the show from New York, reportedly tackled several gate-crashers and escorted them from the concert.

'Bad Trip'

The first-aid station reported that one unidentified youth was taken by ambulance to a Pittsfield hospital for treatment for a "bad trip" on LSD. Another youth suffering the same ailment was calmed by friends in the first-aid station and returned to hear the rest of the show.

At the end of the performance approximately 100 youths collected some of the litter strewn on the lawn and piled it neatly for collection. Police cruised the area with flashlights looking for abandoned items. They found, among other artifacts, several styrofoam ice buckets.

Cigarettes and rides were bummed and a balding counselor was heard instructing his charges that they "damn well better not get lost on the way to the bus."

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Padraic Spence

Chicago on stage at Tanglewood

Padraic Spence

TREE CLIMBING was among the many activities under way at Tanglewood last night during the third in a series of Contemporary Trends concerts. ~~There were~~ 15,234 present. Music review is on Page 10 and news report on Page 1, Section 2.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Jazz Welds Gap Of Generations

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — Another communal sharing happened last night at Tanglewood when the Fillmore presented Chicago, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

Happy Crowd

Gaily garbed people enamelled the grass in living mosaics. One could hardly see the grass for them.

The weather turned sunny and beautiful as camp kids ran about in free abandon and babies cried. Youngsters lent and gave money to others who had less, so that all could get tickets and enter to share the music.

The crowd was so happily enthusiastic they even applauded the records being played while the stage was being set up.

Then on came the New Orleans Dixieland living museum piece, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band, a group full of the beat of another crazy, dancing jazzing era.

Old Blind Dede Pierce and his wife Billie belted out "Bourbon Street" and "Hello Dolly" with 50 years of accumulated showmanship. They ended, as all good Dixieland bands should with "When the Saints Go Marching In," and they led a milling mad march around the huge hall followed by handclapping thousands.

Over the Bridge

It was superb and glorious corn, a joyful bridge over the generation gap.

John Sebastian gave one of his best performances ever easy and open, letting the audience call out favorites and sing and clap along. Looking like an early minstrel, he filled that airplane hangar of a hall and sang and talked to the folks. He played old blues, early rock and new stuff of his own.

The evening began in the 1920s and he took it through the 30s and 40s to today. He was a modern minstrel, gentle, humorous, innocent and tender.

The finale was Chicago. They brought the musical historical pageant up to now. By this time the audience was drawn into the aisles and fully into the music and being together with their thing.

It was a thouroughly gutsy and satisfying sharing of a concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

"Chicago" Featured Group Last Night At Tanglewood Trends Concert

By GEORGE Wm. MURPHY

Chicago was the featured group Tuesday night, at the second Contemporary Trends Concert of the summer at Tanglewood, Lenox.

The largely attended concert started at about 6:30 with the Preservation Hall Jazz Band from New Orleans, La. The group was lead by blind coronet player Dede Pierce, and his wife, Billie, on piano and vocals.

The group played music mostly recognizable only to a generation that had stayed clear of Tanglewood that night, but most of the people were able to recognize "Bourbon Street" and "Hello Dolly." Everybody also remembered "As The Saints Go Marching In" as three members of the band paraded aroundd the shed, followed by several hundred members of the audience gleefully clapping their hands.

There was a short delay while the stage was set up, and an elderly couple came and sat in the same row I was in. The fellow next to me asked them if they had come to see Chicago, to which they replied "No, we're from Arizona, we came to see Newark, N.J."

John B. Sebastian

Then John Sebastian came on. His guitar work and singing was surpassed only by his humor. A brilliant wit, in his dialogue as well as his songs, he kept the audience laughing and happy, rambling through many hits by the Lovin' Spoonfull, a group he started in New York, which disbanded in 1968, and continued to play a good deal of his own material including "I Had A Dream" and "You're A Big Boy Now."

Another highlight of the concert was when he played with his amp in a successful attempt to get it to sound "cheaper" so that he could belt out a version of "White Convertible" which was, in his own words, "the oldest one I can remember.

Sebastian was called back on stage for an encore and then called back a second time, though he had to stop playing because of an engagement later the same night in Boston.

Sebastian has done a great deal of recording with the Lovin' Spoonful, as well as contributing mouth harp to records by The Doors and Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young. He has a solo album titled "John B. Sebastian."

Next on stage was Michael Grando, who at age 18 had traveled to France to study under master Mime artist Marcel Marceau. Accompanied by his brother Richard on flute, his performance was, in the eyes of all present, very good, but very unappropriate.

Chicago

Then came the stars of the show, Chicago. The seven man group, including a three man horn section just didn't seem to make it. The music was good, the sound system was marvelous, and everything went smoothly. But, the band just didn't have the touch that the other performers had used. They couldn't really reach the audience, and became, at times, a noisy group of musicians, just standing up there putting people up-tight. Their music just didn't have the same personal feeling as the others, and though they were called back on stage for an encore, John B. Sebastian stole the show.

Tuesday night was the second concert of three this summer at Tanglewood, presented by Bill Graham and the Fillmore. Originally scheduled to take top billing at the show was Joe Cocker who became ill and was replaced by Chicago. On Aug. 18 Santana, Miles Davis, and the Voices of East Harlem will be featured.

NEWS-RECORDER
WORCESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,231

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

ENTERTAINMENT

NIGHT GAMES

Pat George

. . .CHICAGO put on a fantastic show at Tanglewood last Tuesday night. . . .Rumor has it that Paul McCartney is being swayed by $$$$$ to leave his farm in England to make an American tour sometime within the next year. . . .Did you know that over the past six months CREEDENCE CLEARWATER REVIVAL has grossed more than any other group on record? . . . .The JONESES will once again be featured at Shrewsbury High School's "Back To School" dance. They may be shocked at the number of people who flock to the dance, as the groups new album will be released about that time. . . .Do you have any information that you'd like printed? Send it to Pat George, NIGHT GAMES, 25 Exchange Street, Worcester, 01608.

Tanglewood Event

BE 7-22-70

Contemporary Trends Concert Draws Well-Mannered 15,243

LENOX — A quiet, young, mostly well-mannered crowd of 15,243 persons turned out at Tanglewood last night for a 4½-hour concert, third in the Contemporary Trends series this season.

The attendance was considerably smaller, and less boisterous, than the 18,784 who turned out for the first concert of the season two weeks ago. As it was two weeks ago, however, the official attendance was swelled somewhat by persons who jumped fences to enter, such as the inviting four-foot fence to the right of the main gate.

Music Review on Page 10

Garb worn by the youngsters showed unconcern by some, who simply wore conventional clothes, to elaborate concern by others, who painted themselves, sewed decorations on their clothes or otherwise labored toward the exotic.

Almost lost in the variety of attire were the Levis and leather jackets of what was apparently a motorcycle club, which led to broadcast reports that the "Hells' Angels" were on hand.

Wine rather than beer seemed to be favored by last night's generation, although one young man lost an investment of at least $5 in hard liquor when he dropped his flask in the parking lot.

A small number of those spread about the lawn engaged in what was once called "necking," although with more passion than used to be commonly displayed in public. Most of the blanket crowd, however, seemed more interested in eating, talking, drinking, smoking, launching paper planes, looking at one another, and even listening to the music as the evening wore on.

Whitestone

Preservation Hall Jazz Band marches through the Shed.

group of girls from an area summer camp.

John Sebastian and Chicago seemed to arouse more interest in the crowd. At dusk, the efforts under way inside the Shed were projected via closed-circuit television onto screens mounted inside and outside.

This visual device, augmenting the acoustical devices which make rock music what it is today, also seemed to increase the audience's interest in the performers.

There were no arrests reported during the concert. Guards sporting T-shirts announcing "Fillmore at Tanglewood," who had accompanied the show from New York, reportedly tackled several gate-crashers and escorted them from the concert.

'Bad Trip'

The first-aid station reported that one unidentified youth was taken by ambulance to a Pittsfield hospital for treatment for a "bad trip" on LSD. Another youth suffering the same ailment was calmed by friends in the first-aid station and returned to hear the rest of the show.

At the end of the performance approximately 100 youths collected some of the litter strewn on the lawn and piled it neatly for collection. Police cruised the area with flashlights looking for abandoned items. They found, among other artifacts, several styrofoam ice buckets.

Cigarettes and rides were bummed and a balding counselor was heard instructing his charges that they "damn well better not get lost on the way to the bus."

RANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Padraic Spence

Chicago on stage at Tanglewood

Padraic Spence

TREE CLIMBING was among the many activities under way at Tanglewood last night during the third in a series of Contemporary Trends concerts. There were 15,234 present. Music review is on Page 10 and news report on Page 1, Section 2.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Jazz Welds Gap Of Generations

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — Another communal sharing happened last night at Tanglewood when the Fillmore presented Chicago, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

Happy Crowd

Gaily garbed people enamelled the grass in living mosaics. One could hardly see the grass for them.

The weather turned sunny and beautiful as camp kids ran about in free abandon and babies cried. Youngsters lent and gave money to others who had less, so that all could get tickets and enter to share the music.

The crowd was so happily enthusiastic they even applauded the records being played while the stage was being set up.

Then on came the New Orleans Dixieland living museum piece, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band, a group full of the beat of another crazy, dancing jazzing era.

Old Blind Dede Pierce and his wife Billie belted out "Bourbon Street" and "Hello Dolly" with 50 years of accumulated showmanship. They ended, as all good Dixieland bands should with "When the Saints Go Marching In," and they led a milling mad march around the huge hall followed by handclapping thousands.

Over the Bridge

It was superb and glorious corn, a joyful bridge over the generation gap.

John Sebastian gave one of his best performances ever easy and open, letting the audience call out favorites and sing and clap along. Looking like an early minstrel, he filled that airplane hangar of a hall and sang and talked to the folks. He played old blues, early rock and new stuff of his own.

The evening began in the 1920s and he took it through the 30s and 40s to today. He was a modern minstrel, gentle, humorous, innocent and tender.

The finale was Chicago. They brought the musical historical pageant up to now. By this time the audience was drawn into the aisles and fully into the music and being together with their thing.

It was a thouroughly gutsy and satisfying sharing of a concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

NEWS-RECORDER
WORCESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,231

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

"Chicago" Featured Group Last Night At Tanglewood Trends Concert

By GEORGE Wm. MURPHY

Chicago was the featured group Tuesday night, at the second Contemporary Trends Concert of the summer at Tanglewood, Lenox.

The largely attended concert started at about 6:30 with the Preservation Hall Jazz Band from New Orleans, La. The group was lead by blind coronet player Dede Pierce, and his wife, Billie, on piano and vocals.

The group played music mostly recognizable only to a generation that had stayed clear of Tanglewood that night, but most of the people were able to recognize "Bourbon Street" and "Hello Dolly." Everybody also remembered "As The Saints Go Marching In" as three members of the band paraded aroundd the shed, followed by several hundred members of the audience gleefully clapping their hands.

There was a short delay while the stage was set up, and an elderly couple came and sat in the same row I was in. The fellow next to me asked them if they had come to see Chicago, to which they replied "No, we're from Arizona, we came to see Newark, N.J."

John B. Sebastian

Then John Sebastian came on. His guitar work and singing was surpassed only by his humor. A brilliant wit, in his dialogue as well as his songs, he kept the audience laughing and happy, rambling through many hits by the Lovin' Spoonfull, a group he started in New York, which disbanded in 1968, and continued to play a good deal of his own material including "I Had A Dream" and "You're A Big Boy Now."

Another highlight of the concert was when he played with his amp in a successful attempt to get it to sound "cheaper" so that he could belt out a version of "White Convertible" which was, in his own words, "the oldest one I can remember.

Sebastian was called back on stage for an encore and then called back a second time, though he had to stop playing because of an engagement later the same night in Boston.

Sebastian has done a great deal of recording with the Lovin' Spoonful, as well as contributing mouth harp to records by The Doors and Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young. He has a solo album titled "John B. Sebastian."

Next on stage was Michael Grando, who at age 18 had traveled to France to study under master Mime artist Marcel Marceau. Accompanied by his brother Richard on flute, his performance was, in the eyes of all present, very good, but very unappropriate.

Chicago

Then came the stars of the show, Chicago. The seven man group, including a three man horn section just didn't seem to make it. The music was good, the sound system was marvelous, and everything went smoothly. But, the band just didn't have the touch that the other performers had used. They couldn't really reach the audience, and became, at times, a noisy group of musicians, just standing up there putting people up-tight. Their music just didn't have the same personal feeling as the others, and though they were called back on stage for an encore, John B. Sebastian stole the show.

Tuesday night was the second concert of three this summer at Tanglewood, presented by Bill Graham and the Fillmore. Originally scheduled to take top billing at the show was Joe Cocker who became ill and was replaced by Chicago. On Aug. 18 Santana, Miles Davis, and the Voices of East Harlem will be featured.

ENTERTAINMENT

NIGHT GAMES

Pat George

. . .CHICAGO put on a fantastic show at Tanglewood last Tuesday night. . . .Rumor has it that Paul McCartney is being swayed by $$$$$ to leave his farm in England to make an American tour sometime within the next year. . . .Did you know that over the past six months CREEDENCE CLEARWATER REVIVAL has grossed more than any other group on record? . . . .The JONESES will once again be featured at Shrewsbury High School's "Back To School" dance. They may be shocked at the number of people who flock to the dance, as the groups new album will be released about that time. . . .Do you have any information that you'd like printed? Send it to Pat George, NIGHT GAMES, 25 Exchange Street, Worcester, 01608.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Vibes

Tanglewood Sheds Light On Rock Music Feast

By WAYNE PHANEUF

Oh, did Bill Graham cook up a musical feast when he dragged Fillmore East to Tanglewood.

Starting off with an appetizer of pure New Orleans "Dixieland" jazz in the form of Preservation Hall Jazz Band, the main course of folk and folk - rock in the person of John Sebastion just about satisfied everyone's music hunger.

But there's always room for dessert, especially if the sweets are named Chicago. . .and the crowd ate them up.

Anyone who can trace rock back to Bill Haley and the Comets, Chuck Berry and Elvis with the gyratin pelvis, knows that New Orleans jazz also played a big part in the emergence of the "now music."

With a honky tonk piano, trombone, coronet, tuba, drums and clarinet, Preservation Hall Jazz Band also invaded the Tanglewood Shed Tuesday.

The aging (averaging about 60) musicians grabbed the mass of music lovers with their dixieland beat ending with "When the Saints Come Marchin In," three of the jazz banders walked and played up the aisles with a hand - clapping multitude behind.

They helped each other off the stage to a thunderous ovation.

To rival the brightness of the sun setting behind those Berkshire Hills, John Sebastion, in red, yellow, orange and blue tie - dyed glory shuffled on stage.

If the crowd went a bit barbaric for jazz, they went wild for Sebastion and his gentle folk.

After a couple of songs on his acoustic guitar, Sebastion reached for his electric guitar to push the sounds out to, as he put it, "those cheapo cheapo seats way back."

He weaved his way in and out of folk, rock, folk rock and whatever his own gentle, but hard - driving style is classified. "What A Day for A Daydream" really held the crowd, as did his more recent sounds, which are on the Woodstock album.

Three ovations kept Sebastion coming back, but all good things must end. He explained that he had another engagement in Boston and had to board "The Red - eye Express" for that city.

Blowing in like a breeze from the Windy City, Chicago hit the stage with a crash from the cymbals, a blare on the trumpet and squeals from the audience dispersed through guitars saxophone, and a trombone.

Their first three songs were inaudible as the amps ran away wit hthe noise, but adjustments settled the matter and Chicago blew the crowd's brains out.

Cut off about ten pounds of hair, close your eyes, and Chicago sounds like Guy Lombardo's band — FOR ABOUT THREE SECONDS.

Then comes that quick blare of brasses, physcho - sounding guitar, and baby they're off with "Make Me Smile."

They played a few cuts from their new album, which has not been released yet.

After a couple of wild encores, Chicago (formerly Chicago Transit Authority) came out and played "I'm a Man," to set the Tanglewood shed on its side.

I'll bet the Berkshire Valleys are still echoing the heavy sounds of a spectacular night.

* * *

Any questions or hassles address to Wayne Phaneuf Vibes, Daily News, 1860 Main St., Springfield, 01101.

4—The Berkshire Eagle, Thursday, July 23, 1970

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

THIS IS METHUSELAH Bass reporting on the Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood. We had a young man do the immediate review; it takes me longer nowadays.

We drifted over the lawn, scanning blankets and their contents, 10,000 young bodies with accompanying styrofoam containers. Beer and wine, cans and jugs, not a vintage bottle in sight. The picnics consisted mostly of hearty tuna fish sandwiches, potato chips and chunks of watermelon — solid peasant fare. Joss sticks and incense candles burning away, appealing to what gods?

* * *

IT IS DOUBTFUL that there has ever been a younger generation that ever tried to dress as badly as this one. Almost no pretty young girls (what's an old man to do?), and the jeans and shirts with little style or true color. Every other person wearing a home-dyed T-shirt of utter drabness.

Deputy sheriffs and security personnel everywhere. When the police state finally comes in this country, the young people won't even be aware of it. They'll just think they're at a concert that's bigger than usual. Crowd most orderly. "Excuse me." "I'm sorry." "May we pass, please?" "Thank you."

* * *

THE CROWD on the blankets is older than the 5,000 occupying the seats inside the Shed, who seem to range from 13 to 17, and who are prepared to love just everything that happens. Even the beat of the New Orleans jazz gets to them, and they send the aged performers off with loud huzzahs, as much in admiration of the ability of these old-timers to stand upright as blow and bang and strum just like real musicians.

A young folk-rocker named John Sebastian then takes over, and I mean he really takes over. He can shush 15,000 with a quiet "shush" or bring them roaring to their feet by "cheapening the amplifier." The older ones on the lawn are moved by the "moany-whiney" songs and the younger ones inside scream for the solid rock. He satisfies both and goes off to a Boston concert with the cheers ringing in his ears.

* * *

IT TAKES QUITE a while to set up the Chicago instruments because it involves more electronic equipment than we are using in Vietnam. The aisles jam up a bit as youngsters sneak through the barriers, but the Fillmore security people, bearded young men in T-shirts, are everywhere, whispering in ears that then disappear in the air. I don't know what they are saying, but if Bill Graham were running the security of this country, we wouldn't need the FBI or the CIA or the Secret Service. His people have The Word.

The Chicago, seven young men in various stages of hairiness, start up with a blast that recalls Alamagordo just 25 years ago. You keep waiting for the noise to subside but it never does as 4,797,534 watts of power resound through the Shed, attempting to break bodies into little pieces. You can feel the effect of the sound waves on your heart beat as they pound at you relentlessly. It sounds to me like bad Stan Kenton amplified to the nth degree.

* * *

THE KIDS LOVE it and I look around me, reveling in their strength, their vibrancy, their delight in the moment, now. I don't have it myself anymore, but I sure enjoy being around where it is. Three nights before I had sat in the same place listening to poorly done Mozart while a bunch of old people nodded and napped, smiled and enjoyed. Will these young people remember Tanglewood and come back for the Bach and Mozart and Beethoven? Is Tanglewood finally building for the future? The number ends and the crowd goes wild. The old people went wild at the end of the Mozart, leaping to their feet and showing "Bravo!" Which enthusiasm is real?

My ears can take no more. We leave, behind us 15,000 happy hearts, remembering the lovely thing John Sebastian said in the microphone in response to the wild cheering of the crowd:

"Tanglewood, you're ------- beautiful."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends

By JOHN A. SCHWEIZER

ONE THING to remember when attending a rock concert is never to sit up front in the more expensive seats; invariably, they are the worst seats in the house. Last night's Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood was no exception. The decibel level ranged from loud to painful to unbearable.

However, rock fans, knowing what they like — be it good music or otherwise — turned out some 15,000 strong to groove on the folksy, good-time social songs of guitarist-singer John Sebastian, the hard-driving jazz-flavored rock of Chicago and, unlikely enough, the traditional beat of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band from New Orleans.

* * *

PRESERVATION Hall kicked things off with a series of melodic numbers featuring the militaristic street-beat drumming and rag-like piano that distinguish New Orleans jazz from commercialized Dixieland. Somehow, the rock-geared audience in the Shed dug the traditional sounds and warmly cheered most solos.

Cornetist Dede Pierce flashed some effective staccato attacks, but the blind 66-year-old was plainly not having one of his better nights as he repeatedly botched intended phrases. His wife, pianist Billie Pierce, strided right on throughout, and enthusiastically complemented hubby on several call-and-response vocals. Clarinetist Willie Humphrey, 69, and the elderly-but-unnamed drummer were impressive, especially during one particular shuffle-blues. Trombonist Jim Robinson, 77, played with energy, verve and exceptional facility during up-tempo selections.

Despite the oddity of programming a traditional jazz band with rock performers, the Preservation Hall oldsters were [illegible]en rousing applause after [illegible]h selection; they were given [illegible]tanding ovation at the close [illegible]heir segment.

* * *

[illegible]OHN SEBASTIAN, formerly [illegible] chief ladle in the Lovin' [illegible]oonful, presented a delightful[illegible] relaxed performance — polished but not slick, telling but not overbearing, and, above all, honest. His personable demeanor enhanced each selection as he ran through a string of oldies and newies accompanied only by himself on acoustic and electric guitar.

While Sebastian's poignant ballads hushed the Shed, the audience really grooved on a group of old-style "rock 'n' roll" numbers played for all they were worth by the drawling musician. His performance last night lent considerable credence to the contention that his is a unique voice in folk-country-rock with its husky accent telling timely stories in refreshingly realistic lyrics. Especially well-received were Sebastian staples "She's a Lady," "Younger Generation," "Daydream" and "A Younger Girl."

Whitestone

John Sebastian doing his contemporary trend.

* * *

SEBASTIAN'S was a hard act to follow, but the seven-piece Chicago group did so successfully, if only through sheer power -- like 50,000 watts worth.

"Introduction" amply showed the relentless, building drive the group is capable of. But, even so, the battery of musicians' amplifiers, amplified even more by the Shed's own sound system, resulted in a howling cacophony within the enclosure. Besides, Chicago soon seemed to lose its spark; it wasn't rekindled until the last three selections.

In the interim, the group counted off tunes from its two albums plus some yet-to-be-released material featuring more soul sounds than in the past. One number, "In the Country," featured some intricate guitar-bass unison figures.

Chicago followed Blood, Sweat & Tears into the jazz-flavored rock field, but differs somewhat from BST because of a preponderance of shouting brass figures — reminiscent of soul bands, but louder. Trombonist James Pankow is responsible for most of the head arrangements; he is also a very effective instrumentalist in this idiom, although his up-tempo work was repetitive last night.

Even more outstanding is guitarist-vocalist Terry Kath, who knows his way all over his Fender plug-in. Several tunes by Kath, including one with reedman Walter Parazaider on flute, were simply beautiful. Backing up Kath were drummer Daniel Seraphine, an energetic but rather boring percussionist with terrible-sounding cymbals, and electric bassist Peter Cetera, a major disappointment when compared with his nimble-fingered performances on records. Maybe it was acoustics, but the bass just was not as awesome and relentless as expected. Cetera's tenor voice nicely complemented Kath's and organist Robert Lamm's.

* * *

CHICAGO FINALLY managed to get the crowd on its feet by the end of the program and then was persuaded to do, as an encore, a thunderous arrangement of the Spencer Davis classic "I'm a Man," complete with Afro-Cuban rhythms and finger-popping, hand-clapping and screaming audience participation.

The sounds of the 4½-hour concert are still ringing in this reviewer's ears.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Vibes

Tanglewood Sheds Light On Rock Music Feast

By WAYNE PHANEUF

Oh, did Bill Graham cook up a musical feast when he dragged Fillmore East to Tanglewood.

Starting off with an appetizer of pure New Orleans "Dixieland" jazz in the form of Preservation Hall Jazz Band, the main course of folk and folk - rock in the person of John Sebastion just about satisfied everyone's music hunger.

But there's always room for dessert, especially if the sweets are named Chicago. . .and the crowd ate them up.

Anyone who can trace rock back to Bill Haley and the Comets, Chuck Berry and Elvis with the gyratin pelvis, knows that New Orleans jazz also played a big part in the emergence of the "now music."

With a honky tonk piano, trombone, coronet, tuba, drums and clarinet, Preservation Hall Jazz Band also invaded the Tanglewood Shed Tuesday.

The aging (averaging about 60) musicians grabbed the mass of music lovers with their dixieland beat ending with "When the Saints Come Marchin In," three of the jazz banders walked and played up the aisles with a hand - clapping multitude behind.

They helped each other off the stage to a thunderous ovation.

To rival the brightness of the sun setting behind those Berkshire Hills, John Sebastion, in red, yellow, orange and blue tie - dyed glory shuffled on stage.

If the crowd went a bit barbaric for jazz, they went wild for Sebastion and his gentle folk.

After a couple of songs on his acoustic guitar, Sebastion reached for his electric guitar to push the sounds out to, as he put it, "those cheapo cheapo seats way back."

He weaved his way in and out of folk, rock, folk rock and whatever his own gentle, but hard - driving style is classified. "What A Day for A Daydream" really held the crowd, as did his more recent sounds, which are on the Woodstock album.

Three ovations kept Sebastion coming back, but all good things must end. He explained that he had another engagement in Boston and had to board "The Red - eye Express" for that city.

Blowing in like a breeze from the Windy City, Chicago hit the stage with a crash from the cymbals, a blare on the trumpet and squeals from the audience dispersed through guitars saxophone, and a trombone.

Their first three songs were inaudible as the amps ran away wit hthe noise, but adjustments settled the matter and Chicago blew the crowd's brains out.

Cut off about ten pounds of hair, close your eyes, and Chicago sounds like Guy Lombardo's band — FOR ABOUT THREE SECONDS.

Then comes that quick blare of brasses, physcho - sounding guitar, and baby they're off with "Make Me Smile."

They played a few cuts from their new album, which has not been released yet.

After a couple of wild encores, Chicago (formerly Chicago Transit Authority) came out and played "I'm a Man," to set the Tanglewood shed on its side.

I'll bet the Berkshire Valleys are still echoing the heavy sounds of a spectacular night.

* * *

Any questions or hassles address to Wayne Phaneuf Vibes, Daily News, 1860 Main St., Springfield, 01101.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

THIS IS METHUSELAH Bass reporting on the Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood. We had a young man do the immediate review; it takes me longer nowadays.

We drifted over the lawn, scanning blankets and their contents, 10,000 young bodies with accompanying styrofoam containers. Beer and wine, cans and jugs, not a vintage bottle in sight. The picnics consisted mostly of hearty tuna fish sandwiches, potato chips and chunks of watermelon — solid peasant fare. Joss sticks and incense candles burning away, appealing to what gods?

* * *

IT IS DOUBTFUL that there has ever been a younger generation that ever tried to dress as badly as this one. Almost no pretty young girls (what's an old man to do?), and the jeans and shirts with little style or true color. Every other person wearing a home-dyed T-shirt of utter drabness.

Deputy sheriffs and security personnel everywhere. When the police state finally comes in this country, the young people won't even be aware of it. They'll just think they're at a concert that's bigger than usual. Crowd most orderly. "Excuse me." "I'm sorry." "May we pass, please?" "Thank you."

* * *

THE CROWD on the blankets is older than the 5,000 occupying the seats inside the Shed, who seem to range from 13 to 17, and who are prepared to love just everything that happens. Even the beat of the New Orleans jazz gets to them, and they send the aged performers off with loud huzzahs, as much in admiration of the ability of these old-timers to stand upright as blow and bang and strum just like real musicians.

A young folk-rocker named John Sebastian then takes over, and I mean he really takes over. He can shush 15,000 with a quiet "shush" or bring them roaring to their feet by "cheapening the amplifier." The older ones on the lawn are moved by the "moany-whiney" songs and the younger ones inside scream for the solid rock. He satisfies both and goes off to a Boston concert with the cheers ringing in his ears.

* * *

IT TAKES QUITE a while to set up the Chicago instruments because it involves more electronic equipment than we are using in Vietnam. The aisles jam up a bit as youngsters sneak through the barriers, but the Fillmore security people, bearded young men in T-shirts, are everywhere, whispering in ears that then disappear in the air. I don't know what they are saying, but if Bill Graham were running the security of this country, we wouldn't need the FBI or the CIA or the Secret Service. His people have The Word.

The Chicago, seven young men in various stages of hairiness, start up with a blast that recalls Alamagordo just 25 years ago. You keep waiting for the noise to subside but it never does as 4,797,534 watts of power resound through the Shed, attempting to break bodies into little pieces. You can feel the effect of the sound waves on your heart beat as they pound at you relentlessly. It sounds to me like bad Stan Kenton amplified to the nth degree.

* * *

THE KIDS LOVE it and I look around me, reveling in their strength, their vibrancy, their delight in the moment, now. I don't have it myself anymore, but I sure enjoy being around where it is. Three nights before I had sat in the same place listening to poorly done Mozart while a bunch of old people nodded and napped, smiled and enjoyed. Will these young people remember Tanglewood and come back for the Bach and Mozart and Beethoven? Is Tanglewood finally building for the future? The number ends and the crowd goes wild. The old people went wild at the end of the Mozart, leaping to their feet and showing "Bravo!" Which enthusiasm is real?

My ears can take no more. We leave, behind us 15,000 happy hearts, remembering the lovely thing John Sebastian said in the microphone in response to the wild cheering of the crowd:

"Tanglewood, you're ------- beautiful."

Music Review

Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends

By JOHN A. SCHWEIZER

ONE THING to remember when attending a rock concert is never to sit up front in the more expensive seats; invariably, they are the worst seats in the house. Last night's Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood was no exception. The decibel level ranged from loud to painful to unbearable.

However, rock fans, knowing what they like — be it good music or otherwise — turned out some 15,000 strong to groove on the folksy, good-time social songs of guitarist-singer John Sebastian, the hard-driving jazz-flavored rock of Chicago and, unlikely enough, the traditional beat of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band from New Orleans.

* * *

PRESERVATION Hall kicked things off with a series of melodic numbers featuring the militaristic street-beat drumming and rag-like piano that distinguish New Orleans jazz from commercialized Dixieland. Somehow, the rock-geared audience in the Shed dug the traditional sounds and warmly cheered most solos.

Cornetist Dede Pierce flashed some effective staccato attacks, but the blind 66-year-old was plainly not having one of his better nights as he repeatedly botched intended phrases. His wife, pianist Billie Pierce, strided right on throughout, and enthusiastically complemented hubby on several call-and-response vocals. Clarinetist Willie Humphrey, 69, and the elderly-but-unnamed drummer were impressive, especially during one particular shuffle-blues. Trombonist Jim Robinson, 77, played with energy, verve and exceptional facility during up-tempo selections.

Despite the oddity of programming a traditional jazz band with rock performers, the Preservation Hall oldsters were given rousing applause after each selection; they were given a standing ovation at the close of their segment.

* * *

JOHN SEBASTIAN, formerly the chief ladie in the Lovin' Spoonful, presented a delightfully relaxed performance — polished but not slick, telling but not overbearing, and, above all, honest. His personable demeanor enhanced each selection as he ran through a string of oldies and newies accompanied only by himself on acoustic and electric guitar.

While Sebastian's poignant ballads hushed the Shed, the audience really grooved on a group of old-style "rock 'n' roll" numbers played for all they were worth by the drawling musician. His performance last night lent considerable credence to the contention that his is a unique voice in folk-country-rock with its husky accent telling timely stories in refreshingly realistic lyrics. Especially well-received were Sebastian staples "She's a Lady," "Younger Generation," "Daydream" and "A Younger Girl."

Whitestone

John Sebastian doing his contemporary trend.

* * *

SEBASTIAN'S was a hard act to follow, but the seven-piece Chicago group did so successfully, if only through sheer power -- like 50,000 watts worth.

"Introduction" amply showed the relentless, building drive the group is capable of. But, even so, the battery of musicians' amplifiers, amplified even more by the Shed's own sound system, resulted in a howling cacophony within the enclosure. Besides, Chicago soon seemed to lose its spark; it wasn't rekindled until the last three selections.

In the interim, the group counted off tunes from its two albums plus some yet-to-be-released material featuring more soul sounds than in the past. One number, "In the Country," featured some intricate guitar-bass unison figures.

Chicago followed Blood, Sweat & Tears into the jazz-flavored rock field, but differs somewhat from BST because of a preponderance of shouting brass figures — reminiscent of soul bands, but louder. Trombonist James Pankow is responsible for most of the head arrangements; he is also a very effective instrumentalist in this idiom, although his up-tempo work was repetitive last night.

Even more outstanding is guitarist-vocalist Terry Kath, who knows his way all over his Fender plug-in. Several tunes by Kath, including one with reedman Walter Parazaider on flute, were simply beautiful. Backing up Kath were drummer Daniel Seraphine, an energetic but rather boring percussionist with terrible-sounding cymbals, and electric bassist Peter Cetera, a major disappointment when compared with his nimble-fingered performances on records. Maybe it was acoustics, but the bass just was not as awesome and relentless as expected. Cetera's tenor voice nicely complemented Kath's and organist Robert Lamm's.

* * *

CHICAGO FINALLY managed to get the crowd on its feet by the end of the program and then was persuaded to do, as an encore, a thunderous arrangement of the Spencer Davis classic "I'm a Man," complete with Afro-Cuban rhythms and finger-popping, hand-clapping and screaming audience participation.

The sounds of the 4½-hour concert are still ringing in this reviewer's ears.

Eye-Opening Event At Tanglewood

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The night of July 21, 1970, provided me with a rewarding and enlightening experience, for it was on that Tuesday evening that I attended the music festival at Tanglewood as a member of the Berkshire County Deputy Sheriffs' Association. It was our job to see that law and order were preserved, and I went there with the idea that there was bound to be trouble with so many hippies congregated in one place. But I was pleasantly surprised, because instead of a wild gathering of bearded, long-haired, ill-clothed troublemakers, it was my pleasure to deal with some 15,000 well-behaved, courteous, peace-loving kids. Perhaps a dozen out of that large number were would-be sources of an unpleasant evening, but their friends were quick to calm them down.

Naturally, because I am of a different era, I don't agree with some of the things they do, and perhaps I don't agree with the way they wear their clothes or groom their hair; but these things are a lot less important to me now than they were a few days ago.

It hurts me (I am the father of two teen-agers) to see these basically nice kids getting high on drugs and drinking to excess, but I must admit that they have some real good things going for them. For instance, show me one place on earth where you could jam 15,000 adults together for eight hours and not see one fight or even so much as an argument. And beat this if you can — after the music stopped and the bulk of the crowd cleared out, at least a hundred, perhaps more, young people stayed behind and started the almost impossible task of cleaning up their own and everyone else's litter, knowing that paid attendants would do the job if they just went away and left it. I wonder how many clean-shaven, well-groomed people could take a lesson from that.

I don't think we have to be so concerned about the future of our country as we sometimes think. These "hippie" kids have their growing up to do, and even if they won't openly admit it, they lean heavily on our guidance to see them through these difficult times. We can help them by strengthening our drug laws and by setting a few good examples that our "now generation" can look up to.

Bless 'em all, they have my vote for being the best behaved group of young adults that I have ever had the pleasure of dealing with.

ETHAN A. SCOTT
Deputy Sheriff.
Holmes Road
Hinsdale

B Eagle 7/25/70

Contemporary music at Tanglewood

Contemporary music trends will be featured in two programs at Tanglewood in Lenox. The last two of a three series program will feature Joe Cocker and Santana. The Who, the first of the series, was presented July 7.

Joe Cocker, the sensational English rock-blues artist, who appeared at Woodstock last summer and is now featured in the film "Woodstock,", will be presented on Tuesday, July 21. The final concert, Tuesday, August 18 headlines Santana, the newest sensation in the field of rock music.

Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood began during the summer of 1968 and have attracted audiences of over 20,000 for such artists as The Who, Jefferson Airplane, and B. B. King.

Reserved seats are now on sale at the Box Office at Tanglewood. Admission to the lawn goes on sale the day of the concert.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 17 1970 New England Newsclip

THE MINERVA TAVERN BOY, John Robert Cocker, alias Joe, brings his Ray Charles-influenced Blues singing to Tanglewood Tuesday. On the program with him will be Bill Graham and Santana.

CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, July 21, 1970

Joe Cocker Replaced at Tanglewood

Chicago replaces Joe Cocker, who became ill and had to cancel the remainder of his American tour, on tonight's Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood, Mass.

* * *

On the same program beginning at 6 p.m. will be John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band. Giant-screen video magnification will telecast the show to those on Tanglewood's lawn. The lawn will open to the public at 4 p.m.

Chicago is a turbulent blend of music which incorporates jazz, blues, rock and symphonies.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975

JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Chicago replaces Joe Cocker, who became ill and had to cancel the remainder of his American tour, on the July 21st Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood. Bill Graham presents the Fillmore at Tanglewood that evening.

On the same program (which begins at 6 p.m.) will be John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band. Giant-screen video magnification by Joshua Television telecasts the show to those on Tanglewood's Lawn.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

Chicago Replaces Cocker

On the heels of Tuesday's smash Tanglewood Shed concert staged by The Who, with Jethro Tull side rifts, July 21 proves to be another success.

This is when Chicago and John Sebastion will make the pilgrimage to Lenox. Also appearing will be The Preservation Jazz Band.

Originally, Joe Cocker was scheduled to be the main July 21 attraction, but won't make the Tanglewood scene. Rumors that Jim Hendrix will fill in are untrue.

Holyoke (Mass.) Transcript-Telegram, Thurs., July 16, 1970—

Chicago Replaces Joe Cocker At Tanglewood

Chicago will replace Joe Cocker as the main attraction of the second Contemporary Trends concert, Tuesday night, at Tanglewood.

Cocker reportedly became ill and was forced to cancel the remainder of his U. S. tour. Playing with Chicago will be John B. Sebastian, formerly of the Lovin' Spoonfull, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

The seven man Chicago has released two albums to date, "Chicago Transit Authority" and "Chicago." Also featured at the concert, which is produced in conjunction with Bill Graham and the Fillmore, will be giant screen video magnification on the lawn by Joshua Television.

This is the third year of the Contemporary Trends concerts. The Who, Jethro Tull and It's A Beautiful Day appeared July 7 of this year, and Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will be featured Aug. 18.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Slates Chicago For July 21

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, — Chicago replaces Joe Cocker, who became ill and had to cancel the remainder of his American tour, on the July 21st Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood.

Bill Graham presents the Fillmore at Tanglewood that evening. On the same program (which begins at 6 p.m.) will be John Sebastian and he Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

Giant - screen video magnification by Joshua Television telecasts the show to those on Tanglewood's Lawn. Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office and are priced at $5, $6 and $7 for the Shed. Lawn admission at $4 will be available the day of the concert.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 17 1970 New England Newsclip

ARRIVING AT TANGLEWOOD — The rock group "Chicago" will present a blending of music which incorporates jazz, blues, rock and symphonics in the Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. on Tuesday. Also appearing will be John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

Chicago Concert Slated Tonight At Tanglewood

Chicago, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall jazz band will present a Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood tonight at 6.

THE BOSTON HERALD Traveler
D. 216,305 S. 298,557

JUL 19 1970

TANGLEWOOD: Chicago (formerly Chicago Transit Authority) has replaced Joe Cocker at this Tuesday's Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood. John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band (headed by Billie and De De Pierce) will appear as scheduled. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office as well as at the Fillmore Box Office, 105 Second Ave., N.Y.

BROCKTOWN, N. J.
DAILY OBSERVER
DAILY 8,500

JUL 17 1970

Tanglewood Rock Festival Has Chicago & Sebastian

CHICAGO, JOHN SEBASTIAN and the PRESERVATION HALL JAZZ BAND will appear at TANGLEWOOD on July 21 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by FILLMORE producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office. Reserved seats are available by mail at $5, $6 and $7 with check or money order payable to the 'Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.' A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4. The lawn will open to the public at 4 p.m. on the day of the concert. It is suggested that concert-goers arrive early since at FILLMORE'S July 7 Contemporary Trends Concert of THE WHO, JETHRO TULL and IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY, 2000 automobiles had to be turned away.

CHICAGO is a turbulent blend of music which incorporates jazz, blues, rock and symphonics. Recently the Los Angeles Free Press called CHICAGO, 'The most inventive, hardest blowing jazz-rock orchestra...they are excellent musicians in every way; their concept of musical form is extensive...the singing is sometimes sweet, but best when it is demonic. The guitarist plays vigorous patches and the drummer turns the tempo over and over. The ensemble horn playing is phenomenal; creative, rhythmic, colorful, bold, robust.'

CHICAGO consists of Daniel Seraphone (drums), Robert Lamm (organ/electric piano/vocals), Terry Kath (guitar/vocals), Walter Parazaider (woodwinds). Lee Loughnane (trumpet/flugel horn), Peter Cetera (bass/vocals) and James Pankow (trombone). Their Columbia LP, 'Chicago,' has been at the top of the charts for months.

JOHN SEBASTIAN, now on the best-selling charts with his solo LP, 'John B. Sebastian,' has lived with music all his life. The son of a classical harmonica player, he began his own musical career playing non-classical harmonica for nickels and dimes in the streets of New York City. From these streets, SEBASTIAN formed his first group, The Even Dozen Jug Band. After recording one album for MGM, the group disbanded and SEBASTIAN joined the Mugwumps, along with Cass Elliot, Denny Doherty and Zal Yanovsky.

When the Mugwumps failed to get off the ground, SEBASTIAN took time off to learn sailmaking in Marblehead, Mass. In the next few years, he became proficient on guitar and autoharp.

Then in 1966 he, with Zal Yanovsky, Steve Boone, and Joe Butler, formed his next group, The Lovin' Spoonful. In 1966, both Billboard and Cashbox voted Lovin' Spoonful the most successful American group of the year.

The group broke up in 1968 and until recently, performances by SEBASTIAN have been rare; two notable exceptions being Woodstock, and the 1969 Big Sur Folk Festival. His first solo LP, released recently is, according to music writer Phillip Elwood, 'a remarkable tour de force...showing the depth and worldliness of his musical interests.' On this album he is accompanied by friends David Crosby, Steven Stills, Graham Nash, and the Ikettes.

PRESERVATION HALL was founded in 1961 by art dealer Larry Borenstein for the purpose of preserving the tradition of Jelly Roll Morton, King Oliver, and other jazz greats of the early years of this century. The original idiom is presented by musicians who were contemporaries of these early figures and are living representatives of an era. Since then, the members of the PRESERVATION HALL JAZZ BAND have travelled across the United States receiving an overwhelming response from music lovers of all ages and all persuasions.

In addition, for the benefit of the lawn audience, there will be two giant color television screens providing complete simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Limited.

TANGLEWOOD: Chicago (formerly Chicago Transit Authority) has replaced Joe Cocker at this Tuesday's Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood. John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band (headed by Billie and De De Pierce) will appear as scheduled. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office as well as at the Fillmore Box Office, 105 Second Ave., N.Y.

B H T

7/17/70

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Preservation Hall Set For Tanglewood

Chicago, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band will appear at Tanglewood on July 21 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office. Reserved seats are available by mail, with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc." A self-addressed stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4. The lawn will open to the public at 4 on the day of the concert. It is suggested that concert-goers arrive early since at Fillmore's July 7 Contemporary Trends Concert of The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day, 2,000 automobiles had to be turned away.

Chicago is a turbulent blend of music which incorporates jazz, blues, rock and symphonics. Recently the Los Angeles Free Press called Chicago, "The most inventive, hardest blowing jazz-rock orchestra....they are excellent musicians in every way; their concept of musical form is extensive...the singing is sometimes sweet, but best when it is demonic. The guitarist plays vigorous patches and the drummer turns the tempo over and over. The ensemble horn playing is phenomenal; creative, rhythmic, colorful, bold, robust."

Chicago consists of Daniel Seraphone (drums), Robert Lamm (organ, electric piano, vocals), Terry Kath (guitar, vocals), Walter Parazaider (wood winds), Lee Loughnane (trumpet, flugel horn), Peter Cetera (bass, vocals) and James Pankow (trombone). Their Columbia LP, "Chicago," has been at the top of the charts for months.

John Sebastian, now on the best-selling charts with his solo LP, "John B. Sebastian," has lived with music all his life. The son of a classical harmonica player, he began his own musical career playing non-classical harmonica for nickels and dimes in the streets of New York City. From these streets, Sebastian formed his first group, The Even Dozen Jug Band. After recording one album for MGM, the group disbanded and Sebastian joined the Mugwumps, along with Cass Elliott, Denny Doherty and Zal Yanovsky.

When the Mugwumps failed to get off the ground, Sebastian took time off to learn sailmaking in Marblehead, Mass. In the next few years, he became proficient on guitar and autoharp.

Then in 1966 he, with Zal Yanovsky, Steve Boone, and Joe Butler, formed his next group, The Lovin' Spoonful. In 1966, both Billboard and Cashbox voted Lovin' Spoonful the most successful American group of the year.

The group broke up in 1968 and until recently, performances by Sebastian have been rare; two notable exceptions being Woodstock, and the 1969 Big Sur Folk Festival. His first solo LP, released recently is, according to music writer Phillip Elwood, "a remarkable tour de force...showing the depth and worldliness of his musical interests." On this album he is accompanied by friends David Crosby, Steven Stills, Graham Nash, and the Ikettes.

Preservation Hall was founded in 1961 by art dealer Larry Borenstein for the purpose of preserving the tradition of Jelly Roll Morton, King Oliver, and other jazz greats of the early years of this century. The original idiom is presented by musicians who are contemporaries of these early figures and are living representatives of an era. Since then the members of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band have traveled across the United States receiving an overwhelming response from music lovers of all ages and all persuasions.

In addition, for the benefit of the lawn audience, there will be two giant television screens providing complete (and in color) simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Limited.

Just Pokin' Around

By AGNES ROCKWOOD

CARLETON CARPENTER, one of Bennington's contributions to the entertainment world, is in the all-star cast of Moss Hart's comedy, "Light Up the Sky," which will be previewed during the week of Aug. 3 at the Lakewood Theatre, the state theatre of Maine, Skowhegan.

In the cast with more to be announced are Kitty Carlisle, wife of the late Moss Hart; Jan Sterling, Sam Levine and Kay Medford. The revival is scheduled for opening on Broadway in October.

Lakewood is one of the oldest summer theaters, now in its 70th year and has presented nearly 870 productions, most of them topflight.

Carleton is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Carpenter of Lyons District. He is a veteran actor, has attained stardom in movies after leading roles on the New York stage. He has also appeared in such traveling shows as "Hello, Dolly!" which played in the Far East. He has numerous television credits and often is recognized on video commercials.

News of his appearance at Skowhegan came from Betty (Burgess) Kearns, wife of William F. Kearns Jr., formerly of Bennington and now of Manchester, Maine. They hope to see the former local performer when he plays Lakewood Theatre.

—o—

APPEARING at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., on Tuesday, July 21, will be Chicago, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Bend. This is another contemporary trends concert which starts at 6 p. m. The concert is sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with Berkshire Music Center. Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office and reserved seats are available by mail at $5, $6, and $7 with check or money order payable to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4. The lawn will be open to the public at 4 on the day of the concert. In addition, for the benefit of the lawn audience, there will be two giant television screens providing complete and in color simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Ltd.

—o—

TOMMY MANELAS sends word to The Banner that he is now living with relatives in Albany, N.Y. He is the Greek chef who looks like President Truman and not the late Athanasios (Tommy) Palangas. Both had worked at the Paradise Restaurant, but Manelas is the Tommy who was the chef later at Peter's Ice Cream. Tommy Palangas had always been employed at the Paradise.

—o—

"THE PROPOSITION." Boston's longest running show, celebrated its 700th performance last week by announcing plans to appear at the High Point Inn in Lenox, Mass., this summer, in addition to its regular performance schedule in Cambridge.

They will perform cabaret style Friday and Saturday nights at 9:30 and 11:30 p.m. The cast will also give children's performances on Friday afternoons at 2 outside at High Point for interested camps and groups in the Berkshire area.

High Point is on West Mountain Road and is owned by Doris Bardon, who operates the inn and galleries there.

"The Proposition" is the country's only completely improvised show with music. The show is created by suggestions from the audience. Musical comedies, marital arguments, operas, foreign films, rock festivals and television talk shows are all spontaneously performed by the cast.

—o—

JUDGE at this sear's Saratoga Springs Art Fair will be Robert McIntyre Doty, curator of the Whitney Museum of American Art in New York City. His experience includes assistant to the curator at the George Eastman House where he was associate editor of "Image," librarian and staff member in charge of traveling exhibitions, member of the staff of the department of prints and drawings at the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, assistant to director at Yale University Art Gallery, editor of Yale University Art Gallery Bulletin.

The fair is celebrating its 15th year and is Saratoga's oldest cultural event. It is now sponsored by the Saratoga Springs Chamber of Commerce and the show includes many artists from surrounding states as well as from the Saratoga area.

Anyone over 16 years of age is eligible to enter three works in the field of fine art or sculpture. Crafts are not included. First prize is $300, second $200 and third $100. There are also four $50 prizes.

The indoor show will open next Friday in the Canfield Ballroom and will remain there for two weeks and consist of 60 or more of the show's best.

—o—

A SERIES of concerts by the performing faculty of the Junior Conservatory is being presented in the Burklyn Concert Barn on Darling Hill, East Burke.

The concerts and composers' forum are on Monday nights at 7 in lobby of Burlyn Manor and are free and open to the public. The small summer school offers a unique program of creative music to teen-agers from all over the country. Students there have won national recognition for their work from both the National Federation of Music Clubs and Broadcast Music, Inc.

A weekly concert series is presented by the faculty as a means of educating the students and as a public service to the people.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

JUL 17 1970

New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

Pop notes . . .

FRANKLIN PARK CONCERTS: The Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts and the National Center of Afro-American Artists are presenting free nightly concerts at 8 p.m. in the Playhouse-in-the-Park. Leading off this week's events is the appearance tonight of folksinger Odetta, of whom Harry Belafonte has said: "We are fortunate indeed in having such a woman in our musical world. Those of us who call ourselves artists can learn much from her strength, simplicity, warmth, humor and complete humanity." Other Playhouse programs this week will offer a diversity of entertainment, ranging from soul and rock to gospel singing.

PROGRESSIVE COUNTRY: Ian and Sylvia perform tonight at the South Shore Music Circus and Wednesday night at Harvard Stadium, both times with The Great Speckled Bird in what has been described as a venture into the area of progressive country music. Richie Havens will be the star of next Sunday's concert at the Music Circus.

TANGLEWOOD: Chicago (formerly Chicago Transit Authority) has replaced Joe Cocker at this Tuesday's Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood. John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band (headed by Billie and De De Pierce) will appear as scheduled. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office as well as at the Fillmore Box Office, 105 Second Ave., N.Y.

ALSO AT LENOX: Jazz trumpeter Miles Davis, hailed as a "new rock star, cutting deep into the rock idiom," appears tonight at the Berkshire Music Barn with a group that includes Chick Corea on the electric piano, bassist Dave Holland, Jack deJohnette on drums, soprano saxophonist Steve Grossman, and Airto Moreira playing a battery of Brazilian percussion instruments.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

AFRICAN ACID rock is played by Santana before a crowd of 17,432 at Tanglewood. Turnout last night was the second largest of the current season. The San Francisco-based Santana group consists of six members.

Santana at Tanglewood: A Most Contemporary Trend

By ALEXANDER HAWES Jr.

LENOX—Long hair, short hair, blue jeans, sport jackets, youth and age—it was all there for the third and final Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood last night.

Whether lying back arm in arm on the lawn watching the stars or standing on the chairs inside bouncing up and down, the spectators had a good time. The only complaint was that the whole thing was over too soon.

Music Review on Page 4

Beer, wine and some marijuana were being passed around throughout the evening but the police decided to play it cool and not hassle anyone. There were no disturbances reported. "A beautiful night, a quiet night," as one policeman put it.

Attention for Santana

During the first two sets, by the Voices of East Harlem and Miles Davis, people were milling around, especially outside, where they appeared to have little idea of who was playing when. But when Santana came on and the remote TV screen showed them in brilliant color, the crowd concentrated on the stage.

That was not until 8:30, two-thirds of the way through the program. Until that time, there was too much sunlight for the TV screen to be effective. Yet there was little grumbling from the audience that filled the lawn at $4 a head.

They were content to have a large party with numerous beer coolers, on the many colors of blankets, occasionally tossing a beachball around or playing with a flashing yo-yo.

During the intermission, the lawn people were treated to live music in their midst. This came from the Despers Steel Band of Trinidad and was enjoyable as a balance to the hard-driving sound inside the Shed.

Although there were rumors that there might be trouble, there was no gate-crashing and no fights. The only problem the ushers faced occurred when Santana came on and a group of about 2,000 spectators rushed from the lawn into the Shed. The ushers simply moved their lines of resistance back to the head of the aisles.

Attendance 17,432

For the crowd of 17,432, second only to the record number of about 18,400 for The Who concert last month, it was an evening of cool temperatures and clear skies. As the darkness spread, candles were lighted. The over-30 set, in their sports jackets or golf clothes, came away with a slightly better idea of what it's all about.

Those who had arrived at 3 by bus, car or hitchhiking were on their way by 10 to Boston, New York or points further on. The litter of beer cans and cigarette butts remained to be cleaned up—a small price for an enjoyable evening.

CONCERT #3

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Fillmore Winner At Tanglewood

Bos Eve

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — The third and last Fillmore at Tanglewood concert was a grand finale for contemporary trends for the season.

The Voices of East Harlem, Miles David and Santana plus the Joshua Lights and TV and the Trinadad Despers filled out the bill.

Engrossed in Work

The weather was perfect, the people warm and happy and the music was made by performers who were fully engrossed in their work. Despers, the steel drum band, was led by Raymond Shaw a former Trinadad police constable. With highly sophisticated and stylized rhythms and sound they could create the full variations of tone of an organ on their steel drums. They played on the Tanglewood lawns, an island of metal in a sea of people.

Then came the raucous volatile and funky Voices of East Harlem. The Despers were in neat and identical blue semi-uniform jackets, but the Voices were in rags, jeans, turans and tatters. They are 21 people, youngest about 8 and oldest probably 50, brought together by the East Harlem Federation. They cut their first record and it is due out late this month.

Their sound is vibrant and has a sea echo to it plus a great beat. Two lead singers were knockouts. The first was a small boy and then a dashiki-wrapped Ethel Merman who belted and raunched the audience to their feet clapping with the spotlights whirling from performers to audience and back again.

Mies Davis, from 1946 and bebop, from his creative partnership with Gerry Mulligan and the 'cool school' to today is a great change in some respets. He is more electrified and amped and on to electronic sounds and perhaps more emotional. But he is cerebral still, a thinking as well as a feeling man's musician and he can play that horn as few men ever have.

He and his seven-man group played one long involved tone poem. Twenty minutes of exquisite solos and good group work and a flood of wild wooly electronic and jungle sounds. A witch's brew led by Davis in a white undershirt under violet lights. Steve Grossman on sax and Davis got many cries of more, more. They did an encore on the short section they played.

Then came Santana. Carlos Santana and his six-man group began in San Francisco in 1964 and were the hit, the discovery of Woodstock. He, as Davis, is a fine musician.

Purple lights, erie sounds then a gong, blinding red lights and the house went wild. Aisles jammed and clapping in unison. They are one of the really beautiful groups.

It was an integrated program and a satisfying one in every sense of those words.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

7

Tanglewood Swings!

Santana Sound, Miles Davis Horn Rock Multitude

By JOHN A. SCHWEIZER

IF TANGLEWOOD did nothing else last night, it swung, and without letup. Santana and Miles Davis provided staggering performances which left the crowd of 17,432 emotionally spent.

The Despers, a Jamaican steel band, kicked things off nicely out on the lawn, but it was inside the Shed where the third and final Contemporary Trends program really got off the ground.

The Voices of East Harlem, a 20-member contingent of Harlem youths, stirred the crowd with a series of tunes in the Credence Clearwater revival vein. They built their swing on an intensity of repeated phrases charged with a staunch, pulsating electric bass riding on the drummer's galloping back beat.

The chorus shouted its soul in typically gospel fashion, although it had difficulties staying in tune. The visual effect of the group's choreography was as stimulating as its sound, and fingers were popping in the audience right from the first. The five-piece band (including the only three white members of the group) provided a more-than-adequate foundation for the chorus. Voices of East Harlem should have been a tough act to follow.

* * *

BUT, not surprisingly, Miles Davis had something substantial to tell the rockers about themselves. For 25 years Davis has been in the forefront of jazz's mainstream, and last night, his seven-piece group tore into seven tunes which showed the exciting direction in which his music is headed.

The group's rhythmic conception smacked decidedly of what is considered to be rock, but Davis, as always, is his own man. Drummer Jack De Johnette and Latin percussionist Airto Moreira were attentive to Davis's expressiveness (just one lilting note from Davis would completely change the rhythmic complexion of a tune), although Moreira's effectiveness was sometimes sacrificed in his efforts to run through his collection of instruments on each selection.

* * *

DAVIS'S NEW bassist (it was not Dave Holland) stayed pretty much with electric bass and repeated phrases to create intensity. However, his guitar-like dexterity on acoustic bass was dazzling and undoubtedly set him in good stead with the more conservative jazz buffs. Over-all, the rhythm was more often implied than stated, with Keith Jarrett's organ suggesting much of the pulse.

It was on this bubbling, explosive rhythmic sea that Davis and saxophonist Steve Grossman rode with crisp, biting attacks alternated with halting lyricism. Davis's chops never sounded better as he used silence as effectively as sound. Grossman, an obvious Charles Lloyd enthusiast, appeared to be aiming for more punctuation than his flowing melodies seemed to warrant, but it came off well. Grossman's star is still rising.

Whitestone

The Steel Band on the lawn at Tanglewood

* * *

THE GROUP'S young electric pianist (replacing Chic Corea) was having technical problems with his amplifier during much of the set, but when the current was flowing, he proved a good foil for Jarrett's keyboard exuberance.

No doubt about it, Davis was definitely at home in the rock setting of last night's concert, and he probably turned a number of rock enthusiasts on to what he is still very much into — jazz. Davis's set was easily the most impressive musical offering of the night.

* * *

ALTHOUGH DAVIS was exciting, Santana was simply out of sight! Nothing could have followed Santana except emotional exhaustion (and it did).

The explosiveness, drive and intensity generated by this six-man Latin rock group is almost unbelievable. The group was obliged to do three encore numbers, each of which somehow surpassed the previous tune in sheer excitement.

For all the success that groups like Chicago have had with Latin-flavored arrangements, only in Santana does the Afro-Cuban nature of the music sound genuine. This is not surprising, since half the group is of Latin descent. Guitarist-leader Carlos Santana stayed well within the context of the music, allowing it to swing on its own. Although he is a fair guitarist, he was not given to pyrotechnical displays. His solos evoked images of greasy blues; a Spanish-Harlemesque lyricism.

Organist Greg Rolie was the most impressive musician in the group. He is in a class by himself in playing rock and Latin on that instrument, so that much of the group's intensity was built around Rolie's driving organ.

* * *

KID-FACED Mike Shrieve was almost as outstanding on drums. He fired the others unmercifully and was a Rock of Gibraltar on tempos. Cooking all the while were Jose Areas and Mike Carrabello on congas, timbales, gourds, castinets, claves, etc., etc., etc. Electric bassist Dave Brown was extremely effective with his totally rhythmic pulsations, which seemed to go better with this type of music than the flowing bass lines of Blood, Sweat & Tears' Jim Fielder, for example.

Technicalities aside, Santana (the group) had the audience in increasing rhythmic ecstasy with each number. Counting off tunes from their album plus some new selections, the group got everybody off their feet and on the chairs in an orgy of swing. It didn't seem possible anything could surpass the hypnotic throb of "Jingo," the last tune on the regular program. But those encores did. Santana is a group to be reckoned with.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247

AUG 20 1970 New

At Tanglewood

People Enjoying Themselves

BY JON BUSHNELL

Tuesday, August 18th, marked the last concert of The Fillmore at Tanglewood with the appearance of The Voices of East Harlem, Miles Davis, and Santana. All three were relatively new to me and consequently pleasantly surprising. The Voices of East Harlem, a black dance group with white instrumental accompaniment, were good. However, they were on too early to play for a full, appreciative house. Miles Davis performed second and he should have been last as he was by far the best. What we heard of him was excellent but his music needs and deserves audience involvement and there was none. Santana was billed as the 'big name' of the night but I found myself falling asleep as I heard the basic patterns of his music repeated over and over again with different variations. They were good, but loud, with a too-heavy emphasis on percussion.

All in all the concert was a success, and it did complete the trend that the two previous concerts had set. There were many people enjoying themselves although it took them a while to get settled, and there was an over-all sense of percaution as the 'rip-off' men of Bill Graham's crew were everywhere.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

AFRICAN ACID rock is played by Santana before a crowd of 17,432 at Tanglewood. Turnout last night was the second largest of the current season. The San Francisco-based Santana group consists of six members.

Santana at Tanglewood: A Most Contemporary Trend

By ALEXANDER HAWES Jr.

LENOX—Long hair, short hair, blue jeans, sport jackets, youth and age—it was all there for the third and final Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood last night.

Whether lying back arm in arm on the lawn watching the stars or standing on the chairs inside bouncing up and down, the spectators had a good time. The only complaint was that the whole thing was over too soon.

Music Review on Page 4

Beer, wine and some marijuana were being passed around throughout the evening but the police decided to play it cool and not hassle anyone. There were no disturbances reported. "A beautiful night, a quiet night," as one policeman put it.

Attention for Santana

During the first two sets, by the Voices of East Harlem and Miles Davis, people were milling around, especially outside, where they appeared to have little idea of who was playing when. But when Santana came on and the remote TV screen showed them in brilliant color, the crowd concentrated on the stage.

That was not until 8:30, two-thirds of the way through the program. Until that time, there was too much sunlight for the TV screen to be effective. Yet there was little grumbling from the audience that filled the lawn at $4 a head.

They were content to have a large party with numerous beer coolers, on the many colors of blankets, occasionally tossing a beachball around or playing with a flashing yo-yo.

During the intermission, the lawn people were treated to live music in their midst. This came from the Despers Steel Band of Trinidad and was enjoyable as a balance to the hard-driving sound inside the Shed.

Although there were rumors that there might be trouble, there was no gate-crashing and no fights. The only problem the ushers faced occurred when Santana came on and a group of about 2,000 spectators rushed from the lawn into the Shed. The ushers simply moved their lines of resistance back to the head of the aisles.

Attendance 17,432

For the crowd of 17,432, second only to the record number of about 18,400 for The Who concert last month, it was an evening of cool temperatures and clear skies. As the darkness spread, candles were lighted. The over-30 set, in their sports jackets or golf clothes, came away with a slightly better idea of what it's all about.

Those who had arrived at 3 by bus, car or hitchhiking were on their way by 10 to Boston, New York or points further on. The litter of beer cans and cigarette butts remained to be cleaned up—a small price for an enjoyable evening.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Fillmore Winner At Tanglewood

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — The third and last Fillmore at Tanglewood concert was a grand finale for contemporary trends for the season.

The Voices of East Harlem, Miles David and Santana plus the Joshua Lights and TV and the Trinadad Despers filled out the bill.

Engrossed in Work

The weather was perfect, the people warm and happy and the music was made by performers who were fully engrossed in their work. Despers, the steel drum band, was led by Raymond Shaw a former Trinadad police constable. With highly sophisticated and stylized rhythms and sound they could create the full variations of tone of an organ on their steel drums. They played on the Tanglewood lawns, an island of metal in a sea of people.

Then came the raucous volatile and funky Voices of East Harlem. The Despers were in neat and identical blue semi-uniform jackets, but the Voices were in rags, jeans, turans and tatters. They are 21 people, youngest about 8 and oldest probably 50, brought together by the East Harlem Federation. They cut their first record and it is due out late this month.

Their sound is vibrant and has a sea echo to it plus a great beat. Two lead singers were knockouts. The first was a small boy and then a dashiki-wrapped Ethel Merman who belted and raunched the audience to their feet clapping with the spotlights whirling from performers to audience and back again.

Mies Davis, from 1946 and bebop, from his creative partnership with Gerry Mulligan and the 'cool school' to today is a great change in some respets. He is more electrified and amped and on to electronic sounds and perhaps more emotional. But he is cerebral still, a thinking as well as a feeling man's musician and he can play that horn as few men ever have.

He and his seven-man group played one long involved tone poem. Twenty minutes of exquisite solos and good group work and a flood of wild wooly electronic and jungle sounds. A witch's brew led by Davis in a white undershirt under violet lights. Steve Grossman on sax and Davis got many cries of more, more. They did an encore on the short section they played.

Then came Santana. Carlos Santana and his six-man group began in San Francisco in 1964 and were the hit, the discovery of Woodstock. He, as Davis, is a fine musician.

Purple lights, erie sounds then a gong, blinding red lights and the house went wild. Aisles jammed and clapping in unison. They are one of the really beautiful groups.

It was an integrated program and a satisfying one in every sense of those words.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Tanglewood Swings!

Santana Sound, Miles Davis Horn Rock Multitude

By JOHN A. SCHWEIZER

IF TANGLEWOOD did nothing else last night, it swung, and without letup. Santana and Miles Davis provided staggering performances which left the crowd of 17,432 emotionally spent.

The Despers, a Jamaican steel band, kicked things off nicely out on the lawn, but it was inside the Shed where the third and final Contemporary Trends program really got off the ground.

The Voices of East Harlem, a 20-member contingent of Harlem youths, stirred the crowd with a series of tunes in the Credence Clearwater revival vein. They built their swing on an intensity of repeated phrases charged with a staunch, pulsating electric bass riding on the drummer's galloping back beat.

The chorus shouted its soul in typically gospel fashion, although it had difficulties staying in tune. The visual effect of the group's choreography was as stimulating as its sound, and fingers were popping in the audience right from the first. The five-piece band (including the only three white members of the group) provided a more-than-adequate foundation for the chorus. Voices of East Harlem should have been a tough act to follow.

* * *

BUT, not surprisingly, Miles Davis had something substantial to tell the rockers about themselves. For 25 years Davis has been in the forefront of jazz's mainstream, and last night, his seven-piece group tore into seven tunes which showed the exciting direction in which his music is headed.

The group's rhythmic conception smacked decidedly of what is considered to be rock, but Davis, as always, is his own man. Drummer Jack De Johnette and Latin percussionist Airto Moreira were attentive to Davis's expressiveness (just one lilting note from Davis would completely change the rhythmic complexion of a tune), although Moreira's effectiveness was sometimes sacrificed in his efforts to run through his collection of instruments on each selection.

* * *

DAVIS'S NEW bassist (it was not Dave Holland) stayed pretty much with electric bass and repeated phrases to create intensity. However, his guitar-like dexterity on acoustic bass was dazzling and undoubtedly set him in good stead with the more conservative jazz buffs. Over-all, the rhythm was more often implied than stated, with Keith Jarrett's organ suggesting much of the pulse.

It was on this bubbling, explosive rhythmic sea that Davis and saxophonist Steve Grossman rode with crisp, biting attacks alternated with halting lyricism. Davis's chops never sounded better as he used silence as effectively as sound. Grossman, an obvious Charles Lloyd enthusiast, appeared to be aiming for more punctuation than his flowing melodies seemed to warrant, but it came off well. Grossman's star is still rising.

* * *

THE GROUP'S young electric pianist (replacing Chic Corea) was having technical problems with his amplifier during much of the set, but when the current was flowing, he proved a good foil for Jarrett's keyboard exuberance.

No doubt about it, Davis was definitely at home in the rock setting of last night's concert, and he probably turned a number of rock enthusiasts on to what he is still very much into — jazz. Davis's set was easily the most impressive musical offering of the night.

* * *

ALTHOUGH DAVIS was exciting, Santana was simply out of sight! Nothing could have followed Santana except emotional exhaustion (and it did).

The explosiveness, drive and intensity generated by this six-man Latin rock group is almost unbelievable. The group was obliged to do three encore numbers, each of which somehow surpassed the previous tune in sheer excitement.

For all the success that groups like Chicago have had with Latin-flavored arrangements, only in Santana does the Afro-Cuban nature of the music sound genuine. This is not surprising, since half the group is of Latin descent. Guitarist-leader Carlos Santana stayed well within the context of the music, allowing it to swing on its own. Although he is a fair guitarist, he was not given to pyrotechnical displays. His solos evoked images of greasy blues; a Spanish-Harlemesque lyricism.

Organist Greg Rolie was the most impressive musician in the group. He is in a class by himself in playing rock and Latin on that instrument, so that much of the group's intensity was built around Rolie's driving organ.

* * *

KID-FACED Mike Shrieve was almost as outstanding on drums. He fired the others unmercifully and was a Rock of Gibraltar on tempos. Cooking all the while were Jose Areas and Mike Carrabello on congas, timbales, gourds, castinets, claves, etc., etc., etc. Electric bassist Dave Brown was extremely effective with his totally rhythmic pulsations, which seemed to go better with this type of music than the flowing bass lines of Blood, Sweat & Tears' Jim Fielder, for example.

Technicalities aside, Santana (the group) had the audience in increasing rhythmic ecstasy with each number. Counting off tunes from their album plus some new selections, the group got everybody off their feet and on the chairs in an orgy of swing. It didn't seem possible anything could surpass the hypnotic throb of "Jingo," the last tune on the regular program. But those encores did. Santana is a group to be reckoned with.

Whitestone

The Steel Band on the lawn at Tanglewood

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247

AUG 20 1970 New

At Tanglewood

People Enjoying Themselves

BY JON BUSHNELL

Tuesday, August 18th, marked the last concert of The Fillmore at Tanglewood with the appearance of The Voices of East Harlem, Miles Davis, and Santana. All three were relatively new to me and consequently pleasantly surprising. The Voices of East Harlem, a black dance group with white instrumental accompaniment, were good. However, they were on too early to play for a full, appreciative house. Miles Davis performed second and he should have been last as he was by far the best. What we heard of him was excellent but his music needs and deserves audience involvement and there was none. Santana was billed as the 'big name' of the night but I found myself falling asleep as I heard the basic patterns of his music repeated over and over again with different variations. They were good, but loud, with a too-heavy emphasis on percussion.

All in all the concert was a success, and it did complete the trend that the two previous concerts had set. There were many people enjoying themselves although it took them a while to get settled, and there was an over-all sense of percaution as the 'rip-off' men of Bill Graham's crew were everywhere.

150

The World of Rock

Many Good Things Coming Rock's Way

By FRED LE BRUN

Mr. Rios is just wiggling with anticipation, so many good

The Tanglewood Fillmore East show last week was so good all the boys at the Institute are looking forward to the next performance by Bill Graham's wunderkinder: on July 21. Scratch Joe Cocker (too bad) and add Jimi Hendrix to that bill, which will include John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

On Aug. 18 [illegible] will present [illegible] show of the season at Tanglewood with Santana, Miles Davis, and the Voices of East Harlem.

Nearer is Bob Hite's group, Canned Heat, which will appear at the Colonie Tent Monday at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are still available (785-3393).

REMEMBER, the Band will be at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center on the 20th.

Ike and Tina Turner, probably the hottest Black group in the country right (Janes Brown's at the Palace this week too) replaces Miles Davis at the Berkshire Music Barn tomorrow night.

Berkshire has changed its schedule somewhat, so you should write for a new one.

CANNED HEAT — AT THE COLONIE TENT MONDAY

Write: Music Barn, Lenox, Mass.

Their revised schedule reads like this: July 17, Theatre Black; 18, B.B. King: 19, Miles Davis; 24, La Mama B.U. Theatre; 25, Jazz revival Benefit; 26, Mahalia Jackson. August 1, to be announced; James Taylor; 7 Contemporary Theatre Forum; 8 Little Richard; 14, Contemporary Music Forum; 15, Mountain; 16,22,23, to be announced.

THE BRIGHT news is that Little Richard Penniman hisself will be here to shout scream and sweat. This will be a must for old-timers, camp followers, and lovers of good old rock and roll.

Here in Albany, St. Peter's Church will present on July 23 the first of a series of afternoon music presentations.

Jazz rock by the Non-Profit Organization will be heard at 12:15 to 1:14 p.m. in the garden of the church at 107 State Street.

With all this heavy stuff out of the way, a warning before the friviolities: don't count on going to the Biggest Rock Festival of All Time at Middlefield, Conn., planned for July 31-Aug. 2. Local officials have got St. Vitus' Dance and things look tough for the promoters. The usual harassment over health permists, etc., may scuttle the whole affair. Call before you go. Mountsidale, of course, was canceled at the last minute.

Stay out of Singapore if you value your record collection.

The Singapore government has forbidden the sale or broadcast of the musical score of "Hair" and all records by the Beatles in a campaign to suppress what the government calls harmful western influence.

Police have refused to identify the songs on their forbidden list but radio spokesmen said the list includes "Walk Right In," 'Puff, The Magic Dragon,' "Pusher," "Happiness is a Warm Gun," "Mr. Tambourine Man," "Stone Soul Picnic," "White Rabbitt", "Itchy Koo Park" and "Get Off My Cloud,' and of course, all the Beatle songs.

A radio spokesman said the Singapore Ministry of Culture has degreed the banning of "drug-orientated and anti-establishment songs" in particular.

Singapore is supposed to be on our side, if you're wondering.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,038
JUL 11 1970

Davis, Santana next at Tanglewood

Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood today at the Contemporary Trends Concert of the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

MILES DAVIS
. . . At Tanglewood

Carlos Santana is Santana's lead singer and lead guitar player. Born in Autlan, Mexico, he started playing the violin at age five but took up the guitar later on because he was playing too many notes for the violin. At age fourteen, Carlos was entertaining in assorted bars in Tijuana. Then he moved to San Francisco, where in 1966, he got the Santana band together.

Created Sextet

The sextet creates an Acid-Latin sound which is part of the coming of age of the hard rock generation of musicians — the ability to carry the concept into more established areas of music and not lose either's excitement or style.

Santana released their first LP in September of '69 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, they were unknown outside of California. In seven weeks, it was number ten on the national charts and since has sold over one million copies.

Davis Music Praised

Miles Davis is acknowledged one of the great jazz musicians playing today. His music has been heralded, not only in the U.S. but throughout the entire world. Many of his works are now considered to be classics, among them his LPs, "Sketches of Spain" and "Porgy and Bess."

Davis has never been content to rest on the laurels of his "classics." He is always out front on the brink of what is new and is considered one of the most creative and original musical talents of today.

His current release, "Bitches Brew," is one of his most successful to date.

East Harlem Group

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group. Under the direction of former professional gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have travelled across the U.S. Their average age is sixteen. Their first album will be released early in September.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656
AUG 18 1970

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
AUG 14 1970
New England Newsclip

SANTANA

Santana, Davis at Tanglewood

Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood on Tuesday at 6 ~~p. m. at the~~ Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood boxoffice. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a. m. on the day of the concert only.

The Santana sextet creates an electric and soul - filling sound which is part of the coming age of the hard rock generation of musicians. The group released its first LP in September 1969 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, it was unknown outside of California.

MILES DAVIS

Miles Davis is one of today's great jazz musicians. Many of his works are now considered classics.

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group which has become one of the most unique and highly acclaimed attractions in the country. Under the direction of former gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have been turning on audiences from coast to coast.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, August 12, 1970

'Trends' Concert At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — "Santana," "Miles Davis and the "Voices of East Harlem" will appear at Tanglewood Tuesday at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6:00 p.m.

Reserved seats are available by mail at $5.00, $6.00 and $7.00 with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc." A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 1240. Admission to the lawn will be out on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4.00.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 16 1970
New England Newsclip

Pop notes...

Duke Ellington here today

DUKE ELLINGTON: The legendary band leader, who has created a permanent idiom of jazz composition, will be appearing this evening at the Elma Lewis Playhouse in The Park. Duke is unique in the jazz field in that he has kept his orchestra intact for virtually four decades.

TOM RUSH: A Harvard graduate and local talent, will be appearing at the Schaefer Festival, Harvard Stadium tomorrow night. This evening at 8 p.m. Tom Rush will perform at the South Shore Music Circus.

MELANIE: The popular folk performer, will also be on the bill Monday evening at Harvard Stadium.

MILES DAVIS, SANTANA, the VOICES OF EAST HARLEM: will be at Tanglewood this Tuesday evening. The concert will be sponsored by Bill Graham of the Fillmore. Fans are advised to attend the concert promptly at 6 p.m. as Miles Davis could repeat the stunt he pulled at Harvard stadium recently by appearing first on the bill. Also Miles is notorious for delivering short, but brilliant sets. Santana is a popular percussive group which first scored at Woodstock and were prominently featured in the Warner Brothers movie.

ART BLAKEY: and his Jazz Messengers will take over at the Jazz Workshop all this week. Blakey is another of the great jazz drummers, continuing what has been a percussive summer for local fans.

The World of Rock

Many Good Things Coming Rock's Way

By FRED LE BRUN

Mr. Rios is just wiggling with anticipation, so many good

The Tanglewood Fillmore East show last week was so good all the boys at the Institute are looking forward to the next performance by Bill Graham's wunderkinder: on July 21. Scratch Joe Cocker (too bad) and add Jimi Hendrix to that bill, which will include John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

On Aug. 18 [illegible] present [illegible] season at Tanglewood with Santana, Miles Davis, and the Voices of East Harlem.

Nearer is Bob Hite's group, Canned Heat, which will appear at the Colonie Tent Monday at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are still available (785-3393).

REMEMBER, the Band will be at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center on the 20th.

Ike and Tina Turner, probably the hottest Black group in the country right (James Brown's at the Palace this week too) replaces Miles Davis at the Berkshire Music Barn tomorrow night.

Berkshire has changed its schedule somewhat, so you should write for a new one.

CANNED HEAT — AT THE COLONIE TENT MONDAY

Write: Music Barn, Lenox, Mass.

Their revised schedule reads like this: July 17, Theatre Black; 18, B.B. King; 19, Miles Davis; 24, La Mama B.U. Theatre; 25, Jazz revival Benefit; 26, Mahalia Jackson. August 1, to be announced; James Taylor; 7 Contemporary Theatre Forum; 8 Little Richard; 14, Contemporary Music Forum; 15, Mountain; 16,22,23, to be announced.

THE BRIGHT news is that Little Richard Penniman hisself will be here to shout scream and sweat. This will be a must for old-timers, camp followers, and lovers of good old rock and roll.

Here in Albany, St. Peter's Church will present on July 23 the first of a series of afternoon music presentations.

Jazz rock by the Non-Profit Organization will be heard at 12:15 to 1:14 p.m. in the garden of the church at 107 State Street.

With all this heavy stuff out of the way, a warning before the friviolities: don't count on going to the Biggest Rock Festival of All Time at Middlefield, Conn., planned for July 31-Aug. 2. Local officials have got St. Vitus' Dance and things look tough for the promoters. The usual harassment over health permists, etc., may scuttle the whole affair. Call before you go. Mountsidale, of course, was canceled at the last minute.

Stay out of Singapore if you value your record collection.

The Singapore government has forbidden the sale or broadcast of the musical score of "Hair" and all records by the Beatles in a campaign to suppress what the government calls harmful western influence.

Police have refused to identify the songs on their forbidden list but radio spokesmen said the list includes "Walk Right In," 'Puff, The Magic Dragon,' "Pusher," "Happiness is a Warm Gun," "Mr. Tambourine Man," "Stone Soul Picnic," "White Rabbitt", "Itchy Koo Park" and "Get Off My Cloud,' and of course, all the Beatle songs.

A radio spokesman said the Singapore Ministry of Culture has decreed the banning of "drug-orientated and anti-establishment songs" in particular.

Singapore is supposed to be on our side, if you're wondering.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

AUG 14 1970

New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.

JUL 11 1970

Davis, Santana next at Tanglewood

Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood today at the Contemporary Trends Concert of the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

MILES DAVIS
. . . At Tanglewood

Carlos Santana is Santana's lead singer and lead guitar player. Born in Autlan, Mexico, he started playing the violin at age five but took up the guitar later on because he was playing too many notes for the violin. At age fourteen, Carlos was entertaining in assorted bars in Tijuana. Then he moved to San Francisco, where in 1966, he got the Santana band together.

Created Sextet

The sextet creates an Acid-Latin sound which is part of the coming of age of the hard rock generation of musicians — the ability to carry the concept into more established areas of music and not lose either's excitement or style.

Santana released their first LP in September of '69 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, they were unknown outside of California. In seven weeks, it was number ten on the national charts and since has sold over one million copies.

Davis Music Praised

Miles Davis is acknowledged one of the great jazz musicians playing today. His music has been heralded, not only in the U.S. but throughout the entire world. Many of his works are now considered to be classics, among them his LPs, "Sketches of Spain" and "Porgy and Bess."

Davis has never been content to rest on the laurels of his "classics." He is always out front on the brink of what is new and is considered one of the most creative and original musical talents of today.

His current release, "Bitches Brew," is one of his most successful to date.

East Harlem Group

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group. Under the direction of former professional gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have travelled across the U.S. Their average age is sixteen. Their first album will be released early in September.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal

AUG 18 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.

AUG 16 1970

New England Newsclip

SANTANA

Santana, Davis at Tanglewood

Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood on Tuesday at 6 p. m. at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood boxoffice. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a. m. on the day of the concert only.

The Santana sextet creates an electric and soul - filling sound which is part of the coming age of the hard rock generation of musicians. The group released its first LP in September 1969 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, it was unknown outside of California.

MILES DAVIS

Miles Davis is one of today's great jazz musicians. Many of his works are now considered classics.

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group which has become one of the most unique and highly acclaimed attractions in the country. Under the direction of former gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have been turning on audiences from coast to coast.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, August 12, 1970

'Trends' Concert At Tanglewood

LENOX, MASS. — "Santana," "Miles Davis and the "Voices of East Harlem" will appear at Tanglewood Tuesday at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6:00 p.m.

Reserved seats are available by mail at $5.00, $6.00 and $7.00 with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc." A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 1240. Admission to the lawn will be out on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4.00.

Pop notes...

Duke Ellington here today

DUKE ELLINGTON: The legendary band leader, who has created a permanent idiom of jazz composition, will be appearing this evening at the Elma Lewis Playhouse in The Park. Duke is unique in the jazz field in that he has kept his orchestra intact for virtually four decades.

TOM RUSH: A Harvard graduate and local talent will be appearing at the Schaefer Festival, Harvard Stadium tomorrow night. This evening at 8 p.m. Tom Rush will perform at the South Shore Music Circus.

MELANIE: The popular folk performer, will also be on the bill Monday evening at Harvard Stadium.

MILES DAVIS, SANTANA, the VOICES OF EAST HARLEM: will be at Tanglewood this Tuesday evening. The concert will be sponsored by Bill Graham of the Fillmore. Fans are advised to attend the concert promptly at 6 p.m. as Miles Davis could repeat the stunt he pulled at Harvard stadium recently by appearing first on the bill. Also Miles is notorious for delivering short, but brilliant sets. Santana is a popular percussive group which first scored at Woodstock and were prominently featured in the Warner Brothers movie.

ART BLAKEY: and his Jazz Messengers will take over at the Jazz Workshop all this week. Blakey is another of the great jazz drummers, continuing what has been a percussive summer for local fans.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

JUL 15 1970

NIGHT OWL reporter

Let There Be Light

Walking through the night time streets of Chelsea, I pass under rock music blaring from a second-floor window. My eye goes to the source and there, perched on the window sill, is one of those mass-produced department store-sold light boxes, idiotically pulsing red, green and blue, presumably in some sync with the music.

And that, it often appears, is where the whole light-show thing has evolved, down to its lowest common denominator.

Yet the belief in the technique as a creative art form persists, at least in the professional light-makers' eyes. Quality will survive shoddy imitation, they say.

Josh White, founder of the Joshua Light Show at the Fillmore, passed that job on to his associates and struck out for newer ground last spring. He sat in his East Side apartment the other day, stereo speakers going, but no light-machine pulsing, and contemplated his start five years ago when he was very young, and the future now that he's 27. "It's funny to be talking about the light show," he said. "The further away I get from it, the fonder I am of the whole thing."

He began learning the field before the light-show concept had broken in full force on the East Coast, inundating us with practitioners of the "psychedelic" and "multimedia." His apprenticeship went into the world of fashion shows and discotheques, and he made his distinctive mark at the Fillmore, where he directed a crew of artist-technicians the way a conductor leads an orchestra.

Early Tanglewood arrivals settle on lawn facing TV screen.

In dance halls, spectators can turn through 360 degrees; in concert halls, the point of view is fixed. Thus, Josh said, he conceived the giant screen with moving colored forms projected from the rear toward the audience. "My idea was to use a screen so big that the screen was gone," he said. "The screen at the Fillmore is 20 by 30. When I did the projections at Woodstock, the screen was 30 by 60. You don't gain by going on indefinitely. The object was not to do a light show on the White Cliffs of Dover."

Several months ago Josh decided to move on. His main occupation at the moment is directing closed circuit TV broadcasts and videotapings. For one, he's doing the Fillmore-sponsored Tanglewood rock concerts, where a 15-by-20 TV screen carries the action to the lawn for those who can't see inside the open auditorium.

To go this route, he had to join the Directors Guild of America and he had to form a business association with the company that owns the equipment, because it's too expensive for one man to finance. "Yes, I'm definitely moving in establishment directions," he said, "but I've always leaned that way. I ran my light show that way."

Bill Schwartzbach and Tom Shoesmith, the engineering hands behind Josh's mental creations, stayed on at the Fillmore for a while and then split for Montreal. There, with eight others as Joe's Lights, they're putting on a light show, which incorporates pictures and printed texts this summer at La Ronde, the amusement park area at the city's Man and His World (former Expo 67). "Half dramatic theater, half visual ride" is how Bill described their show.

The group share a house one subway stop from the grounds and hope they won't have to return to New York after Labor Day. "There's a little bit of the American dream here which America doesn't have," Bill said. "Montreal comes closer to the concept of democracy that we were taught in New York than America is. I'm sorry to say that. Here we don't run into hostile static about long hair, for instance. It's a frontier ethic."

Back at the Fillmore, the resident artists now are the Pig Light Show, seven persons ranging from 17 to 20, for whom Josh has great hopes as the new light generation. Their head is Marc Rubenstein, 18, a Long Island high school dropout.

He was only 16 when he formed Pig Light. The name came from his nickname and has nothing to do with police, yet the group can't use that name in credit for "Comedy Tonight," a network TV program for which they do lighting effects under Josh's direction. The TV executives were afraid viewers would read a political statement into the lights, Mark said. No doubt about it.

ERNEST LEOGRANDE

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

JUL 25 1970

Joshua TV Debuts

NEW YORK — Joshua Television has solved one of the major problems of mass-audience evening concerts through the use of color videomagnification at a recent (July 7) concert at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

A large outdoor screen made it possible for twice as many people to appreciate a live performance by The Who, sponsored by Fillmore East/Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Festival. Of the 18,000 persons attending the event, 12,000 were otuside on the lawn area viewing the show on the 20 x 15 foot closed circuit TV screen.

The July 7 concert, which marked the first use of color videomagnification for a rock performance, was so successful that Joshua Television has been retained for the next two Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Miles Davis at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood on Aug. 18 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office. Reserved seats are available by mail at $5., $6, and $7 with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc." A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4. The lawn will open to the public at 4 p.m. on the day of the concert.

Carlos Santana is Santana's lead singer and lead guitar player. Born in Autlan, Mexico, he started playing the violin at age five, but took up the guitar later on because he was playing too many notes for the violin. At age 14, Carlos was entertaining in assorted sordid bars in Tijuana. Then he moved to San Francisco, where in 1966, he got the Santana band together.

The phenomenal sextet creates an electric and soul-filling Acid-Latin sound which is part of the coming of age of the hard rock generation of musicians — the ability to carry the concept into more established areas of music and not lose either's excitement or style. Santana released their first LP in September of '69 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, they were unknown outside of California. In seven weeks, it was number ten on the national charts and since has sold one million copies.

MILES DAVIS

Miles Davis is considered one of the great jazz musicians playing today. His music has been heralded, not only in the U.S. but throughout the entire world. Many of his works are now considered to be classics, among them his Columbia LPs, "Sketches of Spain" and "Porgy and Bess."

Miles Davis has never been content to rest on the laurels of his "classics." He is always out front on the brink of what is new. He is, undoubtedly, one of the most creative and original musical talents of today. His current Columbia LP, "Bitches Brew," is one of his most successful to date and certainly one of his most exciting.

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group which has, in the short time since, become one of the most unique and highly acclaimed music attractions in the country. Under the direction of former professional gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have travelled across the U.S. turning on audiences from coast to coast with an excitement, energy and sheer talent which belies their youth. Their average age is sixteen. Their first album will be released by Elektra early in September.

In addition, for the benefit of the lawn audience, there will be two giant television screens providing complete (and in color) simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Limited.

Pre-Concert Music on the Lawn by The Despers.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

JUL 15 1970

NIGHT OWL reporter

Let There Be Light

Walking through the night time streets of Chelsea, I pass under rock music blaring from a second-floor window. My eye goes to the source and there, perched on the window sill, is one of those mass-produced department store-sold light boxes, idiotically pulsing red, green and blue, presumably in some sync with the music.

And that, it often appears, is where the whole light-show thing has evolved, down to its lowest common denominator.

Yet the belief in the technique as a creative art form persists, at least in the professional light-makers' eyes. Quality will survive shoddy imitation, they say.

Josh White, founder of the Joshua Light Show at the Fillmore, passed that job on to his associates and struck out for newer ground last spring. He sat in his East Side apartment the other day, stereo speakers going, but no light-machine pulsing, and contemplated his start five years ago when he was very young, and the future now that he's 27. "It's funny to be talking about the light show," he said. "The further away I get from it, the fonder I am of the whole thing."

He began learning the field before the light-show concept had broken in full force on the East Coast, inundating us with practitioners of the "psychedelic" and "multimedia." His apprenticeship went into the world of fashion shows and discotheques, and he made his distinctive mark at the Fillmore, where he directed a crew of artist-technicians the way a conductor leads an orchestra.

Early Tanglewood arrivals settle on lawn facing TV screen.

In dance halls, spectators can turn through 360 degrees; in concert halls, the point of view is fixed. Thus, Josh said, he conceived the giant screen with moving colored forms projected from the rear toward the audience. "My idea was to use a screen so big that the screen was gone," he said. "The screen at the Fillmore is 20 by 30. When I did the projections at Woodstock, the screen was 30 by 60. You don't gain by going on indefinitely. The object was not to do a light show on the White Cliffs of Dover."

Several months ago Josh decided to move on. His main occupation at the moment is directing closed circuit TV broadcasts and videotapings. For one, he's doing the Fillmore-sponsored Tanglewood rock concerts, where a 15-by-20 TV screen carries the action to the lawn for those who can't see inside the open auditorium.

To go this route, he had to join the Directors Guild of America and he had to form a business association with the company that owns the equipment, because it's too expensive for one man to finance. "Yes, I'm definitely moving in establishment directions," he said, "but I've always leaned that way. I ran my light show that way."

Bill Schwartzbach and Tom Shoesmith, the engineering hands behind Josh's mental creations, stayed on at the Fillmore for a while and then split for Montreal. There, with eight others as Joe's Lights, they're putting on a light show, which incorporates pictures and printed texts this summer at La Ronde, the amusement park area at the city's Man and His World (former Expo 67). "Half dramatic theater, half visual ride" is how Bill described their show.

The group share a house one subway stop from the grounds and hope they won't have to return to New York after Labor Day. "There's a little bit of the American dream here which America doesn't have," Bill said. "Montreal comes closer to the concept of democracy that we were taught in New York than America is. I'm sorry to say that. Here we don't run into hostile static about long hair, for instance. It's a frontier ethic."

Back at the Fillmore, the resident artists now are the Pig Light Show, seven persons ranging from 17 to 20, for whom Josh has great hopes as the new light generation. Their head is Marc Rubenstein, 18, a Long Island high school dropout.

He was only 16 when he formed Pig Light. The name came from his nickname and has nothing to do with police, yet the group can't use that name in credit for "Comedy Tonight," a network TV program for which they do lighting effects under Josh's direction. The TV executives were afraid viewers would read a political statement into the lights, Mark said. No doubt about it.

ERNEST LEOGRANDE

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

JUL 25 1970

Joshua TV Debuts

NEW YORK — Joshua Television has solved one of the major problems of mass-audience evening concerts through the use of color videomagnification at a recent (July 7) concert at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

A large outdoor screen made it possible for twice as many people to appreciate a live performance by The Who, sponsored by Fillmore East/Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Festival. Of the 18,000 persons attending the event, 12,000 were otuside on the lawn area viewing the show on the 20 x 15 foot closed circuit TV screen.

The July 7 concert, which marked the first use of color videomagnification for a rock performance, was so successful that Joshua Television has been retained for the next two Contemporary Trends Concerts at Tanglewood.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

AUG 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Miles Davis at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Santana, Miles Davis and the Voices of East Harlem will appear at Tanglewood on Aug. 18 at the Contemporary Trends Concert sponsored by Fillmore producer Bill Graham in association with the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will begin at 6 p.m.

Tickets are on sale now at the Tanglewood box office. Reserved seats are available by mail at $5, $6, and $7 with check or money order payable to the "Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc." A self-addressed, stamped envelope should be sent to Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240. Admission to the lawn will be put on sale at 9 a.m. on the day of the concert only and will be offered to the public at $4. The lawn will open to the public at 4 p.m. on the day of the concert.

Carlos Santana is Santana's lead singer and lead guitar player. Born in Autlan, Mexico, he started playing the violin at age five, but took up the guitar later on because he was playing too many notes for the violin. At age 14, Carlos was entertaining in assorted sordid bars in Tijuana. Then he moved to San Francisco, where in 1966, he got the Santana band together.

The phenomenal sextet creates an electric and soul-filling Acid-Latin sound which is part of the coming of age of the hard rock generation of musicians — the ability to carry the concept into more established areas of music and not lose either's excitement or style. Santana released their first LP in September of '69 at a time when, with the exception of an appearance at Woodstock, they were unknown outside of California. In seven weeks, it was number ten on the national charts and since has sold one million copies.

MILES DAVIS

Miles Davis is considered one of the great jazz musicians playing today. His music has been heralded, not only in the U.S. but throughout the entire world. Many of his works are now considered to be classics, among them his Columbia LPs, "Sketches of Spain" and "Porgy and Bess."

Miles Davis has never been content to rest on the laurels of his "classics." He is always out front on the brink of what is new. He is, undoubtedly, one of the most creative and original musical talents of today. His current Columbia LP, "Bitches Brew," is one of his most successful to date and certainly one of his most exciting.

Twenty young people from the East Harlem Youth Federation were assembled in 1968 by Anna and Charles Griffin into a singing group which has, in the short time since, become one of the most unique and highly acclaimed music attractions in the country. Under the direction of former professional gospel singer Bernice Cole, the Voices of East Harlem have travelled across the U.S. turning on audiences from coast to coast with an excitement, energy and sheer talent which belies their youth. Their average age is sixteen. Their first album will be released by Elektra early in September.

In addition, for the benefit of the lawn audience, there will be two giant television screens providing complete (and in color) simultaneous coverage of the concert by Joshua Television Limited.

Pre-Concert Music on the Lawn by The Despers.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG
Music Director

1970 Tanglewood

SEIJI OZAWA and GUNTHER SCHULLER artistic directors
LEONARD BERNSTEIN advisor

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

TODAY, SUNDAY JULY 26
2:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
KENNETH SCHERMERHORN conductor
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH pianist
Haydn: Symphony no. 83 'The Hen'
Mozart: Piano concerto K.459
Stravinsky: Concerto in D
Tchaikovsky: Suite no. 4 'Mozartiana'

BEETHOVEN WEEKEND
FRIDAY, JULY 31
7 pm SHED
Weekend Prelude
Beethoven
Variations op. 121a
Piano trio op. 70
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
JULES ESKIN cellist
RICHARD GOODE pianist
9 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG
CLAUDE FRANK pianist
BEETHOVEN
Leonore overture no. 3
Piano concerto no. 2
King Stephan overture
Symphony no. 8

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1
10:30 am SHED
BSO—Open Rehearsal
8:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG
ANDRÉ WATTS pianist
BEETHOVEN
Coriolan overture
Piano concerto no. 4
Symphony no. 4

SUNDAY, AUGUST 2
2:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ANTAL DORATI
VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY pianist
BEETHOVEN
Egmont overture
Piano concerto no. 3
Symphony no. 7

Tickets: $3.50, 4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 7, 7.50, 8 and $8.50 (Box Seat. A box contains 6 chairs. Special parking provided.) Ticket to Friday concert includes admission to Weekend Prelude. Admission to lawn: $3 (available day of concert.) Open Rehearsal: $2.50 (Unreserved, available day of concert.) All children regardless of age must have a ticket.

Tickets are available at all TICKETRON outlets and the Tanglewood Box Office

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS CONCERTS
Tuesday July 27/Theatre/8:30 pm
JEANNE LEE with MARION BROWN and JACK GREGG
UNIVER. of ILL. JAZZ BAND
JOHN GARVEY leader
Tickets: $4 (reserved) $3 (lawn)

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE
GALA CONCERT
July 28/8:30 pm/SHED
in honor of AARON COPLAND'S 70th birthday
BOSTON SYMPHONY and BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRAS
AARON COPLAND conductor
LUKAS FOSS pianist/conductor
Bernstein: Candide overture
Bach: Piano concerto in D minor
Hindemith: Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber
Copland: Suite from The Tender Land
Tchaikovsky: Romeo and Juliet
Tickets: $3, 4.50, 5, 6, 6.50

this week at
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER
Today, Sunday, July 26
10 am Chamber Music Hall
BMC CHAMBER MUSIC
8:30 pm Theatre
FACULTY RECITAL
ROMAN TOTENBERG violinist

Thursday, July 30
8:30 pm Theatre
an evening with
LUKAS FOSS and ensemble

Sunday, August 2
10 am Chamber Music Hall
BMC CHAMBER MUSIC
8:30 pm Theatre
BMC ORCHESTRA
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN conductor

Programs subject to change.

For further ticket information
TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS. 01240
(413) 637-1600
Baldwin Piano — RCA Records

Odetta Draws Crowd Of 1,049

7/15

The Odetta concert at Tanglewood last night drew a crowd of some 1,049 music buffs. The Gary Burton Quintet and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers were also on the program.

The event was one of the regular Tuesday Contemporary Trends concerts. Chicago, John Sebastion and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band will appear next week.

Berkshire Eagle, Thursday, July 16, 1970

Editor

Satisfied Listener At Tanglewood

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Over 1,000 people left Tanglewood Tuesday, well satisfied by one of the most diversified programs ever held as part of the "Contemporary Trends" series.

The show opened with the Crayton Family Singers. Their set was rather amateurish at times but several numbers (notably "Two Wings") had the audience foot-stomping and hand-clapping with an almost religious fervor. Sister Joyce Clayton has the pixie-like charm and fervent delivery of a true gospel saint.

The Gary Burton Quartet then gave the audience a taste of jazz. Burton is a dancing dervish and his vibe work is impeccable. With the able backing of Bill Goodwin on drums, Jerry Hahn on guitar, and a magician named Steve Swallow on the electric bass, Mr. Burton led his vibes through a potpourri of the best jazz I've heard in this area in years. (Whatever happened to jazz on FM radio?)

A Bob Dylan song, "I Want You," provided the medium for Steve Swallow to explore the full range of his electric bass. Swallow pulls more music out of his instrument than I thought humanly possible.

A short intermission, too short considering the lack of comfort at the theatre, preceded the main attraction of the evening.

Odetta! With incense burning in the tuning pegs of her guitar and a dress that rivaled Gunther Schuller's sport coat for color, Odetta was on.

C. C. Rider became Easy Rider with remarks designed to remind us (if we needed it) of her essential blackness. Odetta was political and a few people left because of this. She was also our baby-sitter and the children's songs she sang kept this little kid fascinated. Winnie the Pooh with lyrics by A. A. Milne and music by O. Odetta was enough to make me long for short pants and a swing on the oak tree.

She made everyone stand for "This Land Is Your Land," saying it was her choice for a national anthem. If she promises to sing it herself she has my vote.

Gunther Schuller opened the program by explaining that we were in the theatre rather than the Shed because the program was not designed as much for commercial success as for artistic merit. Despite the inferior sound system the evening was an enormous success. Thank you, Mr. Schuller and encore!

ROGER A. OCHS

257 East St.
Pittsfield

Tanglewood's Friends of Music: A summer bargain

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — There is not a better musical bargain in New England than membership in the Friends of Music in Tanglewood: $15 for the season, or $25 for the family membership gets you admission to more than 30 events during the eight weeks the Berkshire Music Center is in session, including chamber, orchestral, vocal, and several solo concerts.

This summer there is as well a series of open rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Gunther Schuller, artistic co-director at Tanglewood, wishes to emphasize training and learning rather than performance, and much of the orchestra's preparatory work this year will not necessarily lead to formal public concerts.

The student orchestral players will work this Summer with their various conductors including Schuller, Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's other co-director, Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, Boston Symphony concert master Joseph Silverstein, and Leon Barzin, in charge of training conductors at the center.

In most instances the week's work will culminate in a rehersal open to the Friends of Music in Tanglewood, and the series was inaugurated Thursday evening by Leonard Bernstein, who has the title Advisor to Tanglewood, and the music he had chosen was Anton Bruckner's Ninth Symphony.

The event was billed as an open rehearsal, although it was to all intents a concert. It even looked like a concert in that nobody wore what they would wear to a working rehearsal (open or not), with the girls in the white dresses customary for them at BMC concerts, the boys with white shirts and ties, and the conductor in white suit with tab collared shirt and narrow conservative necktie.

Bernstein told the audience that they were very loyal to brave the damp, unwelcoming weatheer then explained that what was to follow might turn out to be a concert or that they might stop and work if he thought it necessary. There had been four previous rehearsals on the Bruckner, he said, but please to remember that the orchestra was only three days old, having met for the first time on Monday.

After some words of praise for the players — "I have heard from this podium some Brucker that was as fine as any in the world, and some that was not." — and a sentence or two about the music, Bernstein turned around and took the orchestra straight through the symphony.

Some did not think to turn off the microphone (or perhaps thought not to turn it off) so that there was almost always an extra strand of vocal polyphony; it was Bernstein's show much more than Bruckner's.

Bernstein delivered a souped up sort of a performance — anything St. Theresa could do, Bernstein can do better, to paraphrase Miss Toklas's most famous recipe — one that took an exceedingly willful view of the music's expressive content and, in the interests of that view, of questions of tempo and articulation.

That is perhaps not the principal issue here, although I would want to consider questions of style and interpretation in gauging the value of a training and learning operation in music. If, however, you take the view that Bernstein's chief task during the past week was to turn good players into a good orchestra, then you have to say that he succeeded superbly.

The BMC orchestra is usually good, but in seven summers of visits to Tanglewood I have not heard one to equal the 1970 edition. Thursday evening had been preceded obviously by hard and effective work, and the week had been informed not only by the excitement and sense of inspiration Bernstein can generate, but by his professionalism as well.

The woodwinds were good, but I was more impressed by the brass, whose confident brilliance is perhaps the function of their youth, but whose refusal to blare is really the thing to remark on, by the exceptional timpanist, and most of all by the strings, who played with a cleanness of pitch, tone, and an attack that many a "real" orchestra would find hard to match. It was an exciting beginning, and the standard set Thursday set quite a challenge to the conductor teachers and to the players themselves during the remainder of the summer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

MAY 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Friends Group Opens Membership Drive

Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairman of the membership committee of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, announced today the kickoff of the annual membership drive of the Friends of Music. An appeal letter has been sent to many Berkshire and out-of-state residents in an effort to meet a goal of $80,000, an increase of $32,000 over last year. Mrs. Rice and her committee succeeded in more than doubling the Friends membership over the previous year.

A flier in the mailed appeal states, "Friends are concerned people, concerned about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about Tanglewood and about the educational work of the Berkshire Music Center." It adds that support is needed badly, and that ticket sales earn only half of the cost of the Tanglewood season.

40 Concerts Free

Again this year Friends membership will include admission to more than 40 concerts presented by the students of the Berkshire Music Center. A preliminary schedule has been included in the appeal letter. The schedule includes such well-known names in music as Leonard Bernstein, Michael Thomas and Seiji Ozawa.

This year the Tanglewood Tent, established in 1969, will again operate as a gathering place for the larger annual donors to the Friends. Individual season memberships will be $100 or more, and business memberships $250 or more. This year there will also be a $15 weekly tent membership, not in lieu of a regular contribution to the Friends, entitling donors to the same privileges as season members, but not reserved parking privileges.

Individual membership in the Friends costs $15 for the season, while a Family membership, which includes the entire household, costs $25. New categories of Friends this year are benefactors and patrons contributing $1,000 and $500 or more, respectively. They are eligible to have associate and full fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center named for whomever they choose.

New Categories

Other new categories are sustaining and supporting members, contributing $250 and more and $100 and more.

Working with Mrs. Rice on her committee have been Mrs. Samuel Boxer, Mrs. Prentice Bradley and Mrs. Morton Weiss, all of Pittsfield; Mrs. Gardner L. Brown, Richmond; Mrs. Churchward Davis, Lee; Mrs. Frederick W. Lord, Stockbridge; Mrs. John H. Winant, Williamstown; and Mrs. Edward H. Cumpston, Bennington, Vt.

Requests for information about joining the Friends of Music at Tanglewood may be addressed to Tanglewood Friends Office, Lenox.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter
by Alison Arnold

Friends of BSO Plan Activities

IF YOU ARE A FRIEND of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, you will once again receive invitations from the Council of Friends for "Two Series of Friday Morning Events." These are only the beginning of activities planned for the 1970-71 season by the Council, again under the capable leadership of Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr.

They stress the fact that the loyal support of the Friends has never been more needed than now for the orchestra to maintain its standard of excellence and its prominent position worldwide.

As a Friend—or join now as a new Friend—plan to attend with a guest the Pre-Symphony Luncheons at Horticultural Hall, Sept. 25, Dec. 18, Feb. 12 and April 1. The co-chairmen, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson, have planned four unusual luncheon menus and special floral decorations.

The original and informal Stage Door Lectures at Symphony Hall will be followed by an a la carte bar and box luncheon. Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird, co-chairmen, have planned for members of the orchestra to lecture Oct. 9, Nov. 13, Jan. 22 and Feb. 26. Orchestra members lecturing will include Armando Chitalla, trumpet; Carol Procter, cello; Leslie Martin, bass; and Luis Leguia, cello.

As a Friend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, subscribe now and avoid disappointment, as requests will be filled in the order received and the first event is the Pre-Symphony Luncheon, Friday, Sept. 25.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

SEP 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh — Friends Plan Season

Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., leaders of The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have exciting plans for the Council's 1970-71 season.

Encouraged by the success of the previous "Two Series of Friday Morning Events," they are continuing those programs. Invitations are on the way for the Pre-Symphony Luncheons at Horticultural Hall scheduled for Sept. 25, Dec. 18, Feb. 12 and April 1.

The original and informal Stage Door Lectures at Symphony Hall will be followed by an a la carte bar and box luncheons. Those dates are Oct. 9, Nov. 13, Jan. 22, and Feb. 26.

BSO members lecturing will include Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; Carol Procter, cello; Leslie Martin, bass, and Luis Leguia, cello.

But these are only the first of the activities planned to aid the world-famous orchestra in maintaining its standard of excellence. New Friends are invited to join as subscribers.

Co-chairmen of the luncheons, Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich and Mrs. George A. Parson, have planned four unusual menus along with special floral decorations for the enjoyment of the Council of Friends.

Mrs. George E. Bates and Mrs. David Bird head committee. Both series are under the auspices of areas as represented by the Council. Subscription requests will be filled in the order received.

Home folk and visitors from everywhere will be royally welcomed in Memorial Hall, Plymouth, on Saturday, Sept. 19, from 10 a. m. to 4 p. m. at a Holiday Bazaar planned months ago by Jordan Hospital Club for the 67-year-old Hospital.

Mrs. Bradford Jenkins of Duxbury, chairman; Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr., club president; and Mrs. J. Warren Damon have a bevy of helpers doing their share for the big day.

Nurses at the Hospital have planned an old-fashioned New England Country store chairmanned by Mrs. Robert Kennedy. She has compiled the first Jordan Hospital Cook Book which shoppers will be able to buy along with herbs, cheese and penny candy.

Mrs. Howard Hanelt and her aides will be selling Holland bulbs for fall planting and Mrs. Sherman Whipple, who does beautiful decorative work, is in charge of cone wreaths and mobiles for the coming holiday season.

Antique silver, china, glass and furniture have been collected by Mrs. Vining A. Sherman. Mrs. Daniel Sangster's book table will use its proceeds to buy the latest paperbacks for patients.

Busy with other attractions are Mrs. J. Robert Bronwing, Mrs. Winsor White (she is chairman of the knitting table); Mrs. Samuel K. Stewart, Mrs. Lee Gregory, Mrs. Edwin Noyes and Mrs. Ellis Brewster.

Also, Miss Sara Bodell (treasurer of the club); Mrs. Carol Mabbett, Mrs. H. H. Hamilton and Mrs. Elio Barufaldi. J. Warren, hospital treasurer, is serving on the committee.

Patrons and sponsors of the benefit performance of "King For a Night" on Sunday, Sept. 27, at the Music Hall Theatre, will be feted at a gala champagne party to start off the evening.

Sponsors are the Eastern Mass. Region, Women's Committee ORT (Organization for Rehabilitation through Training).

Proceeds of the event will benefit the construction of a unique ORT School of Engineering at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Mrs. Michael Lessen is party chairman, and members of the planning committee include Mrs. Gerald Kraft, Mrs. Gerald S. Sowsy, Mrs. Melvin J. Stone and Mrs. Norman Aronson.

Guests from Boston attended the wedding of Boston University alumna, Miss Lois Ellen Gilson, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Benjamin I. Gilson of Brooklyn, N. Y., to Ronald William Kuzon, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward M. Kuzon of Longmeadow.

The ceremony, performed by Rabbi Eugene J. Sack, took place in the Versaille Suite of the St. Regis-Sheraton Hotel.

Mrs. Kuzon has been appointed a speech therapist with the Chelmsford school system. The bridegroom, who is with the Boston law firm of Lappin, Rosen, Goldberg, Slavet, Levenson & Wekstein, was graduated magna cum laude from Lehigh University and in June from Boston College Law School.

BLANK PAGE

260 Attend Dinner-Dance To Honor Leonard Bernstein

Whitestone

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, with Leonard Bernstein, her late husband's protege, and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, who was hostess for Saturday evening's event, which opened the summer BSO season.

Mrs. Ann Marlowe Strauss, summer resident of Great Barrington, and former U.S. Sen. Kenneth B. Keating, now a member of the New York State Supreme Court.

Mr. and Mrs. David Rockefeller Jr. with Gordon Alan Ross, film producer of Stockbridge, were among the Friends of Tanglewood who attended the dinner-dance. Diners were served at flower-set, candlelighted tables in Brookhurst, summer home of the Stephen V. C. Morrises, winter residents of Washington. Mr. Morris has served in the U.S. diplomatic corps both in Paris and Brussels.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

It's a musicians' party at Tanglewood

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

The frame was one of great elan. The big beautiful Federal house and the green and white striped marquee set deep in the lush Lenox gardens. Silver salvers of champagne, and under the hanging baskets of the famous Tanglewood fuchsias, the decorous mumur of the black-tie-long-dress covey of internationals whose names make news in law and diplomacy as well as music and the arts.

Suddenly there was a joyful noise in the graveled courtyard and the party's star man enveloped his elegant hostess in one of his famous bear hugs. Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V C. Morris' "Dinner Dance in Honor of Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Bernstein" turned warm and cozy. Boston Symphony manager Tom Perry's pretty brown-haired wife got not one but two Bernstein hugs as Tom kissed a radiantly lovely Mrs. Bernstein. She was the envy of every woman there in a Bill Blass gauzy white midi pin-dotted in red and worn over long slim matching pants.

Mrs. Serge Kousssevitzky was next, her white gloves gently clasping the rumpled grey head familiar to every music follower in the whole world. She and "dear Lennie" sat together at dinner, her fragile, fascinating face luminous with the pleasure that always comes to it when the talk is of her wonderful husband, the late, loved conductor of the BSO for 25 years and the man who had the dream that is now Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein was the first to enroll in the conducting class at the Berkshire Music Center in that banner beginning season of 1940. His quicksilver face blazed with laughter and tears over their memories of the years he was Dr. Koussevitzky's assistant and a member of the faculty at the Center.

The Morrises, who winter in Washington and whose "Brookhurst" stone gates are just beyond Tanglewood are longtime generous friends of the Symphony's. Mrs. Morris is co-chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends and one of the chairmen for the 1971 European Tour of the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Morris is a well-known figure in the US diplomatic corps in Europe where he has served in both Paris and Brussels.

David Rockefeller and his decorative and intelligent wife, the Gunther Schullers—he's artistic director at Tanglewood this Summer after an incredible Winter of work as composer - director, teacher and president of the New England Conservatory — also shared their melon and prosciutto with the brilliant young associate conductor of the BSO, Michael Tilson Thomas. Also, the BSO's Joseph Silverstein, and woman trustee (there've only been two in the 90 years of Mr. Higginson's pride and joy) Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock, whose gorgeous black and white dress was designed for her by Fiandaca. Paul Ceresole, just back from London ("the Ritz stays the same in a frenzied world — don't know how they do it, but it's great"), Mr. and Mrs. William Ryan and the Tom Perrys were also with the Bernsteins. Also at the flower - set candle- lighted tables beneath the Sargent and Reynolds portraits were the John Winants, the Samuel Colts, the Winthrop Cranes eating braised beef and zucchini and French strawberry tart with the Thomas Blagdens and the David Danas. Also, Symphony flutist Doriot Anthony-Dwyer, the Robert Parrishes, the Robert Hardmans and the James Hardmans the Cyrus Henrys with Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Hayden and the Henry Bloods, Boston's Mrs. John Carter, and the good BSO'ers who lead such efficient double lives, one at Symphony Hall and the other at Tanglewood, like Harry Kraut, David Levenson and Marvin Schofer, as well as at a handsome spate of Newport Bogarts, Livermores, and New York Emmets, Morgans, Judge and Mrs. John Sawyer, the Peter van S. Rices, Mrs. William Penn Cresson, the Donald Millers, Dr. and Mrs. Philip Mayo, Water Howard, the Simon Strausses, and on and on. One of those unforgettable nights.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,277 (E) 194,700

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Mrs. Barbara B. Walker (right), chairman of Tuesday's Beacon Hill Tour for wives of architects attending this week's convention of the American Institute of Architects in Boston, chats with Florida wives (from left) Mrs. Frank R. Mudano, Mrs. Robert H. Levison and Mrs. James J. Jennewein.

—Record American Photo, Earl Ostroff

Rose Walsh – Harbor Trip Gay

Carrying their own supper and liquid refreshments in lunch boxes, picnic hampers, straw and plastic bags, over 200 members and friends of the south End Historical Society, Inc. boarded the friendly "Bay State" at Long Wharf, Monday evening for a festive cruise around Boston Harbor. As the sun went down they gathered on the decks and listened to Edward Rowe Snow's interesting commentary on the passing sites. The cruisers enjoyed their sea-going picnic fare and chatted with neighbors and new-found friends.

Betty Gibson, one of the founders of the south End Historical Society, which has as its motto, "Using the Past to Serve the Future", and Bill Graham, co-chairman of the membership committee, did the "welcome aboard" amenities. Betty's cousin, William Caffery of New Orleans, who is attending M. I. T., was in her supper group.

Others enjoying the Harbor party were Dr. and Mrs. Sam Clark, Dr. Woodrow Baldwin, the Arnold Bowkers, Mrs. Goodwin Bird with Martin Slobodkin, the Richard Heaths, Royal Cloyd and his son, Aaron; the Jerry Gordons, the Donald Rockwells, Dr. Arthur Howe, Mrs. Frederick Ayres and her son.

Also the Joseph Parks, William Walters, George Wells, the Rover Adamses, Capt. Baxter Spencer, Betty Fiske (Bill Graham's fiancee—August wedding in-the-planning); the Joseph Caseys, Zane Thompson, the Harry Smiths (celebrating his birthday); Woodrow Hall, Joe McDonald, Beatrice Willism, William Walters and many more.

A Mid-September wedding is planned for Miss Mary Gardner and Harold G. Zulalian, Jr., whose engagement is announced by the parents of the bride-to-be, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick H. Speyer of Salt Lake City, Utah. The future bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold G. Zulalian of Brookline.

Miss Gardner attended school in California and is the administrative secretary for the Applied Human Service Systems project at Brandeis University. Her fiance is a graduate of Boston University, a past director of the Brookline Rotary International and the owner of Zulalian Rug Galleries in Brookline.

Announcement is made of the marriage of Mrs. Carolie Woods Hollingsworth and Albert Hall Harris, Jr. on Sunday, June 21, at a small family ceremony in St. John's Episcopal Church, Beverly Farms.

Mrs. Harris is the daughter of Mrs. W. Randolph Burgess of Washington, D. C., and the late Arthur Woods. The bridegroom is the son of Mrs. J. Sturgis Harris of Manchester and Dr. Albert H. Harris of Albany, N. Y.

The bride was graduated from Scripps College, Her husband received his B. A. from Boston University. They will live in Beverly Farms.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris are opening their home in the Berkshires, "Brookhurst", Lenox, on Saturday evening for a Champagne Dinner Dance in honor of famed composer and conductor, Leonard Bernstein and Mrs. Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center. The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and The Council of Tanglewood Friends are co-hosts of the gala affair (benefitting Boston Symphony) that will begin with cocktails at 7:30 followed by dinner at 8:30.

Bernstein will be the principal speaker at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th anniversary on Sunday afternoon at 2:30.

The New England Hemophilia Ass'n is sponsoring an Evening at Pops in Symphony Hall, Friday, to further its services for more than 500 hemophiliacs in New England, including a summer camp for boys in August. Mrs. Philip Riley of Needham heads the committee.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUN 27 1970

New Englan
Newscl

Bernstein to Be Feted Tonight At Tanglewood

Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center will be honored this evening at a champagne-dinner dance at "Brookhurst", the Lenox home of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, also of Washington, D.C. Mrs. Morris is co-chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends and is Tanglewood chairman of the 1971 European Tour of the Boston Symphony.

The occasion marks the opening of the 1970 season of both Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the 30th season of the Berkshire Music Center, the symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music.

Bernstein, recently appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, was a member of the first coducting class at Tanglewood in 1940 and later became assistant to Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Center and conductor of symphony for 25 years. He was a member of the faculty of the school until 1955.

Berkshire party for Bernstein

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 22,[illegible] (S) [illegible]

JUN 19 1970

New England
Newsclip

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

Invitation of the week will have a Lenox postmark and come from Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of New York and "Brookhurst," a baton's throw from the Boston Symphony's summertime music-mecca at Tanglewood.

The date is June 27th and the coveted bids will be to dinner dance with composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein and his wife. Advisor to Tanglewood, Bernstein will conduct Mahler's Second Symphony the first weekend of the 30th season, July 3, 4, and 5. His "Candide" will open the gala concert on July 28, which honors another longtime composer-conductor of the Boston Symphony, Aaron Copland, who'll be 70 this summer.

Musicmen of world caliber will be among the Morrises' guests at their June 27 party and with them will be Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, whose late, great husband pioneered Tanglewood for his beloved BSO.

The Gunther Schullers (he's artistic director for Tanglewood) will be among the Boston constituents there, along with the David Rockefeller Jr.'s, President of the Trustees Talcott Banks, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. John Carter, the Thomas Perry's Michael Tilson Thomas, the Joseph Silversteins.

★

Also on the music invitation list: Patrons' invitations to a preview gala at the most elaborate and Vanderbilt-cluttered of all the Newport "cottages" of the 19th century — "The Breakers." The $100 and up contributors will get their welcome July 29 to the start of the 1970 Festival program from the Rhode Island Arts Foundation's able elegants like Mrs. William C. Langley, Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mrs. George H. Warren, and they'll hear the only trio by Michael Balfe and other special performances. A reception and buffet follows.

The Festival will romp through other mansions of the era — The Elms, Marble House, including a cruise concert on the Mount Hope, and a balloon ascent at Chateau-sur-Mer, with the best of all, the promised showing of the "Civilization" series of BBC fame. July 29 through Aug. 8.

★

Small fry invitation, good for RAINY DAYS ONLY, is the word from the World Affairs Council, who are whipping up this boon to mummy in the form of summer film programs for the 4-to-8 set. Time, 10 to 12, Mondays through Fridays, June 22-Aug. 28. Place, the Council headquarters, 70 Hereford st., corner of Boylston. Each movie will be from a different country. For more information, 267-6674.

★

It'll be wedding invitations for Leila Haven Jones. Member of the Junior League and Vincent Club of Boston, and a teacher for three years at the Dexter School, Leila will marry Jonathan Scranton Linen Sept. 12th. A graduate of Wells College, she's the daughter of the Gilbert Jones' of Greenwich, Conn., and her father is chairman of the board of IBM World Trade Corp.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY, MONDAY, JUNE 29, 1970

EYE TOO···EYE TOO··

EYE TOO··

EYE TOO

LENNY'S DO: Lenny Bernstein burst into that champagne dinner dance that the Stephen V. C. Morrises gave in his honor Saturday night at their Brookhurst in Lenox, Mass., and before night was over there wasn't a cheek left unkissed. While the tanned conductor was busy bussing the masses Mrs. B, in a red-flecked organza Longuette over pants, snuggled in a fur wrap against the cold. Then they went indoors with 250 Friends of Tanglewood for dining and dancing.

EYE® TOO EYE TOO

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

...score a masterpiece

Party for Bernstein played in superb key

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

What makes a party a star turn?

The setting can be a castle courtyard, the food can bring on the shade of Escoffier, and the wine and the flowers unmatchable, and you won't even remember the dress you wore. What is it, then, that makes one evening rise and shine above all the rest?

It's the people. Not because they're famous faces, or throw around their fortunes. (Bolivian tin heirs and Greek shipping magnates have tried that one.)

You don't have to dress up (or down), or put your guests in gondolas to score that alltime evening. Given a universal common-denominator, like music plus those who know it best, and the heritage ties the gordian knot.

The Stephen V. C. Morrises of Washington and Lenox drew a magic circle 'round Tanglewood, where Serge Koussevitzky made a dream come true 30 years ago when he sent the sound of music across the lush lawns of the one-time Brooks summer retreat.

In Lenox, where the unique treat for music lovers of every age and preference will attract thousands this week-end, the party previewed Summer 70-at-Tanglewood. Every shiny moment will be remembered. It was that kind of a party.

Even honor guest Leonard Bernstein and his beautiful wife, whose party syndrome would leave most anyone else jaded, kept the handsome guest lineup smiling with their obvious delight in the whole evening.

Bernstein's affectionate bear hug lifted his soigne hostess right off her feet, and the BSO's Tom Perry and his wife shared another of the happy embraces that are the ebullient Bernstein's greeting trademark.

It was with glowing faces that he and Olga Koussevitzky turned to each other at the long flower-bright dinner table—theirs the intimacy of a lifetime of loving Serge Koussevitzky and the music he gave the world.

David Rockefeller and his beauteous wife were deep in music talk with the BSO's alltime idea girl, Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock who has made party (and fund-raising) history for Symphony, and is one of the only two women ever named to trusteeship in the orchestra's 90 years.

The New England Conservatory's brilliant Gunther Schuller was chatting with the BSO's Joseph Silverstein. And there was a posh potpourri of Morgans and Ryans, Colts, Cranes, Blagdens, and Winants, theirs the music image for all times and places, and many, many others.

MUSIC IN THE AIR—Oldtime friends Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky and Leonard Bernstein meet at Lenox party.

GREETINGS—Mrs. Leonard Bernstein, wife of honor guest, chats with host Stephen V. C. Morris, as Lenox party reaches high note of happiness. Famed figures in world of music, and beautiful setting, combined to make affair memorable.

TABLE TALK — Dinner party for Leonard Bernstein has all-star guest list, including the David Rockefellers, Tom Perrys, Mrs. Koussevitzky and Mr. and Mrs. Bernstein, and others. Stephen V. C. Morrises, of Washington and Lenox, were hosts.

(Whitestone photos)

BLANK PAGE

158

Boston Pops At Tanglewood

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,4[illegible]

AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Fire Chief Fiedler Arrives in Style

LENOX —Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, arrived to conduct the Pops at Tanglewood, Tuesday night on a 1909 La France fire engine (the first gasoline fire engine made by the world's largest manufacturer of fire fighting equipment), courtesy of the Lenox Volunteer Fire Department.

The procession, led by members of the Lenox police force met Fiedler at the Holiday Inn, then passed through the village of Lenox on its three-mile trip to Tanglewood's main gate.

Officer Obbie (Chief William J. Obenheim) of the Stockbridge police force (most recently seen in the movie "Alice's Restaurant") led the procession through the main gate and drove through the Tanglewood grounds past a sell-out crowd of 13,500 persons to the tent behind the music shed.

Upon his arrival, Fiedler was made honorary fire chief of the Lenox and Stockbridge Fire Departments, adding to his collection of more than 150 honorary fire chief designations.

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday this season and 42 years as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted the Pops in an all-Gershwin concert with Earl Wild as piano soloist.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Fiedler gets big welcome at Tanglewood

A sell-out crowd of 13,500 persons greeted Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra last night when he made his appearance at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The world-famous conductor, who is celebrating his 75th birthday this season, was taken to Tanglewood atop a 1909 La France fire engine by members of the Lenox Volunteer Fire Department.

After being met at the Holiday Inn in Lenox and escorted through the town to Tanglewood's main gate by Lenox police and firefighters led by Stockbridge Police Chief William J. Obenheim, Mr. Fiedler was made an honorary fire chief of Lenox and Stockbridge.

Last night's bill featured an all-Gershwin concert that included "An American in Paris" and "Porgy and Bess."

Following the concert there was a display of fireworks in honor of Mr. Fiedler's birthday and his 42 years as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

6—The Berkshire Eagle, Thursday, Aug. 13, 1970

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

IF YOU HAD a nickel for every time someone wrote that Arthur Fiedler is "75 years young," you could buy your own symphony orchestra. Yet how else can you describe the boundless energy and fierce drive of the man? If he is old, there is no such thing as youth.

We caught him just as he had finished rehearsing his Pops group for their Tuesday night concert. He was bouncing around backstage, bare-chested, with five different sets of people waiting to see him, "Let's sit outside in the sun," he said, slipping into a dry sport shirt, and took off at a run.

* * *

HOW DOES IT feel to be a legend in your own time, he was asked. "I wouldn't go so far as to say that," he began modestly, and then started to tell how gracious his reception is wherever he goes (and he goes everywhere). "It's been especially tremendous this year," he said, "because of the television series." National Educational Television taped several of the Pops concerts in Boston this spring and all 280 educational stations are showing them throughout the country. "There is no doubt that Public Television has a large audience," said Mr. Fiedler, "judging from my own experience. Everywhere I go people come to say that they have just seen me on television. Young and old. It is most gratifying."

* * *

ARTHUR FIEDLER averages 150 concerts a year, the bulk of them with the Pops in Boston and on tour. He has done as many as 197 concerts in one year, and there is no doubt that he has the strength to do 197 any time he takes an inclination. His schedule right now is booked way into 1972 with concerts throughout this country, Europe, Australia, and even Tasmania. It takes him from one to four days to get an unfamiliar orchestra to play the Fiedler way, depending on the competency of the musicians. "If they don't have the skill," he said, "you just try to get out of them all there is in them. And maybe a little bit more."

* * *

IT WAS NOTHING new for him to be driven to his Pops concert in a fire engine because he is one of the most famous fire buffs in the world. He is an honorary member of 270 fire companies, and for his 75th birthday last December his wife gave him a 1938 Ford fire engine that is in perfect shape. His collection of hats, axes and other memorabilia is going to be kept in a special room of the antique car museum in his hometown of Brookline so he can share it with the public and still have it close by him.

Why does he have this enthusiasm for firemen and fire equipment? "I grew up near a fire station in Boston," he said, "and there was something about the way those horse-drawn engines would go galloping out to save a house or a life that took hold of me. I had my own Dal-matian for 16 years and I am about to have two more. The BSO men collected the money for a Dalmatian for my birthday, and a man from the Purina company said he was going to give me one of the pups they use on TV commercials and to test their food."

Arthur Fiedler

* * *

TO WHAT DOES he attribute the international appeal, that bridges all generations, of his music? "I try to keep up with the times," he said. "We just recorded the music from 'Company,' the new Broadway hit, and we are about to re-record 'Fiddler on the Roof' and 'Man From La Mancha' because they are being made into movies. The same with 'Hair.' You have to sense what is going to be important."

He stopped to muse about this for a moment, and the other groups, seeing silence, edged in. We thanked him for his time. "A pleasure," he said, flying off, just like he was on a horse-drawn fire engine and the bell had clanged. Seventy-five years young, that's what he is. Seventy-five years young.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Concert Review

By Martha deB. Beaver

Scarcely a blade of grass could be seen for the number of occupied chairs that covered the lawns at Tanglewood when Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their annual Berkshire Festival Pops concert. An All-Gershwin program and a mild evening that promised but didn't deliver a shower or two, brought 13,500 semi-classic and popular music buffs of all ages to witness their pet promoter of fun and nostalgic music deliver in his usual incomparable, infectious style.

An avid follower of fires (Boston often sees him riding to one, either on or behind a fire engine), Fiedler arrived at Tanglewood in a 1909 La France model, courtesy of the Lenox fire Department. Led by members of the Lenox police force, the procession started at the Holiday Inn, was escorted through the Main gate at Tanglewood to the gala tent behind the Shed, where Fiedler was made honorary chief of the Lenox and Stockbridge fire departments, another title to add to his more than 150 such.

The concert started with the vividly programmatic "American in Paris," strolling along to sounds of Paris taxi horns, their special theme also announced by the strings at intervals; the trombones giving off a version of La Maxise, another walking motif from the clarinet, and a haunting English horn solo, much development, some parleying from the solo violin suggesting a one-sided conversation with the visitor, who obviously becomes infected with the blues, but gets over them as sudden cheery Charleston denotes, and after resuming the second strolling theme, a riotous finale that says all is happiness and let's make a night of it!

Featured in the concert was the greatly favored pianist, Earl Wild, who went all out with the romantic mood so few care to exhibit these days. Completely in control of any technical demands, Wild is a real showman, and he pulled out every stop in his jazz-based numbers, that cry out for a grand display. Dressed, we thought most fittingly, in a blue-green mandarin silk jacket with brass (gold?) buttons and side vents, slim white slacks, Wild first performed the Piano Concerto in F, which, like American in Paris was premiered by Dr. Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society of New York in the latter half of the 1920s. American in Paris was commissioned by Dr. Damrosch, who commended Gershwin highly for lifting jazz to "a level that would enable her to become a respectable member of the musical circles."

After intermission Fiedler led his musicians in a rather unexciting arrangement of Porgy and Bess, by Robert Russell Bennett, a pretty straightforward accomplishment, which didn't conjure the earthy and tragic quality of the talk opera's characters, but did present their songs in a pleasant and mildly colorful dress. The banjo solo "I Got Plenty O' Nuttin'" stood out simply because the instrument is so seldom heard here, and "Summertime" was properly lazy and sweet. "It Ain't Neccessarily So" found the woods and brass with pretty uneven tones. But if nostalgia was the intent, the performance was definitely productive, and the rather staid audience seemed to enjoy it.

We noticed no real outbursts of joy or tapping, even humming or hand-clapping to any of the less serious numbers, like Strike up the Band, which ended the evening's program. But thunderous applause was provoked after Wild's classic performance of the Rhapsody in Blue, preceding it, and continued at the evening's close, producing only one encore. Fiedler had to return immediately to the West coast for other engagements, after flying here to donate his services for the concert which benefits the musicians' pension fund.

In the conduct of the audience and the lack of the usual round of stimulating encores, the pops concert differed from other years, but the exploding fireworks were there for all to enjoy, as they burst in colorful display over the hills and distant Lake Makheenac.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,4[illegible]

AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Fiedler Offers All Gershwin At Tanglewood

LENOX — It was hoorah for America and happy birthday for Arthur Fiedler at the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood last night.

It was an all-Gershwin concert. "An American in Paris" and "Porgy and Bess" were done in symphonic arrangements. They are all-American from a gayer and more cocky time. Both pieces were over arranged and sounded bland and homogenized. They lost their honky-tonk, funky swagger.

Earl Wild bravura-performed his way through the famous "Rhapsody in Blue" and, the less well-known but equally interesting, "Concerto in F." The concert ended with an arrangement of "Strike up the Band" with all stops out. A drizzle damped the spirits only slightly in the face of those trumpet fanfares and snare drum riffs.

Then about 15,000 persons went out on the lawn to watch the fireworks. Red, white and blue pinwheels, eagles and rockets skyrocketed over the hills and the lake below. A thoroughly satisfying celebration of Americana and Fiedler's birthday.

GENIE ZUST

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 1 2 1970

New England Newsclip

Whitestone

FIREWORKS display followed last night's Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood. After a slow start, possibly from damp fuses, the display provided a series of brilliant bursts of multi-colored lights and big bangs.

Gershwin Evening

Tanglewood Draws 11,190

By FRANK V. McCARTHY

LENOX — A crowd of some 11,190, ranging from hippie types to the well shorn, turned out at Tanglewood last night for a Boston Pops Orchestra concert that added an announced $30,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

Conductor Arthur Fielder, who had interrupted a series of appearances on the West Coast to return for the Berkshire annual, played an all-Gershwin concert, except for the usual finale of "Stars and Stripes Forever." There were no encores. After the finale, Fielder took five additional curtain calls and waved the orchestra home to bed.

Occasional drops of rain threatened those spread on the lawn, but a hazy half moon hung in the southwestern sky during most of the evening, indicating the thinness of the cloud cover.

The evening ended with the usual display of fireworks that came to a sputtering climax after a start marked by long intervals between bursts. Perhaps the fuses were damp.

The music was performed at a quicker — sometimes furious — pace, so fast it seemed to this old Gershwin fan that notes were left out. The piano soloist, Earl Wild, attired in a blue shirt hanging outside his white trousers, looked more like a golf pro than a pianist. But he certainly fingered his Baldwin 88 like a pro.

The music seemed to matter little to those at the further reaches of the audience, stretched out near the gravel path beyond the trees. The roar of jets above the overcast and the chatter of voices and scuffing of footwear on the path out there made the music barely audible at times.

The ka-pling of cash registers at the food stands, including a portable one in a trailer, was confined to nonmusic periods since no food was sold while the orchestra was performing.

The crowd was a clean one, leaving little litter, in spite of volume of the eats and drinks consumed. There were a few premixed martinis and jugs of wine in evidence, but not all the refreshments were so blasé. One party of eight well-dressed music lovers were seen feeding themselves from a styrofoam ice chest that appeared to be full of nothing but Cracker-Jacks.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

HUDSON REGISTER
Tuesday, August 11, 1970

Annual Fiedler Concert Tuesday

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS.-The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood takes place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The program opens with An American in Paris followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Fiedler conducts the Porgy and Bess Suite, Rhapsody in Blue with Earl Wild. The program concludes with Strike Up the Band.

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42nd as conductor of the free outdoor Esplandae Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both Orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Sumphony Orchestra on RCA.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 135,232
(S) 8,700

AUG 8 1970

New England Newsclip

Fiedler Conducts 'Pops' Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Events at Tanglewood, Berkshire Music Center, this week include a "pops" concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra and two programs of the music of Beethoven, part of this year's music tribute to the great classicist.

TODAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Charles Mackerra conducting. Program: Webern's Six pieces for orchestra; Dvorak's Cello concerto, Jules Eskin, soloist; and Shostakovich's Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY — Shed, 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra in an all-Gershwin program: Rhaposody in Blue; Concerto in F, Earl Wild, soloist; other Gershwin hits, and pops encores.

FRIDAY — Shed, weekend prelude, 7 p.m. Pianist Claude Frank. Concert, 9 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program: Sym. No. 3 "Eroica"; Piano Concerto No. 5, Rudolf Firkusny, soloist.

SATURDAY — Shed, open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program: Choral Fantasy, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist; Sym. No. 9 "Choral," Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, soloists, Chorus Pro Musica, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 8 1970

Fiedler in Pops Concert At Tanglewood Tuesday

The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood takes place at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the shed of the music festival at Lenox, Mass.

* * *

Fiedler will conduct an all-Gershwin concert with Earl Wild as piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The program will include "An American in Paris," Concerto in F for Piano and Orchestra, "Porgy and Bess" Suite, "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Strike Up the Band."

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42nd season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

He is the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony, having joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JUNE 21, 1970

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will be at Tanglewood on August 11.

BOSTON NOW
BOSTON, MASS.
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

A host of free concerts at colleges and churches augments the rich offering of professional performances that make Boston one of America's most musical cities. The following listings give ample proof of Boston's diversified musical offerings.

NEWPORT MUSICAL FESTIVAL

Newport, Rhode Island is holding its own summer music festival in its fabled mansions, featuring forty-one musical events scheduled from July 30 through August 8. Opening Night features a Gala Symphonic Chamber Concert with music by Rheinberger and Wolf-Ferrari. Information and tickets can be obtained from Newport Music Festival, 23 Bridge St., Neport, R. I., or or 401-846-1140.

MUSIC AT HARVARD STADIUM

Aug. 3, Johnny Mathis . . . Aug. 10, the Supremes and The Meters . . . Aug. 12, Janis Joplin. Starts 8 p.m. Tickets $2.00. Harvard Stadium, No. Harvard St., Allston. 492-5861.

TANGLEWOOD BSO

Highlight of the summer is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Twenty-four concerts are presented from July 3 - Aug. 23 Fridays at 9:00 p.m., Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Pops with Arthur Fiedler will appear August 11 at 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsals are held every Saturday morning at 10:30. Write to Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. or call after June 15 at 413-637-1600.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Coming Aug. 11

The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops at Tanglewood takes place Tuesday, Aug. 11 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The program opens with "An American in Paris" followed by the Concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the "Porgy and Bess Suite," "Rhapsody in Blue" with piano soloist Earl Wild. The program concludes with "Strike Up the Band."

Mr. Fiedler, celebrating his seventy-fifth birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He has currently completed his forty-first season as conductor of the Pops and forty-second season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929. As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the Orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, N.J., when the Orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Karl Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Mr. Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that Mr. Fiedler's recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both Orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Arthur Fiedler Conducts Boston Pops Tuesday

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood takes place Tuesday at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The program opens with An American in Paris followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Earl Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Porgy and Bess Suite, Rhapsody in Blue with piano soloist Earl Wild. The program concludes with Strike Up the Band.

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42nd season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, New Jersey when the Orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Karl Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that Fiedler's recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

BOSTON POPS AT TANGLEWOOD
Tuesday 8.30 p.m. Shed
ARTHUR FIEDLER
EARL WILD, Pianist
GERSHWIN PROGRAM
An American in Paris
Concerto in F for piano and orchestra
Porgy and Bess Suite
Rhapsody in Blue
Strike Up the Band

NATICK BULLETIN
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,600
JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

ENTERTAINMENT

Welk TV. Stars.

Myron Floren of the Lawrence Welk Show (TV), will appear in person with wonderful tenor Joe Feeney, Dick Dale, Clay Hart and Art Duncan, and others, in a one-night performance at the J. B. Hynes Civic Auditorium at the Prudential, Friday, July 24 at 8:30 pm. Tickets are now on sale. Presented by WNAC-TV.

Newport Festival.

The Newport, R.I. Music Festival opens July 30 with the works of all 19th Century Stars in an exploration of all the forgotten Music of the Romantic Era typical of those composers.

At Tanglewood.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops are listed for August 11 at Tanglewood in an all Gershwin program. Earl Wild will be the pianist. The time is 8:30 pm, at the Shed.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Gossip on RIALTO

By Fred H. Russell

Paul Newman, who lives in Westport, is planning to play another western character. This time it will be Buffalo Bill Cody when Arthur Kopit's Broadway play "Indians" is filmed. Newman's company, in association with David Susskind's Talent Associates, paid $500,000 for the screen rights to "Indians." And Kopit is picking up another $100,000 for writing the screenplay. The picture is not expected to go into production in the near future. Currently Newman is out in Oregon producing, directing and starring in "Sometimes a Great Notion," and has several other properties lined up as well . . . Led Zeppelin, a group of four young Britishers, will be the attraction at the Yale Bowl in New Haven next Saturday night . . . Nancy Andrews appears to be set as Danny Kay's wife in "Two By Two" opening Sept. 14 at the Shubert theater in New Haven . . . The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood, which usually attracts many area music buffs, takes place Tuesday night in the Shed at Tanglewood, Leonx, Mass. It will be an all-Gershwin concert with Earl Wilde as piano soloist . . .

Paul Newman

THE HARTFORD TIMES Sunday, August 9, 1970

Fiedler Conducts 'Pops' Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Events at Tanglewood, Berkshire Music Center, this week include a "pops" concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra and two programs of the music of Beethoven, part of this year's music tribute to the great classicist.

TODAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Charles Mackerra conducting. Program: Webern's Six pieces for orchestra; Dvorak's Cello concerto, Jules Eskin, soloist; and Shostakovich's Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY — Shed, 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra in an all-Gershwin program: Rhaposody in Blue; Concerto in F. Earl Wild, soloist; other Gershwin hits, and pops encores.

FRIDAY — Shed, weekend prelude, 7 p.m. Pianist Claude Frank. Concert, 9 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program; Sym. No. 3 "Eroica"; Piano Concerto No. 5, Rudolf Firkusny, soloist.

SATURDAY — Shed, open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program: Choral Fantasy, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist; Sym. No. 9 "Choral," Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, soloists, Chorus Pro Musica, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Pops-at-Tanglewood Night Aug. 11

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert will be held on Tuesday.

The concert will begin at 8 p. m. in the Shed with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

Pianist Earl Wild will be soloist for the all-Gershwin program.

The following weekend at Tanglewood will mark the second of two weekends devoted to the works of Beethoven by the Boston Symphony. William Steinberg, Symphony music director, will conduct the Friday concert Aug. 14 at 9 p. m. in the Shed with Rudolf Firkusny as piano soloist.

An open rehearsal of the Symphony at 10:30 a. m. Saturday in the Shed will present guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal. The rehearsal will be for the Sunday program at 2:30 p. m. in the Shed when Rudolf will conduct.

Director Steinberg will wield the baton for the Saturday evening concert at 8:30 that weekend.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
NEW YORK NEWS
Sunday, August 9, 1970

Tanglewood Special

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will be held at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the shed at Lenox Mass. Pianist Earl Wild will be the soloist in an all-Gershwin program. The concert is for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Gershwin concert by Pops

The week's events at Tanglewood begin this Tuesday with an 8:30 p.m. all-Gershwin concert by the Boston Pops. Arthur Fiedler conducts and Earl Wild appears as piano soloists. Works to be heard include "An American in Paris," "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Concerto in F.

The Weekend Prelude concert, Friday at 7 p.m., features pianist Claude Frank in Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 90 and Op. 53 ("Waldstein"). William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Friday at 9 p.m. in Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and on the same program pianist Rudolf Firkusny is soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto.

The Saturday 8:30 p.m. concert is again conducted by Steinberg. The Chorus Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival Chorus join the Boston Symphony in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soloists are soprano Gwendolin Sims, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenor William Cochran and bass Thomas Paul. Also on the program is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy, in which Jerome Lowenthal is piano soloist.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. conducts another all-Beethoven program: the "Leonore" Overture No. 2, Fifth Symphony and Piano Concerto No. 1, in which Jerome Lowenthal appears as soloist.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, August 5, 1970

The Aisle Seat

NEXT TUESDAY, the Boston Pops will play at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with Arthur Fiedler conducting and Earl Wild as pianist.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849
AUG 9 1970

Tanglewood Special

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will be held at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the shed at Lenox Mass. Pianist Earl Wild will be the soloist in an all-Gershwin program. The concert is for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

BOSTON NOW
JUL 31 1970
New England Newsclip

MUSIC

A host of free concerts at colleges and churches augments the rich offering of professional performances that make Boston one of America's most musical cities. The following listings give ample proof of Boston's diversified musical offerings.

NEWPORT MUSICAL FESTIVAL

Newport, Rhode Island is holding its own summer music festival in its fabled mansions, featuring forty-one musical events scheduled from July 30 through August 8. Opening Night features a Gala Symphonic Chamber Concert with music by Rheinberger and Wolf-Ferrari. Information and tickets can be obtained from Newport Music Festival, 23 Bridge St., Neport, R. I., or or 401-846-1140.

MUSIC AT HARVARD STADIUM

Aug. 3, Johnny Mathis . . . Aug. 10, the Supremes and The Meters . . . Aug. 12, Janis Joplin. Starts 8 p.m. Tickets $2.00. Harvard Stadium, No. Harvard St., Allston. 492-5861.

TANGLEWOOD BSO

Highlight of the summer is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Twenty-four concerts are presented from July 3 - Aug. 23 Fridays at 9:00 p.m., Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Pops with Arthur Fiedler will appear August 11 at 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsals are held every Saturday morning at 10:30. Write to Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. or call after June 15 at 413-637-1600.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Coming Aug. 11

The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops at Tanglewood takes place Tuesday, Aug. 11 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The program opens with "An American in Paris" followed by the Concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the "Porgy and Bess Suite," "Rhapsody in Blue" with piano soloist Earl Wild. The program concludes with "Strike Up the Band."

Mr. Fiedler, celebrating his seventy-fifth birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He has currently completed his forty-first season as conductor of the Pops and forty-second season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929. As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the Orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, N.J., when the Orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Karl Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Mr. Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that Mr. Fiedler's recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both Orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
AUG 9 1970
New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Arthur Fiedler Conducts Boston Pops Tuesday

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood takes place Tuesday at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The program opens with An American in Paris followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Earl Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Porgy and Bess Suite, Rhapsody in Blue with piano soloist Earl Wild. The program concludes with Strike Up the Band.

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42nd season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, New Jersey when the Orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Karl Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that Fiedler's recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra

BOSTON POPS AT TANGLEWOOD
Tuesday 8:30 p.m. Shed.
ARTHUR FIEDLER
EARL WILD, Pianist
GERSHWIN PROGRAM
An American in Paris
Concerto in F for piano and orchestra
Porgy and Bess Suite
Rhapsody in Blue
Strike Up the Band

NATICK BULLETIN
NATICK, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,600
JUL 23 1970
New England Newsclip

ENTERTAINMENT

Welk TV. Stars.

Myron Floren of the Lawrence Welk Show (TV), will appear in person with wonderful tenor Joe Feeney, Dick Dale, Clay Hart and Art Duncan, and others, in a one-night performance at the J. B. Hynes Civic Auditorium at the Prudential, Friday, July 24 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are now on sale. Presented by WNAC-TV.

Newport Festival.

The Newport, R.I. Music Festival opens July 30 with the works of all 19th Century Stars in an exploration of all the forgotten Music of the Romantic Era typical of those composers.

At Tanglewood.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops are listed for August 11 at Tanglewood in an all Gershwin program. Earl Wild will be the pianist. The time is 8:30 pm, at the Shed.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950
AUG 9 1970
New England Newsclip

Pops-at-Tanglewood Night Aug. 11

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert will be held on Tuesday.

The concert will begin at 8 p. m. in the Shed with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

Pianist Earl Wild will be soloist for the all-Gershwin program.

The following weekend at Tanglewood will mark the second of two weekends devoted to the works of Beethoven by the Boston Symphony. William Steinberg, Symphony music director, will conduct the Friday concert Aug. 14 at 9 p. m. in the Shed with Rudolf Firkusny as piano soloist.

An open rehearsal of the Symphony at 10:30 a. m. Saturday in the Shed will present guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal. The rehearsal will be for the Sunday program at 2:30 p. m. in the Shed when Rudolf will conduct.

Director Steinberg will wield the baton for the Saturday evening concert at 8:30 that weekend.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
AUG 9 1970
New England Newsclip

Gossip on RIALTO

By Fred H. Russell

Paul Newman, who lives in Westport, is planning to play another western character. This time it will be Buffalo Bill Cody when Arthur Kopit's Broadway play "Indians" is filmed. Newman's company, in association with David Susskind's Talent Associates, paid $500,000 for the screen rights to "Indians." And Kopit is picking up another $100,000 for writing the screenplay. The picture is not expected to go into production in the near future. Currently Newman is out in Oregon producing, directing and starring in "Sometimes a Great Notion," and has several other properties lined up as well . . . Led Zeppelin, a group of four young Britishers, will be the attraction at the Yale Bowl in New Haven next Saturday night . . . Nancy Andrews appears to be set as Danny Kay's wife in "Two By Two" opening Sept. 14 at the Shubert theater in New Haven . . . The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood, which usually attracts many area music buffs, takes place Tuesday night in the Shed at Tanglewood, Leonx, Mass. It will be an all-Gershwin concert with Earl Wilde as piano soloist . . .

Paul Newman

THE HARTFORD TIMES Sunday, August 9, 1970

Fiedler Conducts 'Pops' Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Events at Tanglewood, Berkshire Music Center, this week include a "pops" concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra and two programs of the music of Beethoven, part of this year's music tribute to the great classicist.

TODAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Charles Mackerra conducting. Program: Webern's Six pieces for orchestra; Dvorak's Cello concerto, Jules Eskin, soloist; and Shostakovich's Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY — Shed, 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra in an all-Gershwin program: Rhaposody in Blue; Concerto in F, Earl Wild, soloist; other Gershwin hits, and pops encores.

FRIDAY — Shed, weekend prelude, 7 p.m. Pianist Claude Frank. Concert, 9 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program; Sym. No. 3 "Eroica"; Piano Concerto No. 5, Rudolf Firkusny, soloist.

SATURDAY — Shed, open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All-Beethoven program: Choral Fantasy, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist; Sym. No. 9 "Choral," Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, soloists, Chorus Pro Musica, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
YORK NEWS
Sunday, August 9, 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 9 1970
New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Wednesday, August 5, 1970

Tanglewood Special

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will be held at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the shed at Lenox Mass. Pianist Earl Wild will be the soloist in an all-Gershwin program. The concert is for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849
AUG 9 1970

Tanglewood Special

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will be held at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the shed at Lenox Mass. Pianist Earl Wild will be the soloist in an all-Gershwin program. The concert is for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund.

The Aisle Seat

NEXT TUESDAY, the Boston Pops will play at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with Arthur Fiedler conducting and Earl Wild as pianist.

Gershwin concert by Pops

The week's events at Tanglewood begin this Tuesday with an 8:30 p.m. all-Gershwin concert by the Boston Pops. Arthur Fiedler conducts and Earl Wild appears as piano soloists. Works to be heard include "An American in Paris," "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Concerto in F.

The Weekend Prelude concert, Friday at 7 p.m., features pianist Claude Frank in Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 90 and Op. 53 ("Waldstein"). William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Friday at 9 p.m. in Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and on the same program pianist Rudolf Firkusny is soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto.

The Saturday 8:30 p.m. concert is again conducted by Steinberg. The Chorus Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival Chorus join the Boston Symphony in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soloists are soprano Gwendolin Sims, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenor William Cochran and bass Thomas Paul. Also on the program is Beethoven's Choral Fantasy, in which Jerome Lowenthal is piano soloist.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. conducts another all-Beethoven program: the "Leonore" Overture No. 2, Fifth Symphony and Piano Concerto No. 1, in which Jerome Lowenthal appears as soloist.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 11 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Plays Tanglewood

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood will be held on Tuesday. The concert will begin at 8 p. m. in the Shed with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Piabist Earl Wild will be soloist for the all-Gershwin program.

The weekend at Tanglewood will mark the second of two weekends devoted to the works of Beethoven by the Boston Symphony. William Steinberg, Symphony music director, will conduct the Friday concert at 9. p. m. in the Shed with Rudolf Firkusny as piano soloist.

Fiedler Plans All-Gershwin Pops Concert at Tanglewood

LENOX — The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops at Tanglewood takes places tonight at 8.30 in the shed. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

Porgy and Bess

The program opens with "An American in Paris" followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Fiedler conducts the "Porgy and Bess Suite" and "Rhapsody in Blue" with piano soloist Wild. The program concludes with "Strike Up the Band."

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42d season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, New Jersey when the orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Kark Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that his recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

For further ticket information, please contact the festival ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox 01240. Telephone (413) 637-1600.

Fiedler Plans All-Gershwin Pops Concert at Tanglewood

LENOX — The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops at Tanglewood takes places tonight at 8.30 in the shed. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

Porgy and Bess

The program opens with "An American in Paris" followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Fiedler conducts the "Porgy and Bess Suite" and "Rhapsody in Blue" with piano soloist Wild. The program concludes with "Strike Up the Band."

Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42d season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929.

As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, New Jersey when the orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Kark Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that his recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American symphony orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

For further ticket information, please contact the festival ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox 01240. Telephone (413) 637-1600.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 10 1970 New England

At Tanglewood

Fiedler to conduct Pops tomorrow night

The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood, Lenox, takes place tomorrow at 8.30 p.m. in the shed. Mr. Fiedler conducts an all-Gershwin concert and Earl Wild is piano soloist. The concert benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The program opens with "An American in Paris" followed by the concerto in F for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Wild as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the "Porgy and Bess Suite," "Rhapsody in Blue" with piano soloist Earl Wild. The program concludes with "Strike Up the Band."

Mr. Fiedler, celebrating his 75th birthday year, was honored at a gala concert last December at Symphony Hall in Boston. He is currently completing his 41st season as conductor of the Pops and 42nd season as conductor of the free outdoor Esplanade Concerts in Boston, which he founded in 1929. As the oldest active member of the Boston Symphony (he joined the orchestra in 1915 as a violist), Arthur Fiedler was present in 1917 at RCA Victor in Camden, New Jersey when the Orchestra made its first phonograph recording under the direction of conductor Karl Muck. At a testimonial dinner given by RCA last winter (in Mr. Fiedler's honor), it was estimated that Mr. Fiedler's recordings with the Boston Pops have sold in excess of 48 million copies.

Earl Wild has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras. He has made many recordings with both orchestras, most recently the Schwarenka piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on RCA. He has appeared with all the major American Symphony Orchestras and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, the Monte Carlo Orchestra and the Paris Pasdeloup Orchestra.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 10 1970 New England Newsclip

Rose Walsh —

Tomorrow night . . . Pops-at-Tanglewood, conducted by Arthur Fiedler who celebrated his 75th birthday last December at Symphony Hall, begins at 8:30 in the Shed for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. The great maestro will offer an all-Gershwin concert beginning with "An American in Paris," followed by the "Concerto in F" for piano and orchestra with Earl Wild the piano soloist. After intermission: the "Porgy and Bess Suite," "Rhapsody in Blue" (soloist Earl Wild) and "Strike Up the Band."

Wild has appeared numerous times with the BSO and with all the major American symphony orchestras; in Europe with the London Philharmonic; the Monte Carlo and the Paris Pasdeloup.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 11 1970 New England Newsclip

It's Time for a Fiedler Ride

The antique bells on the first La France (1909) fire-truck have been polished for Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler's ride from Lenox to Tanglewood.

Fiedler, known for his passion for riding fire engines, is conducting the Pops in a one-time appearance all-Gershwin program tonight at 8:30.

Preparations for the arrival of the 76-year-old musician progressed smoothly with only one hang-up: Short of telephoning Mrs. Fiedler, nobody knows how to find out his hat size for a fire chief's helmet.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 10, 1970

The Aisle Seat

Bernie Decker

★ ★ ★

IT'S THAT TIME of year again. The Boston Pops will play tomorrow night at 8:30 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. As usual, Arthur Fiedler will be conducting. Earl Wild will be featured as soloist at the piano. The program will be an all-Gershwin one, with "An American in Paris," "Porgy and Bess Suite," "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Strike up the Band."

A Big Week At Tanglewood; "Pops" Tonight

The annual Boston Pops-at Tanglewood concert is tonight, Tuesday, August 11 at 8:00 p. m. in the shed. Arthur Fielder conducts the Pops in an all-Gershwin program with piano soloist Earl Wild.

The second of two weekends of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted to the woks of Beethoven begins Friday evening, at 9 p. m. in the Tanglewood Shed. William Steinberg, Boston Symphony Music Director, conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Rudolf Firkusny. The program opens with Symphony no. 3 in E-flat 'Eroica', followed by the Piano concerto no. 5 in E-flat 'Emperor' with Mr. Firkusny as piano soloist.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p. m. in the Shed presents pianist Claude Frank performing two Sonatas.

Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p. m. Boston Symphony Concert.

The Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, Saturday morning, at 10:30 a. m. in the Shed, presents guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal rehearsing the program for the concert the following day.

Jerome Lowenthal, making his debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony, made his concert debut in 1963 with the New York Philharmonic. He has toured extensively in North and South America, Asia and Europe giving recitals and playing with many of the major orchestras.

William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, at 8:30. The program opens with the Festival Chorus. The second half of the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 9 in d minor op. 125 'Choral' with soloist Gwendolin Sims, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; William Cochran, 'tenor; Thomas Paul, bass;! the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Sunday afternoon, August 16, at 2:30 p. m. in the Shed, guest conductor Max Rudolf conducts the Boston Symphony in the Leonore overture no. 2, the Piano concerto no. 1 in C major, Jerome Lowenthal, soloist, and the Symphony no. 5 in c minor.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,365 (S) 298,557

AUG 11 1970 N Eng New

Gershwin Concert At Tanglewood

The annual concert by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood will take place this evening at 8:30 in the Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox. Fiedler will conduct an all-Gershwin concert with Earl Wild as piano solist. The concert benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 300,902
JUL 21 1970

Culture in the Berkshires

Summer visitors to the Berkshires will find the theatres and museums ready with new programs and exhibits for just about every taste and purpose.

A new feature at the gleaming, multi-million-dollar Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown is the Acoustiguide. Visitors may use this portable electronic device, actually a tape recorder carried by shoulder strap. The taped message directs the visitor through the air-conditioned galleries, describing more than 25 masterpiece paintings en route. The tour takes about 45 minutes. Now in its 15th year, the Clark Art Institute is open free every day, except Mondays.

At Tanglewood, the Berkshire Festival will continue to give concerts through August 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, is conducting six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

This year is the 10th anniversary of the Hancock Shaker Village just west of Pittsfield. One of the chief exhibits is the fascinating "spirit" drawings of the sect. These date from 1830s and represent "visions" experienced by Shakers. The village is open daily through October 15.

Both leading summer theaters in the Berkshires are offering a varied bill of fare for the season. The Williamstown Summer Theater on the beautiful Williams College campus, now in its 16th year, has a schedule of six plays and one musical in its season which ends August 29.

In Stockbridge, the Berkshire Theatre Festival in the handsome old Berkshire Playhouse runs through August 26. There are three main plays and a one-week festival, August 19 to 26, which will include workshops in the big barn and coach house on the Festival grounds. Apprentices and production assistants present a number of plays on the barn stage during the week.

The Berkshires--a nice place to visit

GLOB. 7/12/70

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

Lenox — the Berkshires.

So when were YOU here last?

A couple of hours out of Boston (plus or minus traffic) and the superlative equivalent of all the statused-listed European festivals in one.

It isn't just because it's the Boston Symphony on summer display, or that it's "the thing to do" if you pretend to know anything about music. (And has been since Serge Koussevitzky founded it, with the Brooks family's help, 33 years ago).

You should be there, lugging your family, entertaining your summertime guests, or just nostalga-ing, all by yourself, it's that rewarding. Take this weekend. (We did).

Nearly 3000 people streaming in across the lush grasslands just to listen to the rehearsal. Sitting on blankets, stretched out under the massive trees that contribute their own whispering sibilant as the breeze moves up from the lake.

No matter how many times you've heard Mozart or Beethoven or Mahler or Tschaikovsky, you've never heard it in context until you've listened to it at Tanglewood. Serge Koussevitzky knew this — and even though he was probably the most urbane conductor the BSO ever had, and certainly its greatest up to now, this vast hollow in the Berkshire hills, lake-girt murmuring with tall trees, widespread with lawns and sheer beauty of place and spirit, represented to him something no other orchestra could claim. Other music groups have other summer stakeouts, but Tanglewood is something to remember for keeps.

Families come. The Jacob Heaps from Omaha, trailering their way east to the sea, all eight of them. Spread on blankets, sleeping bags, and whatever else the "blanket box" yielded, they sat under the sparse stars of this weekend, and reveled. Mr. Heap taught music, and hopes to teach it again, and six young sons and daughters play "something" — from a recorder to a flute.

"This is our biggest experience — we've dreamed about coming to this wonderful place since we hitched a ride to St. Louis to hear our first symphony."

A baton's toss away were longtime Boston Symphony devotees, the Richard Ehrlichs, who travel to New York at the drop of a score to join lifelong friend, Boris Goldovsky, onetime head of the New England Conservatory of Music, and inspirer of the contemporary opera scene (Sarah Caldwell learned her trade at Boris's) ingenious pianoside).

Mme. Koussevitzky, her beautiful Berkshire house full of round-the-world musicians as always, drew every glance as usual, drifting to her box, her fascinating face emerging from a floating seraglio of pale veils.

In the yellow-striped "Tent," hung with the gorgeous fuchsias that flourish at Tanglewood, trustees and their guests made plans and influenced people to plan super parties for the July 24-25-26 weekend, which will bring to this music mecca of all time the overseers and board of the Boston Symphony for an unparalleled covey of ties and music.

The Gunther Schullers (he's N.E. Conservatory president and composer) and the Leonard Bernsteins (and that fantastic touch of genius surely needs no explanation — look in Who's Who if you're just not musical or never see TV) will be much in evidence and so will Aaron Copland — the program included two Coplands as well as Schubert, Strauss, Mozart, Haydn, Stravinsky, and Tschaikovsky. Meantime, this week-end thousands in the vast sweep of velvet lawns and tree-girt shed demesne planned their summer as they sat in dreamy tune with Mozart's "Cosi Fam Tutte," a first-ever for the BSO, and a beauty.

Seiji Ozawa conducted, and there were Gardners, Allens, Hatchs, Perrys, Alsops, Brookses, Cabots, Cutlers and Morrises whereever you looked.

Question? Call David Levenson or Marvin Schofer.

You only go for rock? The biggest collections on those boys in the country are tripling at Tanglewood — nearly 20,000 heard rock last week, and there'll be a July 21 and Aug. 18 presentation of the big-name boys.

No matter what you ike, it's here.

EVE. NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
(C) 9,800
SEP 2 1970
New England Newsclip

BITS and PIECES

What Generation Gap?

By PHILIP R. SCHEIR

WHAT HAS WOODSTOCK GOT TO DO WITH TANGLEWOOD? — Attending the next-to-last concert at Tanglewood in Lenox has brought home the fact that the much-touted generation gap isn't that gappy.

Sure the music is muted at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony, and the grass is greener than the mud at the Woodstock happening last year where rock ruled regally, but a close look brought out several interesting comparisons.

One of the most impressive is that people like to go out and listen in large groups to the kind of music they like to listen to.

At Woodstock, as shown in films and reports, they youngsters gathered by the thousands in that feeling of comradeship and sharing their mutual thing, like rock.

At Tanglewood, a more sedate group, not quite as large, also gathered to share their enjoyment of the Boston Symphony in their annual summer festival.

While there is the more formalized seating arrangement in The Shed, the large open-sided auditorium, the real action takes place to the rear in the sprawling green lawn.

Here, hundreds of couples, family groups, including grandparents and grandchildren, sit on blankets against the night dampness, or bring along lawn chairs, and partake of picnic spreads that would do justice to a formal presentation by Julia Childs.

The sound of popping corks as champagne is opened fills the evening with the prelude to a Lawrence Welk production, while the glow of citronella lamps to ward off flying insects provides the warm touch of informality.

At Woodstock, of course, there was a slightly different approach to the luncheon and dinner, because of logistic and money problems, but surely the enjoyment was the same.

At Tanglewood men and women smoked with evident relish, cancer scare or no cancer scare, while at Woodstock the young did their own brand of smoking, sniffing and jabbing, with all drug warnings pushed aside.

If fun and enjoyment is doing your own thing, then the similarities are more real than the disparities.

* * * *

THE SUNAPEE BELLE, the newly-built riverboat which cruises Lake Sunapee in New Hampshire, out of Sunapee Harbor, is coming to the close of its first season as a floating restaurant.

What makes this project of local interest is that the skipper and restaurant manager are two school officials, one formerly from Melrose, now of New Hampshire, and one from Malden.

Skipper of the Belle, built in the style of the old Mississippi riverboat, is Capt. Steve McGrath, former guidance counselor at Melrose High, who now has a similar position near Sunapee. He also has operated for many years a cruise boat which daily takes tourists around the scenic lakes.

His associate in the Revere Belle venture is Thomas McGrail, director of guidance at Malden High, and long-time friend of McGrath, and whose association with the floating restaurant venture was reported in these columns earlier in the summer.

McGrail in a note, reports that once the Belle began its cruises, "business has been great."

Now with the resumption of classes, the two educators are preparing, reluctantly, no doubt, to call it a summer and return to the everyday world of the classrooms.

* * * *

THE EARLIER STORY on Lake Sunapee brought a nostalgic note from William V. Reegan of 52 Piggott rd., Medford. He recalled that starting in 1922, he spent his vacations at Sunapee Harbor, and notes that he was there when Calvin Coolidge was sworn in as President of the United States at nearby Plymouth, Vt. Reegan writes that those who had cars in those early days, made the journey to Plymouth over rugged roads out of curiosity to the home of the elder Coolidge who had sworn in his son.

The Hartford Times
TRAVEL SECTION
Venture
10 C Hartford, Connecticut, Sunday, August 2, 1970

Traveling Along The Tanglewood Trail

LENOX, Mass. — Temperatures climb into the 90s and thoughts automatically turn toward the Connecticut and Rhode Island coastlines as best refuges from Hartford's shimmering heat. Automatically, but not necessarily. For residents with the inclinations of adventurers, there is another equally easy escape from the city: A three-hour leisurely drive into the Berkshire Mountains.

If, along with adventure, you want entertainment, choose as a destination the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, programs at the Music Barn, or the graceful poetry of dance at Jacob's Pillow Festival in Lee, Mass.

As our destination, we chose the forests and lakes around Lenox. Once, it was where Nathaniel Hawthorne sketched his "Tanglewood Tales," wrote "House of the Seven Gables," and received visits from Herman Melville. Now it is home of a major music festival through Aug. 23.

Traveling west on U.S. 44 from West Hartford, the famous Berkshire Hills stand blue-colored and deceptively low, sentinels of the Connecticut horizon. These same hills, however, if traversed via the Massachusetts Turnpike, have automobiles with even good cooling systems panting and warm after an eight-mile climb from Hartford's top 290 feet to nearly 1,800 feet above sea level.

A gentler, more interesting route is along the path outlined in our map above. And it isn't long out 44 before you arrive in New Hartford, Conn., and get the first feelings of your destination. Abruptly the countryside changes from heavily-trafficked roads and commercial establishments to sloping green fields of corn and fruits. Roadside vegetable stands are clustered under the trees and displaying home-grown corn and strawberries which were excellent quailty.

Got the kids with you? After your 30-minute drive to the freedom of the hills, you're about ready to stop at one of several ice cream carts parked all day along the road between Avon and Winsted. They are conveniently located in large clearings with turn-arounds.

The Pine Meadow section of New Hartford is next. A typical New England village, it's quiet, very rural, organized around a town square, and boasting a large white wooden-slated church. St. John's Episcopal is easily seen from the road across a small park, and well worth a visit, if only to admire the sculpted mouldings of its roof and bell tower.

At Winsted we turn left or north onto Rte. 8 through Winsted Center and past another well-landscaped park stretching like a narrow island for a block. A fountain bubbles day and night at the end of a walkway headed by a monument to those who died during the wars. Which war isn't especially important but the statue is a gathering place for the residents, and the park's limited wildlife.

For campers, the stretch between Winsted and New Boston is a bonanza, offering three state forests—the American Legion, Algonquin, and Tunxis—and posted notices of special campgrounds.

Just across the Massachusetts border in Colebrook, incorporated in 1779. A cemetery that epitaph collectors might find interesting tells the story of Indian attacks and untimely ends. A rule of thumb: Generally the best epitaphs are found in the worst places. If the cemetery looks impeccably neat and recent, forget it. Although imagination and wit are not limited to the past, people then seemed more free with it in their parting shots at the world.

A velvet ribbon replaces your well-worn roadway as you enter the Colebrook River Dam and Reservoir region, one of the finest spots along the way for picnics, fishing, swimming and boating, complete with loading ramps.

Part of a mountain was removed to build the gigantic reservoir, the capacity of which is 16.5 billion gallons which dot the clean blue water for most of the day.

New Boston is a familiar sight to the many who have followed along our "Tanglewood Trail." Petersen's Country Store rests in the crook of a road, rests in the crook of a road, flanked by deep forest and a bridge crossing a stream nobody knows the name of, a quickly-moving, frothy, refreshing tributary, probably to the Colebrook region.

The stream runs for miles and is generally shallow and absolutely safe for children. Judging from varied license plates, it was the most popular picnicking spot on our trip. And, it was at this point that your photographer, in an effort to get a picture, skipped nimbly from rock to rock to what looked like a rock to a discovery: camera was more waterproof than we had thought, and the water, although tasting a bit like iron, was refreshing, cool and not undrinkable.

At Otis you can continue north and west on Rte. 20 into Rte. 23 through Monterey. We recommend the former

(Continued on Page 11C)

Times Auto Tour

WINSTED FOUNDATION
. . . refreshing on hot days

COMBINING CULTURE, COMFORT AND CONVIVIALITY
. . . sprawled on the lawns, Tanglewood visitors hear great music

COOL RUSHING WATER ALONG ROUTE 8
. . . stream runs for miles, great for picnics and daydreaming

Text and Photos By Ruthanne Devlin

PETERSEN'S COUNTRY STORE—A LANDMARK TO THOSE WHO DRIVE RTE. 8
. . . everything from sweet corn to suntan lotion, post office, too

Tanglewood Trail

(Continued from Page 10C)

course. The roads are far better, the view still interesting, although not as wild and uncultivated as the Monterey route. Monterey's advantage is that it leads into Great Barrington, which has several stops of historical interest. The speed limit to Monterey, directly proportionate to the road surface quality, drops from a comfortable 55 MPH to 35.

Lee's major industry has been papermaking since the first years of the 19th Century. Only lately has it become a summer (nearby Tanglewood, Jacob's Pillow and the lakes) and winter (ski) resort. Broiled lobster and roast lamb are the specialties of the Morgan House Inn, on Main Street. It does its own baking, soups and relishes, with everything served in a colonial-style inn dating to 1867. Lunch, semi a la carte, is from $1.95 to $3.50; dinner, $3.95 to $5.95.

Jacob's Pillow performances are at the Ted Shawn Theatre, 9 miles east off U.S. 20. Dance companies visit from around the world in a season of spectacular performances lasting through Aug. 23.

The town of Lenox, resident population, 1,713, became world famous for music when the Boston Symphony began the Berkshire Festival there in 1939. Many of its 210 acres were originally developed as a gentleman's estate by William Aspinwall Tappan and are now formal gardens. Hawthorne Cottage, a replica of the "little red house" where Hawthorne resided, is open to tours during the Tanglewood season.

Audubon enthusiasts should visit the Pleasant Valley Wildlife Sanctuary, located on West Mountain Road, two miles north on U.S. 7, 20, then west. It's one mile square with a beaver colony, living trails.

U.S. 7 south from Lenox takes us into Stockbridge, where fiery Jonathan Edwards preached his thunder of salvation and faith. For many years it was a center for teaching the Algonquin Indians.

Our prime southerly destination is Great Barrington, generally accepted as the shopping center of the southern Berkshire resort communities.

It has tree-lined streets, big country hotels and fine homes, all of which can be seen from the road. If you have time, explore several of the back roads to find cellar foundations of homes belonging to those who migrated further west into New York.

AN Autumn DRIVE THROUGH THE HOUSATONIC VALLEY

Lenox is synonymous with Tanglewood. And indeed it should be, since this pretty town's population nearly doubles every summer with the arrival of the Boston Symphony and its guest musicians. But it was also the county seat from 1787 to 1867. The second building to be used as the courthouse was built in 1815 and is now the Lenox Library.

Pittsfield has been the county seat since 1867. It's a good-sized town and the major local shopping mecca. The construction in the heart of town is for a new Colonial Hilton. This 200-room, 14-story hostelry is rising on the site of the Wendell Hotel, a landmark which went the way of all old-

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
Tuesday, July 21, 1970

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
SEP 12 1970

Around the Town

A Weekend Dining 'Double'

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Yes, Virginia, there is a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

In fact, there is a second one at the other end of the arc of gustatorial sense. Last week, our party dined at the Pillars Restaurant in Lebanon Center, following the Tanglewood Concert. On Sunday afternoon, last, we patronized the Four Chimneys Restaurant in Old Bennington, as representing the other end of the esthetic rainbow and a wonderfully relaxing experience following the controversial Sunday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program which, to be truthful, was WAY OUT.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS OF the Four Chimneys are Jimmie Rallis proprietor and chef when the occasion requires; Maurice Champagne, chef of record and Paul Wentick, of Old Bennington in the summer and Florida in the winter, who acts as official greeter and sommelier when not pulling out chairs and snapping napkins for the epicurian cognoscenti.

The Four Chimneys, which is backgrounded by the tall, Bennington Monument is distinguishable by the four red brick heat vents (There are actually five) which stand out in hospitable relief to the colonial facade of the former private mansion, set in a beautifully-landscaped plot of ground, for all the world like a swank country club, with the exception that there are no annual dues.

Mr. Rallis installed a complete air-conditioning plant so that diners may eat in complete comfort. He could not improve the food, so he improved the physical properties of his inn, lending glamor to the frogs legs, prime roast beef, lamb and pork chops, lobsters, steaks and a surprise package of delectable desserts. The cold cucumber soup is SUPER.

THE FOUR CHIMNEYS has become the Mecca for those attending the summer Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When the devotees of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, yes, and Berlioz and Mahler also for good measure, decide that they need some material sustenance, The Four Chimneys is the logical objective. Mr. Rallis is a veteran in the food dispensing art, having started on the kitchen staff of the Ten Eyck Hotel in Albany under the aegis of the Rockwells, father and son.

The trip to Old Bennington from Tanglewood is through some of the most beautiful country in America with magnificent vistas of the Berkshire and Green Mountains. The musical elite at the Four Chimneys are frequently supplemented by the horsey set of the pre-Saratoga habitues at the fairly new track at Pownal, Vt., especially those who picked the right horses in the daily double or the daily double-double events at the Green Mountain track.

Like all successful innkeepers, Jimmie Rallis is a seasoned chef, and nothing leaves his immaculate kitchen without his once-over of the steaming hot "vittles," served by a corps of skillful and mini-skirted waitresses.

But if you do have a yen for some chef d'oeuvre not listed on the extensive menu, make your gustatorial desires known to Mr. Rallis, and watch him perform culinary miracles.

AN Autumn DRIVE THROUGH THE HOUSATONIC VALLEY

Lenox is synonymous with Tanglewood. And indeed it should be since this pretty town's popularity [illegible] derives every summer [illegible] Boston Symphony and its guest musicians. But it was also the [illegible] from 1797 to 1800. The second building on the road is the Courthouse was built in 1875 and is now the Lenox Library.

Pittsfield has been the county seat since [illegible]. It's a good sized town and the major local shopping center. The construction in the heart of town is for a new Colonial Hilton. This 200 room, 14 story hostelry [illegible] the site of the Wendell Hotel, a landmark which was [illegible] old.

Around the Town

A Weekend Dining 'Double'

BY EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

successful innkeepers [illegible] Italia is a seasoned [illegible] nothing leaves his [illegible]

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Saturday, August 8, 1970

No Vacancy: Two Nights a Week

By GERALD B. O'CONNOR

Despite a reluctant stock market, tight money and reports that the vacationing American is pulling in his money belt, tourism in the Berkshires this summer is conceded to be holding its own.

The concession is made largely by persons in the food and lodging trade, but also by those speaking from the centers of culture and entertainment like Tanglewood.

In some cases, business is reported to be better than a year ago. Not surprisingly, one of the persons making this kind of report is John Vincent Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference and one of the county's foremost drum beaters.

Near Record

Geary cited a near-record crowd at Tanglewood last weekend as part of the pudding's proof and also said that $4,000 worth of advertising in the New York Times last June, underwritten at his prodding by the state Department of Commerce and Development, played a helpful role.

Marvin Y. Schofer, press and public information director at Tanglewood, confirmed the near-record aspect of last weekend. Although Tanglewood won't reveal gate receipts, its spokesmen said the box office income from the approximately 30,000 persons who came to hear the music of Beethoven was the second largest weekend sum in the 33-year history of the music festival. The record weekend was in 1966.

Attendance at Tanglewood, said Schofer, is about even with 1969 and there is no marked sign that interest in symphonic music is on the wane. Attendance last year for the eight symphony concert weekends was 175,000 and over-all attendance was 225,000.

The impact of Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends series of rock music presentations is hard to measure, Schofer continued. Attendance has been greater this year that last, but that's because there have been more concerts. But the lone concert last year attracted nearly 21,000 persons, compared to this season's top crowd of 19,000.

Any business governed by factors as variable as the whims and fancies of the vacationing public cannot be expected to reflect a clearcut trend.

The county's innkeepers, therefore, paint a mixed picture. These facts seem to emerge:

—There is a decline in inn reservations from distant cities, like Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland, but an increase in the number of reservations from New Englanders.

They're 'Shopping'

—Weekend demand for sleeping accommodations has been approaching the capacity of the county's principal hotels and motels, but tourists are "shopping" for the best room rates perhaps a little more than usual.

—"Vacancy" signs are up from Sunday night through Thursday most weeks. However, restaurant and dining room business in many cases is better than a year ago. (At Jug End Resort in Egremont, for example, over-all business is about 14 per cent ahead of a year ago and a substantial part of the reason lies in the increased transient trade, according to a spokesman for proprietor Angus R. MacDonald.

—The presence of swimming pools at most hostelries is a significant factor in attracting vacationers. However, a pool-less motel on the Pittsfield-Lenox Road Friday night had its "no vacancy" sign lit while others with pools still had their doors open.

—Day-use and camping areas at the county's state parks have been heavily used. The 11 parks reported 7,009 campers and 23,687 day-use visitors last week.

One observation provided by George A. Tourain, proprietor of the Curtis Hotel in Lenox, is that the old-fashioned summer hotel with its big lobby, veranda and rocking chairs remains in the running as an attraction to tourists. The Curtis has been at 80 to 95 per cent of capacity most of the time, he said.

The summer isn't over. Two major concert weekends remain at Tanglewood, one of them a Beethohoven program in keeping with the 200th anniversary observation of the composer's birth. And Geary is predicting that by year's end the tourist business will have been as good as in 1968, the best year, he says, since he took his present post in 1958.

The Birmingham News
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
D. 179,129 SUN. 219,330
AUG 23 1970

THOUSANDS GATHER OUTSIDE TANGLEWOOD'S WEDGE SHAPED "SHED" FOR SUMMER WEEKEND CONCERT

. . . Over 5000 more are seated inside to hear Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home away from home

The Berkshire, at Tanglewood

Oldest music festival of all

News fine arts editor and music critic Oliver Roosevelt has been covering the major music festivals of the northeast. Today he reports on Tanglewood. The series will conclude next Sunday with a report from the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

BY OLIVER ROOSEVELT
News staff writer

LENOX, Mass.

The grandaddy of all the big American music festivals is here in the western part of Massachusetts. Since 1937 the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made a 210-acre estate here, "Tanglewood," its summer home, and the Berkshire Festival a Mecca for music lovers from all over the world.

To this visitor, returning after a 20-year absence, the Berkshire Festival remains very much the same. The Shed, seating some 5,100, is as utilitarian-looking as ever, and as accoustically remarkable. The overflow crowd, and the less affluent, still bring picnic lunches and sit on the grass behind the open edge of the Shed.

Nesting grackles still fly through the shed to their home atop a column, adding a not-unwanted counterpoint of melody to the orchestra's efforts. And the old train bell still summons the audience to its places.

There ARE some improvements. New wooden seats are almost comfortable. The orchestra shell, looking very much like a flight of black bats arising from backstage, projects sound superbly. Loudspeakers, with a built-in tenth of a second delay, reinforce the sound subtley for those outside.

And more importantly, while the orchestral concerts stick pretty much to standard fare, there is a five-day Festival of Contemporary Music, ranging from works by Luigi Nono to rock.

BUT THE HEART of Tanglewood is, as it has been since the late Serge Koussevitzky turned his dreams into reality in the early 40s, the Berkshire Music Center, which now involves some 400 early- and pre-professional musicians each summer.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus special guests (this including conductor Leon Barzin, composer Mel Powell, violinist Paul Zukofsky) are the Center's faculty.

Composer Gunther Schuller, who with Seiji Ozawa is artistic director of Tanglewood, works closely with the young musicians, mainly as a conductor. Thanks to him, and to the Fromm Music Foundation, there has been an infusion of avant garde music at the Center.

WE CAUGHT a student orchestra rehearsal in which Schuller was preparing them in Penderecki's "Anaklasis," Nino's "Il Canto Sospeso" and George Crumb's "Echoes of Time," none of which is likely to make the Birmingham Symphony concerts any time in the near future.

Not that Amerigo Marino wouldn't like to do such way-out stuff. But very few subscription series audiences, in Birmingham or elsewhere, are ready for quarter-tonal, tone-clustery works.

For those young players, though, it's the chance of a lifetime, and they eat it up. Schuller told us that if he (and other avant garde composer-conductors) can get the young people before they are influenced too strongly by musical conservatives, they really "dig" the new music. We spot-checked a few of the young people, and found what he said to be true.

AMONG THE Berkshire Music Center's alumni are Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, Leontyne Price and Claude Frank. Looking at the earnest faces of many of this summer's students, we could not help but wonder which one might become a future Bernstein or Price. Many students are here on a fellowship program that may unearth tomorrow's stars.

As its inner city project, the Music Center (along with nearby Jacob's Pillow and Williamstown Theatre) buses 240 Boston youngsters to Tanglewood for four days each, giving them a chance to rub elbows with musical greats.

Further diversification is offered at Tanglewood by Boston University, which offers courses in art, theater and music, and by the New England Conservatory, which has seminars in jazz, music education and composition.

But the more Tanglewood changes the more it remains the same. We think Serge Kousevitzky would be well pleased.

AMBLER, PA.
GAZETTE
W. 9,080
JUL 16 1970

Once Over Lightly

All On A Summer's Day

By SHIRLEY LAIRD

"Here, put Daddy's raincoat on the seat to save it for us," I instructed the middle one. We were at the Tanglewood (Mass.) Music Festival to hear and see an idol of mine, Leonard Bernstein, put the Boston Symphony through its paces.

At Tanglewood for $3 you can sit on the lawn adjacent to the outdoor (but covered) theater and enjoy a picnic while keeping an eye on your seats. Since they're not reserved at that price, you have to get there two hours early and save them with blankets, coats or programs.

Our group was passing the time with conversation and chicken out of the basket up there in New England where the Berkshires tell one of the most beautiful stories to be told.

"They're using everything in this symphony," I overheard someone say.

"How many flutes and piccolos?"

"FOUR EACH PLUS FOUR oboes, two English horns, five clarinets, two E flat clarinets and a bass clarinet, four bassoons and contra bassoon, six horns, six trumpets, four trombones, tuba, two sets of timpani, bass drum, snare drums, cymbals, small and large tam tams, triangle, three bells, a Ruthe, two harps, organ and strings. Besides that there'll be additional off-stage instruments: four horns, four trumpets, more timpani, a bass drum, cymbals and a triangle.

"What, no glockenspiel?" someone else said.

"There must be," said the one who had been listing the instruments. He was in a green and yellow tie-dyed shirt unmatching his blue and white tie-dyed dungarees. "I'll go look." He bounded off for the stage.

I pulled out my opera glasses to see if I could see a glockenspiel. Sure enough. Our neighbor had found one at rear left and was waving.

"I'm not at all sure what a Ruthe is," admitted a girl also in green and tie-dyed shirt and blue and white ditto-dyed jeans. (There were two others in the group wearing the same uniform, although I rather think they thought of themselves as non-conformists.)

IT'S A BUNDLE OF sticks," answered another.

The sky was beginning to sprinkle. I deposited my program on the seat and grabbed the raincoat which we all happily sat under.

I was in the middle of my drumstick when a woman tapped my shoulder and asked, "Is that your raincoat?"

"Oh yes," I answered. "I mean it's my husband's. He's off parking the car."

She apologized and hurried away.

The rain stopped almost as quickly as it had started. It was time to occupy our seats. The man of the house returned and we sat down to watch the assortment of clothes go by. All styles were at the concert from sultan pajamas to midi cum knickers.

"I'm going to go get us a cup of coffee," hubby said. "Maybe I can get there between showers."

"I'm dying for some," I ans-

(Please turn to Page 14)

Once Over Lightly

(Continued from page 7)

wered. "Here, take the coat just in case."

HE THREW THE COAT over his shoulders and headed for the cafeteria. On his return he tripped over the picnic basket and coffee spilled down the front of the coat.

"Gee, I'm sorry," he said. "Look what I've done to your coat."

"Don't be sorry about me," I answered. "It's your coat."

"It's not my coat. I left mine home. Oh boy! No wonder that woman came up to see if this were her coat. I told her it was yours. I even found your opera glasses in one pocket to prove it."

"Oh dear, someone asked me, too. I was sure it was yours. Come to think of it, I did feel it was a better-looking coat than any we own."

I looked in the lining. There was a plastic card bound in leather with a name on it: "Mrs. Gene R. Sutherland."

"The lady was wearing a lavender dress. Maybe I can find her before the orchestra comes in," I suggested.

Luck helped me spot her within 15 minutes. "Here's your coat," I said. "I'm so sorry about the mix-up. My husband thought it belonged to me and I thought it belonged to him. We've spilled some coffee on it and I do apologize."

"OH, I'M SO GLAD to have it back. The coffee doesn't matter. It'll dry clean out. But this is a London Fog my husband gave me just last month for my birthday, and since we live miles from any city it was really a chore for him to find the exact size and kind I wanted. Thank you so much. I also had a terribly important address and phone number in one of the pockets. I was so distressed to lose that, too."

"Mrs. Fisher," someone called, and the lady in the lavender turned around to greet a friend hurrying toward her."

It wasn't until we were stuck in a traffic jam after the concert that it struck me. Mrs. Fisher, not Mrs. Sutherland, must be walking around with a problem on her back. Was the woman who asked my husband whether he accidentally had her coat Mrs. Fisher or Mrs. Sutherland? (He couldn't remember what color she was wearing). What about the important address in the pocket? Would Mrs. Fisher discover our mutual mistake in time to find Mrs. Sutherland?

"The skies opened up again to envelop us in rain and fog.

Well, that's appropriate, I decided.

No Vacancy: Two Nights a Week

By GERALD B. O'CONNOR

Despite a reluctant stock market, tight money and reports that the vacationing American is pulling in his money belt, tourism in the Berkshires this summer is conceded to be holding its own.

The concession is made largely by persons in the food and lodging trade, but also by those speaking from the centers of culture and entertainment like Tanglewood.

In some cases, business is reported to be better than a year ago. Not surprisingly, one of the persons making this kind of report is John Vincent Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference and one of the county's foremost drum beaters.

Near Record

Geary cited a near-record crowd at Tanglewood last weekend as part of the pudding's proof and also said that $4,000 worth of advertising in the New York Times last June, underwritten at his prodding by the state Department of Commerce and Development, played a helpful role.

Marvin Y. Schofer, press and public information director at Tanglewood, confirmed the near-record aspect of last weekend. Although Tanglewood won't reveal gate receipts, its spokesmen said the box office income from the approximately 30,000 persons who came to hear the music of Beethoven was the second largest weekend sum in the 33-year history of the music festival. The record weekend was in 1966.

Attendance at Tanglewood, said Schofer, is about even with 1969 and there is no marked sign that interest in symphonic music is on the wane. Attendance last year for the eight symphony concert weekends was 175,000 and over-all attendance was 225,000.

The impact of Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends series of rock music presentations is hard to measure, Schofer continued. Attendance has been greater this year that last, but that's because there have been more concerts. But the lone concert last year attracted nearly 21,000 persons, compared to this season's top crowd of 19,000.

Any business governed by factors as variable as the whims and fancies of the vacationing public cannot be expected to reflect a clearcut trend.

The county's innkeepers, therefore, paint a mixed picture. These facts seem to emerge:

—There is a decline in inn reservations from distant cities, like Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland, but an increase in the number of reservations from New Englanders.

They're 'Shopping'

—Weekend demand for sleeping accommodations has been approaching the capacity of the county's principal hotels and motels, but tourists are "shopping" for the best room rates perhaps a little more than usual.

—"Vacancy" signs are up from Sunday night through Thursday most weeks. However, restaurant and dining room business in many cases is better than a year ago. (At Jug End Resort in Egremont, for example, over-all business is about 14 per cent ahead of a year ago and a substantial part of the reason lies in the increased transient trade, according to a spokesman for proprietor Angus R. MacDonald.

—The presence of swimming pools at most hostelries is a significant factor in attracting vacationers. However, a pool-less motel on the Pittsfield-Lenox Road Friday night had its "no vacancy" sign lit while others with pools still had their doors open.

—Day-use and camping areas at the county's state parks have been heavily used. The 11 parks reported 7,009 campers and 23,687 day-use visitors last week.

One observation provided by George A. Tourain, proprietor of the Curtis Hotel in Lenox, is that the old-fashioned summer hotel with its big lobby, veranda and rocking chairs remains in the running as an attraction to tourists. The Curtis has been at 80 to 95 per cent of capacity most of the time, he said.

The summer isn't over. Two major concert weekends remain at Tanglewood, one of them a Beethohoven program in keeping with the 200th anniversary observation of the composer's birth. And Geary is predicting that by year's end the tourist business will have been as good as in 1968, the best year, he says, since he took his present post in 1958.

The Birmingham News
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
D. 179,123 SUN. 219,330
AUG 23 1970

AMBLER, PA.
GAZETTE
W. 9,080
JUL 16 1970

THOUSANDS GATHER OUTSIDE TANGLEWOOD'S WEDGE SHAPED "SHED" FOR SUMMER WEEKEND CONCERT

. . . Over 5000 more are seated inside to hear Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home away from home

The Berkshire, at Tanglewood

Oldest music festival of all

News fine arts editor and music critic Oliver Roosevelt has been covering the major music festivals of the northeast. Today he reports on Tanglewood. The series will conclude next Sunday with a report from the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

BY OLIVER ROOSEVELT
News staff writer

LENOX, Mass.

The grandaddy of all the big American music festivals is here in the western part of Massachusetts. Since 1937 the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made a 210-acre estate here, "Tanglewood," its summer home, and the Berkshire Festival a Mecca for music lovers from all over the world.

To this visitor, returning after a 20-year absence, the Berkshire Festival remains very much the same. The Shed, seating some 5,100, is as utilitarian-looking as ever, and as accoustically remarkable. The overflow crowd, and the less affluent, still bring picnic lunches and sit on the grass behind the open edge of the Shed.

Nesting grackles still fly through the shed to their home atop a column, adding a not-unwanted counterpoint of melody to the orchestra's efforts. And the old train bell still summons the audience to its places.

There ARE some improvements. New wooden seats are almost comfortable. The orchestra shell, looking very much like a flight of black bats arising from backstage, projects sound superbly. Loudspeakers, with a built-in tenth of a second delay, reinforce the sound subtley for those outside.

And more importantly, while the orchestral concerts stick pretty much to standard fare, there is a five-day Festival of Contemporary Music, ranging from works by Luigi Nono to rock.

BUT THE HEART of Tanglewood is, as it has been since the late Serge Koussevitzky turned his dreams into reality in the early 40s, the Berkshire Music Center, which now involves some 400 early- and pre-professional musicians each summer.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plus special guests (this including conductor Leon Barzin, composer Mel Powell, violinist Paul Zukofsky) are the Center's faculty.

Composer Gunther Schuller, who with Seiji Ozawa is artistic director of Tanglewood, works closely with the young musicians, mainly as a conductor. Thanks to him, and to the Fromm Music Foundation, there has been an infusion of avant garde music at the Center.

WE CAUGHT a student orchestra rehearsal in which Schuller was preparing them in Penderecki's "Anaklasis," Nino's "Il Canto Sospeso" and George Crumb's "Echoes of Time," none of which is likely to make the Birmingham Symphony concerts any time in the near future.

Not that Amerigo Marino wouldn't like to do such way-out stuff. But very few subscription series audiences, in Birmingham or elsewhere, are ready for quarter-tonal, tone-clustery works.

For those young players, though, it's the chance of a lifetime, and they eat it up. Schuller told us that if he (and other avant garde composer-conductors) can get the young people before they are influenced too strongly by musical conservatives, they really "dig" the new music. We spot-checked a few of the young people, and found what he said to be true.

AMONG THE Berkshire Music Center's alumni are Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, Leontyne Price and Claude Frank. Looking at the earnest faces of many of this summer's students, we could not help but wonder which one might become a future Bernstein or Price. Many students are here on a fellowship program that may unearth tomorrow's stars.

As its inner city project, the Music Center (along with nearby Jacob's Pillow and Williamstown Theatre) buses 240 Boston youngsters to Tanglewood for four days each, giving them a chance to rub elbows with musical greats.

Further diversification is offered at Tanglewood by Boston University, which offers courses in art, theater and music, and by the New England Conservatory, which has seminars in jazz, music education and composition.

But the more Tanglewood changes the more it remains the same. We think Serge Kousevitzky would be well pleased.

Once Over Lightly

All On A Summer's Day

By SHIRLEY LAIRD

"Here, put Daddy's raincoat on the seat to save it for us." I instructed the middle one. We were at the Tanglewood (Mass.) Music Festival to hear and see an idol of mine, Leonard Bernstein, put the Boston Symphony through its paces.

At Tanglewood for $3 you can sit on the lawn adjacent to the (outdoor (but covered) theater and enjoy a picnic while keeping an eye on your seats. Since they're not reserved at that price, you have to get there two hours early and save them with blankets, coats or programs.

Our group was passing the time with conversation and chicken out of the basket up there in New England where the Berkshires tell one of the most beautiful stories to be told.

"They're using everything in this symphony," I overheard someone say.

"How many flutes and piccolos?"

"FOUR EACH PLUS FOUR oboes, two English horns, five clarinets, two E flat clarinets and a bass clarinet, four bassoons and contra bassoon, six horns, six trumpets, four trombones, tuba, two sets of timpani, bass drum, snare drums, cymbals, small and large tam tams, triangle, three bells, a Ruthe, two harps, organ and strings. Besides that there'll be additional off-stage instruments: four horns, four trumpets, more timpani, a bass drum, cymbals and a triangle.

"What, no glockenspiel?" someone else said.

"There must be," said the one who had been listing the instruments. He was in a green and yellow tie-dyed shirt unmatching his blue and white tie-dyed dungarees. "I'll go look." He bounded off for the stage.

I pulled out my opera glasses to see if I could see a glockenspiel. Sure enough. Our neighbor had found one at rear left and was waving.

"I'm not at all sure what a Ruthe is," admitted a girl also in green and tie-dyed shirt and blue and white ditto-dyed jeans. (There were two others in the group wearing the same uniform, although I rather think they thought of themselves as non-conformists.)

IT'S A BUNDLE OF sticks," answered another.

The sky was beginning to sprinkle. I deposited my program on the seat and grabbed the raincoat which we all happily sat under.

I was in the middle of my drumstick when a woman tapped my shoulder and asked, "Is that your raincoat?"

"Oh yes," I answered. "I mean it's my husband's. He's off parking the car."

She apologized and hurried away.

The rain stopped almost as quickly as it had started. It was time to occupy our seats. The man of the house returned and we sat down to watch the assortment of clothes go by. All styles were at the concert from sultan pajamas to midi cum knickers.

"I'm going to go get us a cup of coffee," hubby said. "Maybe I can get there between showers."

"I'm dying for some," I ans-

(Please turn to Page 14)

Once Over Lightly

(Continued from page 7)

wered. "Here, take the coat just in case."

HE THREW THE COAT over his shoulders and headed for the cafeteria. On his return he tripped over the picnic basket and coffee spilled down the front of the coat.

"Gee, I'm sorry," he said. "Look what I've done to your coat."

"Don't be sorry about me," I answered. "It's your coat."

"It's not my coat. I left mine home. Oh boy! No wonder that woman came up to see if this were her coat. I told her it was yours. I even found your opera glasses in one pocket to prove it."

"Oh dear, someone asked me, too. I was sure it was yours. Come to think of it, I did feel it was a better-looking coat than any we own."

I looked in the lining. There was a plastic card bound in leather with a name on it: "Mrs. Gene R. Sutherland."

"The lady was wearing a lavender dress. Maybe I can find her before the orchestra comes in," I suggested.

Luck helped me spot her within 15 minutes. "Here's your coat," I said. "I'm so sorry about the mix-up. My husband thought it belonged to me and I thought it belonged to him. We've spilled some coffee on it and I do apologize."

"OH, I'M SO GLAD to have it back. The coffee doesn't matter. It'll dry clean out. But this is a London Fog my husband gave me just last month for my birthday, and since we live miles from any city it was really a chore for him to find the exact size and kind I wanted. Thank you so much. I also had a terribly important address and phone number in one of the pockets. I was so distressed to lose that, too."

"Mrs. Fisher," someone called, and the lady in the lavender turned around to greet a friend hurrying toward her."

It wasn't until we were stuck in a traffic jam after the concert that it struck me. Mrs. Fisher, not Mrs. Sutherland, must be walking around with a problem on her back. Was the woman who asked my husband whether he accidentally had her coat Mrs. Fisher or Mrs. Sutherland? (He couldn't remember what color she was wearing). What about the important address in the pocket? Would Mrs. Fisher discover our mutual mistake in time to find Mrs. Sutherland?

"The skies opened up again to envelop us in rain and fog.

Well, that's appropriate, I decided.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

SEP 6 1970

Gunther Schuller: Artist On a Hot Tin Roof?

By DONAL HENAHAN

WHAT strange itch is it that so often turns the promising modern composer into an artist on a hot tin roof? Beyond the primordial urge to earn the rent money, is it ego or greed that drives a Boulez, a Foss or a Bernstein to take on job after job, until Renaissance man begins to look like a monomaniac in comparison? Boredom, maybe? Power lust? Fear of an imminent drying up of creative juices? Simple, unconstrictable energy? All of the above?

Why not ask Gunther Schuller, who should know. Since Leonard Bernstein bailed out of the New York Philharmonic and retired to his dozen-odd other careers, Schuller has few challengers for the title of busiest man in American music—unless you count Boulez, who recently took on not only the Philharmonic but the duty of adviser to the Cleveland Orchestra after the death of George Szell. The other evening at Tanglewood, where Schuller was closing out his first season as co-director (with Seiji Ozawa) of the festival and director of the Berkshire Music Center, they interrupted him in mid-concert long enough to present him with Columbia University's Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award.

Gunther Schuller, the citation noted, has "already achieved distinction in six careers: as conductor, as composer, as horn virtuoso and orchestral musician, and as author and educator." So here we sit in his Tanglewood office, listening to him explain what a nice youngish composer like him is doing in a place like this. Shouldn't he be up in the old garret composing instead of shuffling papers?

The 44-year-old musician, who wears a continual look of concern, can at times flash a smile of some charm, and now he does. "I haven't lived the kind of life for perhaps 20 years where I could just compose anytime I wanted to. Those days are long gone. I suppose I do occasionally find myself deprived at the particular time I want to write, but it hasn't reached the point where I've been stilled creatively. After all, I wrote an opera, 'The Fisherman and His Wife,' last spring and recently finished an orchestra piece." The opera, produced in Boston by Sarah Caldwell's company, will be presented on television this winter. His earlier opera, "The Visitation," was a hit in Germany several years ago, but fell flat here when the Hamburg Opera brought it to the Metropolitan. He is one of the most prolific, if not exactly popular, American composers, only his "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" having made it into the standard orchestral repertory.

*

Schuller played the French horn for two years in the Cincinnati Symphony, then for 14 years labored in the Metropolitan Opera orchestra before leaving in 1959 to begin enlarging his Protean Man image. As a free-lance horn, he took part in some pioneering recordings that tried to fuse jazz and the classical tradition, the so-called Third Stream experiments. He found time to acquire a family (wife Marjorie and two sons). He became the leading apostle of the American avant-garde as conductor and impresario, and president of the century-old New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. And now Tanglewood. If he had the heads of Hydra and the hands of Shiva, Schuller might be able to do more, but it is doubtful. A musician who has known him for years says, "Gunther can't say no to any job, or won't, anyway."

He has been conducting major orchestras for four or five years now and likes it up front. "But I'm holding the line at seven or eight major engagements a year — unlike Mr. Boulez — and don't want to go much beyond that. I can't. But in fact I have no great desire to become a professional conductor in the full sense. It's not inconceivable that I could at some future date, but I have no terrible ambitions about this. You may believe that or not."

Where is at all leading him? Along the same road as Boulez and Foss, perhaps? "What other conductor-composers do doesn't in any way indicate what I'm going to do. I like the complexity of this kind of life and the way all these activities cross-fertilize. The teaching, the composing, the conducting, the whole educational philosophy—you know, organizing a school into a fine teaching emporium—it all draws on my already varied background in a way that I find satisfying. It draws on all the stops that are in me, so to speak."

Then there is Gunther Schuller, the writer. "I'm working on the second volume of my jazz book. The first one, 'Early Jazz,' went up to 1930, and the second carries the story up to the present. It won't be entirely up to date, so I'm afraid I'll have to do a third volume some day." Projects have a way of breeding projects.

One of Schuller's career problems is, at the moment, in serious danger of settling itself. The New England Conservatory, whose head man he became three years ago, is in pressing trouble and may either close down entirely or cut back its activities drastically. But Schuller is not giving up. "We're still hopeful we'll find the support we need. We're still waiting for a number of sources to commit themselves. But what we must do to be in business next year is to start a major endowment fund-raising campaign."

The 600-student conservatory had very little capital when he took charge, Schuller said, "and we skimmed that off. We are now living on borrowed money." The yearly budget is about $2.5 million, and the deficit between $1 million and $1.5 million. "Our founder had this individualistic idea that a conservatory should pay its own way—it's even written into the charter. That worked a hundred years ago, but it doesn't work now. Eastman, Peabody, Juilliard—all the other conservatories have endowments." In order to live off its endowment, Schuller estimates, the Boston Conservatory needs to raise $15 or $20 million. If you have any change lying around, you can address him in care of the conservatory.

"Several foundations have been considering programs of help for all the conservatories. They're all in trouble. As I say, a number of doors have not been closed, and as long as they are open. . ." But President Schuller will have to begin making contract commitments to faculty and staff in the fall, and outside his window one could already see a tree or two with leaves turning.

Through the window, too, there came the occasional blasting of an amplified rock band, rehearsing that night's Fillmore-at-Tanglewood show in the hallowed Music Shed.

What did the Third Stream pioneer think of all that? Did he perceive a fusion of rock and the classics, or something hopeful in the already far advanced merger of rock and jazz? "All I can say about Third Stream developments is that there are more composers than ever writing music that attempts to fuse certain classical techniques with non-classical techniques." But rock is not where it's at. "Rock has nearly killed off jazz, and jazz did a lot to kill itself off by going two ways—toward the very commercial and the very avant-garde. So that an avant-garde jazz performer such as Ornette Coleman is perhaps worse off than the non-jazz avant-gardist." What about the occasional efforts lately to merge rock and the classics, such as the conjunction of Zubin Mehta and Frank Zappa on TV? "I find a lot of fusing, but most of it is of an absolutely appalling quality, and the only reason it's going on is that people think they can make a fast buck."

But fusion of elements from other cultures and other areas such as jazz is only one way composers are going today. "It's just a quiet thing that people with this special background are doing. The only thing that's changed—and thank God for it—is that the whole mania for labeling music as Third Stream has died down. A phrase I had been using in an apologetic way suddenly became a slogan and was put up by certain people as a panacea. When it didn't provide the answers they were looking for, they said it was dead. Well, it isn't."

At Tanglewood, Schuller's major concern is the Berkshire Music Center, which this summer had 168 fellows in residence, all getting free tuition, room and board (the Boston Symphony pays the whole bill). The quality of the students astonishes even Schuller. "Of course, we audition and get the best of the young people, but it is amazing to me to see how in my time here—seven years—standards keep improving. Not just technically, but in terms of musical perception, perception of how a composer puts a piece together. Problems that five years ago would have seemed insurmountable now are handled easily."

Plainly, education is the subject that warms up Schuller most. "These kids come here, some of them, indoctrinated by their school systems to think that only 19th-century music is worth anything. But they get the idea here, perhaps in some subliminal way, that contemporary music is their music. They start to relate to it, in spite of their indoctrination." Unfortunately, Schuller feels, a whole teaching profession has arisen over the last 100 years that has encouraged students to perfect instrumental skills for show-business purposes, not to deepen musical perception.

"That kind of player I am not interested in at all. If there is any one emphasis here, it is on the whole idea of ensemble, on training in the realization that you are part of an organism, and why."

In talking about his conducting career, Schuller also sounds more the educator than the career maestro. What if he were offered an orchestra? "My answer would have to depend on what kind of orchestra was offered. I don't mean how good it is. I'd like to think I could take some lesser orchestra and make it better. But the issue would be to what extent I would be given a free hand to do some of the rethinking, the reorientation of the symphony orchestra that it must do to survive." In Atlanta, for instance, (Continued on Page 14)

Dan McCoy from Black Star

Gunther Schuller, all "six" of him, at Tanglewood

"With the heads of Hydra and hands of Shiva he might be able to do more"

About Gunther Schuller

Continued from Page 13

Schuller feels Robert Shaw has done "a really revolutionary thing in making that orchestra a part of the larger community. It's a very young orchestra, and a very live situation.

"I see an awareness developing in some orchestras, among some trustees and some musicians, that changes need to happen. That awareness is only a first step. Very few of them are into those changes, and perhaps it's not that easy to be into them. But at least they realize that the orchestra as constituted up to about three years ago can't continue very long. Economic factors have forced the realization of this—perish the thought it should ever be artistic matters that could force changes.

"It took quite a while for some of these people to accept the notion that someone could grow up in American society and not automatically love Beethoven. That was kind of a shocker, but now that it's established, a lot of doors are opening."

Looking at the composer-conductor form sheet, one would not be surprised to see all six Gunther Schullers stepping through one of those doors some day, if some board of trustees agrees with them that "a basic rethinking of the role of the symphony orchestra in our society has to take place."

But not just yet. "I won't quit the conservatory unless circumstances force it. I've put too much time and energy into it. I'm sticking it out."

VIEW FROM THE TERRACE overlooks the rolling ranges of the Berkshires and pleasant peaceful valleys of Western Massachusetts.

She Shall Have Music Wherever She Lives . . .

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 28 1970 New England Newsclip

MARJORIE SHERMAN

The serenity of a grand lady

How does Olga Koussevitzky do it?

Sitting beside her on the low stone wall that is the end of her terrace and the beginning of flower-spangled meadows of Lenox, I looked at that serene and ageless face, frail-boned and ivory-skinned in the clear afternoon sunlight.

MADAME OLGA

She and Gen. Cutler were facing the Berkshire Hills across the valley; and she said, "Bobby, do you remember when beautiful view was here, after Serge suddenly realized this buying the house in the rain and fog?"

Her laughter was a young girl's — yet it was years ago, that shared day of delight.

"Dear lady," Robert Cutler said gently, "you and he have given so many of us so much."

On the grass at her feet, the Boston Symphony's newest fable, associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, looked wistful. "I wish I had been here then." He'll be 26 years old Dec. 21.

Velvet-jacketed, earnest, Christoph Eschenbach, whose talented hands had an hour earlier brought a Tanglewood audience of thousands, somnolent in the sun, to their feet with rocketing applause for Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, bent his young dark head over her thin blue-veined hand. "It is very sad to leave this place!"

"But you will be back, often. Everyone is," and her quick light step took her with him to the wide veranda. "Anna, Christoph is going." Her sister and closest friend, Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais, patted a handsome Beauharnais grandson on the arm, tucked his guitar under her blue chiffon arm, and nodded briskly toward the long tree-lined private road. "You will take Mr. Eschenbach down please."

Singer Phyllis Curtin, a wide-ribboned straw shading her vivid pretty face, sat on the terrace steps with the two small, enchanting daughters of the day's conductor, Kenneth Schermerhorn, making a flower posy to match their smocked Liberty prints. Beside them the long border garden blazed with deep coral marigolds, pungent-scented in the sun.

Inside, the long cool rooms glowed with the treasures the late Serge Koussevitzky loved. The greeny fire of Waterford glass, the ancient soft green of old jade, parchment piles of rare scores. And his vital face is everywhere. The famous Lipchitz bronze of him, the wall-high portrait with his double-bass, and most glorious of all, Olga Koussevitzky's warm living sketches.

Outside the party is still in happy spate: the Leonard Bernsteins have to rush off to meet Jerome Robbins; conductor Seji Ozawa has a rehearsal; composer Aaron Copland, honor guest on his 70th birthday, swaps ages with Gen. Cutler — and no one believes either of them.

There have been three days of feting the trustees and overseers of the Boston Symphony and a constant shuttling of guests of all ages and talents between Tanglewood and her big white house, yet Olga Koussevitzky looks radiant.

By LAURA WHITE

As a child, back in 1911, Olga Naumoff lined the bank of the Volga with thousands of other Russians, to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct a huge symphony orchestra aboard a boat as it steamed along the river.

She was awed. And who wouldn't be? Koussevitzky was considered one of the greatest conductors in the world. But for Olga it was even more exciting. The great Koussevitzky was married to her aunt Natalya. And little did Olga dream that 36 years later —five years after her aunt's death—she would marry the great conductor.

SERANAK, the large old Koussevitzky home set on 200 acres in Lenox, adjoining Tanglewood. Koussevitzky bought the house when he was director of the Berkshire Music Center, and the house was always filled with famous and aspiring musicians.

"I REMEMBER it was such a thrill seeing my uncle conduct. After the concert, all the relatives gathered at the family estate at Samara on the Volga. All the children took horns and other instruments to start their own orchestra. But I insisted on conducting," laughed Mme. Koussevitzky, at Seranak, a 200-acre estate on a hill in Lenox adjoining Tanglewood.

Koussevitzky bought the estate in 1937, when he was director of the Berkshire Music Center, during the summers.

Koussevitzky had opposed the Bolshevik regime and left his native Russia for Paris. In 1924, he came to the Hub to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Koussevitzkys invited Olga, whose family had also fled Russia, to join them as their private secretary.

"I was a little afraid. My typing wasn't very good," said Mme. Koussevitzky who worked as secretary to her uncle and aunt for nearly 18 years.

Mme. Koussevitzky likes to recall some of the amusing stories about her late husband. Such as the time he was in Cuba to conduct the Cuban symphony orchestra.

"THE MUSICIANS came in wearing guns. They opened their music and rested their guns next to them. Koussevitzky was a little startled. He asked the concert master, a Russian also, why they all had guns. And the concert master replied, 'Oh, they're mostly all policemen and come right from their posts to play.' Koussevitzky was satisfied and they went on with rehearsals," said his widow.

When she's not in Lenox, Mme. Koussevitzky lives in New York, where she heads up the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which among other things, commissions new work by artists. She's president of the American Music Foundation, which attempts to promote performances of major symphony orchestras from around the world. Tapes and recordings of the performances are distributed through the Foundation to schools, libraries, and universities so that young musicians and composers may study them.

AND SHE is president of Musicians Club of New York. The club encourages young musicians and even arranges a concert series open to the public to give the artists exposure.

"Musicians must play before audiences. We have a concert the first Sunday of the month betwen October and May, at the former Roosevelt residence, which was donated to Hunter College," she said.

But as soon as the weather warms, Mme. Koussevitzky returns to Seranak in Lenox.

"Always Tanglewood in the summer. It's one of the living memories of Koussevitzky," she said.

"Seranak" is a sprawling white house, on a high hill with a commanding view of the rolling Berkshires and deep valleys.

INSIDE, THE house is filled with portraits, photographs, books and unlimited memorabilia of the late Koussevitzky. On one wall are framed photographs with endearing inscriptions from two famous fans of the composer—Queen Eugenie, the Spanish noblewoman and consort of Napoleon 3rd, and Infanta Isabella, another member of the Spanish royal family.

Much of the memorabilia, especially that acquired during Koussevitzky's career with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been donated to the music department of the Boston Public Library.

"IT'S HERE for now, but will be moved to the library when the new building is completed. It is for everyone to enjoy. And for young artists to study. That's the greatest memorial to Koussevitzky. A memory that lives and teaches," she said.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photos by Ulrike Welsch)

MME. OLGA KOUSSEVITZKY, widow of the late Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, poses beneath his portrait.

THE NEW HAVEN REGISTER, SUNDAY, AUGUST 9, 1970

Michael Tilson Thomas . . . Conductor, Conversationalist

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Reviewer

Ailing William Steinberg finished the first half of the Boston Symphony's program at Lincoln Center last October 22, but by intermission he felt too weak to continue. For at least one person in the audience the announcement held a special significance. As the newly appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 25-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas knew that it was now his ball game. Robert Starer's contemporary "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra" and Strauss' well known tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel" were coming up after intermission, and although an assistant conductor is responsible for studying and learning all the pieces performed by an orchestra, Thomas had conducted neither of them previously—even during rehearsals.

Listeners and critics invariably root for the last minute substitute, but they are also rather quick to make up their minds concerning his competence and flair. Shortly after the first downbeat, however, there was little doubt in anyone's mind—a new major-rank conductor had been discovered on a cold October night at Manhattan's cultural mecca. Since Mr. Steinberg required hospitalization, Thomas finished the tour with the orchestra, and later presided over the final six weeks of the regular season at Symphony Hall in Boston.

* * *

Michael Tilson Thomas had, of course, really been "discovered" somewhat earlier. As a conducting fellow at Tanglewood during the summer of 1968 he was awarded the coveted Koussevitsky Conducting Prize, and on his return to the Boston Symphony's summer home in 1969 was invited to become the BSO's youngest assistant conductor in its 89 year history. More recently he was appointed Associate Conductor and last evening made his third Tanglewood appearance of the season in a program of works by Prokofiev, Debussy, Satie, and Mussorgsky. He also guest-conducted the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia a few weeks ago, and will appear in that capacity at Lincoln Center "Mostly Mozart Festival" on August 28 and 29.

Thomas was trained at the University of Southern California where he received a Master's Degree a year ago. He was a frequent guest conductor at the prestigious Monday Evening Concerts in Los Angeles—founded by Igor Stravinsky, the Ojai Festival, the Los Angeles Philharmonic Youth Concerts, and was regular conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra—also in Los Angeles. In addition, he has performed extensively as a pianist and harpsichordist, and has recorded on both the Nonesuch and Angel labels in that capacity. Though he is not currently represented on records as a conductor, Deutsche Grammophon has already recorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his leadership in new performance of Carl Ruggles' "Sun-Treader," Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 1." The Ruggles-Ives pairing, scheduled for release in early October, is particularly auspicious since Ruggles' important and distinctive orchestral work of 1932 is currently available in only one recorded version.

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas

* * *

At 25, Thomas is very much his own man, and a few days ago—between segments of his busy Tanglewood rehearsal schedule—he expressed the opinion that "all music should be played as if it were composed the day before yesterday. Accepted masterworks in particular should not be regarded as something holy and sacred and sets that have been preserved for posterity. For me it seems essential that all music should be approached as if it had never been heard before. Every performance should feel like a world premiere."

The remainder of our interview, which covered a wide range of topics, follows:

A certain group of observers think of the symphony orchestra as a kind of dinosaur. And, of course, we all know the financial problems being faced by American Symphony orchestras. Are you optimistic about the future?

Well, I am not really worried about the survival of the major musical institutions because they are already developing a flexibility and a kind of new adaptability which I think will insure their continuation. But I do think one has to worry about the second-line orchestras, and even beyond that the third, fourth and fifth line ones. Ultimately, one begins as a player in some orchestra like that—as a student in high school or whatever—and so eventually the absence of that sort of activity will effect even the major musical institutions.

In terms of the so-called museum aspects of the symphony orchestra—which have been so much criticized in recent years—I must say that I have nothing against museums, and as a matter of fact I love to visit them. But I only go to museums where there is art that I find very beautiful. And this is basically my reaction to the criticism of symphony orchestras; if programs are interesting and imaginative people will come. My own programs are filled with enormously contrasting kinds of music, and I think that this simple measure insures interest and continued life to the symphony.

See CONDUCTOR Page 7D

Thomas conducting at Tanglewood.

(Continued From Page 1D)

Concerning imaginative programming, I think that one can present masterworks in such a predictable way that it is self-defeating, however. For example, take Beethoven's "Fifth Symphonoy." If you place it in the second half of the program it's already a very predictable situation, and everyone is set for it. But what if that piece were to come at the beginning of the program? You walk into the hall and suddenly—bang! you're hit with that opening gesture. Also doing it at the beginning of the program very much affects the whole kind of performance one gives it. And then what if after intermission you have something by Varese or Elliot Carter, or what if you end with a Haydn symphony? The possibilities are practically limitless. My own way of planning programs now is that if there is anything either in the choice of the pieces themselves, or in the arrangement of the pieces that I think is too pat, too predictable, then I immedataely change it, because I want to do whatever I can to revitalize the concert format.

Another interesting possibility for rejuvenation is the use of many diverse ensembles. I think Boulez' idea of having much larger orchestras is very valid; that is, instead of having an orchestra of 106, maybe having one of 150. With that many players it would be possible to have two conductors in residence all the time, and they could both be working on very different parts of the repertoire. Then programs of enormous diversity could be evolved. And it would be good for the players too since they would not be stuck playing the same pieces at the same desk.

You mentioned that placement within the program would affect your interpretation of a work. Could you be more specific?

Well, for example, if the Beethoven "Fifth" comes in the second half of the program, the opening gesture is imbued with the whole fate thing associated with it. You sit there, and you're ready for it to happen. But if it comes at the beginning of a program it's really like a virtuoso playing his opening three notes. It's a much more aggressive statement, like someone coming out and saying "Okay, this is the material I am working with, and here it is!" And then you go into this opening movement, which is so short that it is almost like 'Here it is, and I've warmed up my fingers, and now I'm going to play you an Adagio. It's a very different kind of thing. It sort of puts it into almost a completely different musical tradition. Actually I think of that symphony as a first-half-of-the-program piece.

How much interpretive latitude do you feel a conductor can—or should—exercise?

Let me preface my answer by saying that I think phonograph records have created a very sad situation in this respect. We have become very stultified in our idea of what is permissible interpretatively, and people have almost a proprietary interest in certain performances—generally corresponding to what they happen to have in their record collection.

Since music is a performing art, how boring it would be if all performances were quite similar. The same would be true of the theater—I mean if there were a standardized performance of 'The Tempest' or 'Hamlet.' The whole interest lies in the fact that performances can be both valid and different. The possibilities or re-interpretation are enormous.

Would you say that a stage director has more leeway in that respect than a conductor?

It depends upon the piece, although in most cases, I would say yes. But there is still a great deal of leeway in the traditional musical repertoire. And I think that it is necessary for all musical traditions to be recreated with each generation. Of course it happens anyway. I mean when one listens to records that were made in the early part of the century by then very famous artists he realizes that it would just be intolerable to do it that way now. I'm looking forward to the snide criticisms which will be made of our current lauded aesthetic by young musicians 30 years from now. And that's essential—that's necessary. I think that an art is in a very healthy way when there is perpetual scandal about interpretation or its current state. I think that's a very, very good sign.

I agree. In fact, I think that even if a piece of art polarizes people it is all to the good. One of the large problems now is that the avant garde musical scene is sufficiently uninteresting so that almost nothing happens. That is, people don't yell or boo—they either just get bored or they don't bother to go at all.

Sure. And with established masterworks this business about records is no joking matter either. It's really a very deleterious thing. I mean people get so used to hearing a certain record that when they go to a performance, they are often very disappointed, and they measure the goodness of the performance by its congruency with the record that they own.

Do you feel that that's also partly due to the current vogue of copious tape editing and splicing?

Oh, yes.

Since your debut as a recorded conductor will be taking place soon, how does this fit in with your whole feeling about recordings?

Well, I think recordings should be made—especially of pieces which are not often performed, or which have not been adequately recorded. But I would certainly hope that people would not become so attached to one record that if I decided to re-record the piece they will be angry with me for having changed my ideas about some things. After all, a recording is really a portrait of one possibility of a piece. Still, I suppose that one can't realistically hope that people won't become attached to the record because they have listened to it so many times.

Many musicians are concerned that kids of 18 or 19 are not going in the direction of "classical" music. How do you feel about the audience of the near future?

I think that if the music that they are offered is really interesting they will go. And I don't mean interesting in the sense of the much publicized combination of rock and roll groups with symphony orchestras. I think that this is perhaps one of the worst condescensions on the part of the symphony orchestra. And also, the very best rock groups perform music that is absolutely complete in itself. I mean, it is an art form and it is complete and total. And it's marvelous!

Are there some rock groups of which you're particularly fond?

Yes. But you know the current state of rock is very complicated because so many groups are breaking up and not working or changing around. I mean you might say, "I like this group" and then find out they haven't even existed for a year. I certainly like the Stones very, very much. It's an enormously creative group in every way . . . sociologically, very important, too. I like James Brown very much, and I like some of the things the Beatles have done. I liked Buffalo Springfield while it existed.

There are also some older artists that I like very much in terms of the pop field, too. I like Peggy Lee very much—and Bessie Smith. And Dietrich is really fantastic! Especially her early records. Also, I like a lot of the older carbaret performers — sort of semi-classical performers — like Richard Tauber. Aud (guitarist) Django Reinhardt was fantastic.

I think what I like about these people is that they speak through the music. That they as people speak directly to you through it. And that's something that I always try to do as a conductor. I like it much better if I feel that I'm really talking through what I'm doing with a piece. I am infinitely more interested in communicating and getting something across, than presenting an isolated, abstract version which is 99 and 44/100 per cent pure by somebody or another's standards.

This whole idea of a musical performance is a fatal business too. That's one of my least favorite phrases. The musical world is divided into all sorts of societies and cults who have a real 'thing' about certain composers; about how they should be played or what constitutes a musical performance of their works. I always contest this because I don't think the word musical means anything when used this way. A person can be musical. You know, you can say so and so is a musical person and you mean that he is disposed towards music or that he has a gift for music. But when someone talks to me about a musical performance I generally think — "well, this was a performance that this person liked, but either he doesn't know why he liked it or else he doesn't want to say why." By way of example, if you like a great deal of rubato in music, then when you hear someone play with a lot of rubato you say 'That's a musical performance.' Or if you hear someone play without rubato then you say "It's an unmusical performance." And so it goes. There is no such thing as an absolute musical performance. It's really just a matter of what your own particular taste is.

After that comment it would be difficult to escape the area of music criticism. Although I spend part of my time in that capacity I must admit to a growing disillusionment about what it really amounts to — particularly in the case of a concert which is presented only once (and most concerts are). As a young conductor how do you feel about musical criticism in general?

Well, critics are all individuals, and I feel very differently about some than I do about others. I do read my reviews — there are conductors who say they don't but I think everybody reads his reviews — and I always relate criticism to the fact that it emanates from a person. It's not some abstract voice. And after one reads a few reviews by a certain critic one has an idea of his responsibility and depth of knowledge. This, of course, doesn't apply only to "critics" either. If I were standing in a room, for example, and someone said to me 'Well, look, I really think this was wrong in your performance,' or 'You should have done this or that,' and I know this person's background and know the basis of his taste, then I will either totally ignore his remark or else I will take it very seriously. The only difference with music criticism is that it is out in public like an open letter. But that's okay — because you are performing in public too. That's just the nature of the game. One has to get used to that. But I certainly have, at times, been impressed by a criticism that someone has written, and thought, "Yes, that is a good point," and I have remembered it and taken it into consideration in future work on the same piece or in one that presents the same problems. On the other hand I have read comment which has been just irresponsible. So it's really a matter of the person who writes it.

Would you care to mention any critics whom you feel to be particularly responsible and sensitive?

I don't think I would. I would add, however, that any critic is under a tremendous disadvantage to have to express himself in a very short space in the paper. In a way it is almost impossible not to be — well — cryptic. Also, I think that you brought up an important question as to whether concerts which are presented only once should be reviewed at all. If the same program is going to be done many times — as it would in Boston, for example — I think there is some validity in having the concert reviewed because it gives people an idea of what it was like and so on. But if it is a one-night stand, as so many concerts are, then one really wonders exactly what it is all about. You know, what purpose does it really serve?

Repeat programs bring up another interesting aspect of musical interpretation. For example, if you were to go on the road with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conduct the same program several times, would the performances vary much?

Definitely. I change a great deal from performance to performance.

Upon what would the changes depend?

Upon everything. Everything from what I eat for dinner to what the temperature is. What I am reading at that moment, who I have seen . . . And you know it's very exciting to me that performances vary.

On the other hand, sometimes they vary just because I want to do different things — because I have decided that it's time to try another possibility — another potentiality.

In terms of artistic pre-disposition, I can think of several conductors who would not want that kind of spontaneity brought to a large work.

Oh, yes. I know conductors who pride themselves on the fact that their performances of a particular work are the same length, and that they are very much like one another. But I don't share that view. I come from a theatrical family, as you know, and it has probably influenced my approach. My whole family was in the theater, actors, writers, directors, everything. And maybe part of my orientation comes from that. My real name is Thomashafsky and my grandfather, Boris Thomashafsky, was the star and founder of the Yiddish theater in America. Also, the actor, Paul Muni was a cousin of mine, and there are a number of other well known people in the theater in my family. I grew up in that sort of environment, and I think that it has influenced a lot of my ideas about performing.

I must say that I am terribly proud of being a performer too. Some musicians whom I know seem a little bit sheepish about the fact that they are performers, and they want to feel that they are great intellectual forces and so on. Well, that's all very true, but I think that one must never lose the sense that one is there to project some thing—communicate something. Something, indeed, that is much greater than the sum of its parts.

How about the orchestra as an instrument? Since your 'instrument' consists of people—artists with their own musical predispositions—how does that change your work as a performer in the normal sense, since you must speak to the audience via other human beings rather than through a piece of brass or gut?

Well, of course, I speak to them, too. That is most important. As a matter of fact, the really enormous emotional experience that one has with the orchestra is what the audience feels, too; this real "einfuhrung" feeling. You know, when a performance is right, and you look at the people in the orchestra and something switches on magically—a kind of nonmetered time. An undifferentiated forward motion, that is absolutely irresistable. I don't mean like accelerandi—but rather like magnetic tape moving past the head—inevitable and total. That's when you know you are really on and it's truly a performance. That sense of oneness in the orchestra is really a super-exhilarating thing.

How about the times when you are not getting that feeling, and you have to try to bring it about?

Sure, that happens, too. By getting more and more experience as a conductor you learn where the places are that you really have to work, and where you really have to do something. Conducting is a very curious thing—in some ways it's a very precise and quantitative thing, and in other ways it's very, very mysterious.

What are your feelings about musical education?

I actually think, as I said before, that the current generation contains an astonishingly great number of people who are very interesting, and very involved in all kinds of music. I think that it's wonderful that musical education now takes place in an environment where one is exposed to a great deal of non-musical disciplines—as I was. I think that is very, very important.

And, also, as in my case in Los Angeles where I was trained, one played classical music one day, a rock and roll date the next, avant garde improvisations the day after that—with Haydn chamber music in between. There was a sense of real musical totality, and even if one wasn't ultimately involved in a certain musical discipline, one learned to respect it and know it. I think that all of this is leading to much more interesting concert fare, and provides a much more meaningful perspective from which to interpret and perform music.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Spaced-Out Music for the Great Outdoors

Globe

By Margo Miller

LENOX, Mass.

We were talking about his two Tanglewood programs and Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducts the Boston Symphony on Sunday, July 19, and again on Saturday, Aug. 8, was explaining something about music outdoors.

You need a music of great clarity for outdoors, he said, a music whose "harmonies are spaced out." He was saying this, and, at the same time, pantomiming with a good deal of body English what a music of clarity looks like. A conversation with Thomas includes words, of course — great flights of lucid, rapidly spoken sentences, delivered at you with his direct, gray-eyed gaze and sometimes accompanied by a musical interlude of him singing and conducting. You have been buttonholed by one of the best buttonholers. It would seem an almost childish performance, the kind that brooks no interruption or intermission, but for the fact that Thomas sweetly assumes you to have his own serious concern for the subject. If there is also a theatricality in Thomas's conversation — the body English, the conducting — it is the practical theatricality of the actor, the little things that reinforce spoken ideas. Visual in the extreme is Thomas and not surprisingly, for he is the grandson of the Thomashefskys of Yiddish theatre fame and the son of Ted Thomas, a Hollywood screen writer. Watching Michael Thomas on the podium, music critics have noticed his clear way with the music and so do the musicians under him, though the veterans are likely to follow praise of Thomas with the remark that at 25 he still has a few things to learn.

Miss Miller is on the editorial staff of the Boston Globe.

Clarity is a criterion for music outdoors: Thus, at the chamber orchestra concert on the 17th, Haydn's Symphony No. 98 to begin and Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" Suite to end, and in between, with soprano Bethany Beardslee as soloist, the Bach Cantata No. 51 and for Krenek's 70th birthday, the concert aria "Die Nachtigall." "Radiant, radiant," is how Thomas describes the Krenek.

On the Aug. 8 program: More or less a standard opening of overture (Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter") and concerto (the Third Prokofieff, with pianist Gary Graffman). Thomas mentions his present Russian kick, his reading of the memoirs of the "Russian Five," of whom Rimsky was one and to Thomas's way of thinking the despoiler of Moussorgsky's music (Thomas would like to revive the Moussorgsky "Night on Bald Mountain" — with chorus). Of this Russian opening he says "These are my genes catching up with me." After intermission on the 8th come two Debussy pieces, "Afternoon of a Faun" and "La Mer." He says he has always wanted to do them outdoors. And between them he will insert two or three of the Debussy-orchestrated "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie.

Here reasoning flows back and forth. Practical to do because brief (six minutes), an acknowledgment of the Debussy-Satie friendship, delightful music though not as well known as Thomas would like (though the rock group Blood Sweat and Tears do them) and linked to "Faun" by way of dance. "Faun" was commissioned by Diaghilev for Nijinsky to choreograph and dance (and anything of the Diaghilev era fascinates Thomas), and "Gymnopedies" (Thomas quoting Satie) is a slow, athletic Greek dance of great control and plastique. Upon these words, Thomas was out of his chair and had fastened himself into a slow, very sculptured sequence of the ballet pose known as the "attitude."

Programming, Thomas had said elsewhere in this conversation, "should avoid predictability." Choice of music is one way but even when confined to one composer it can be done. Thomas recalled once starting a program with a Mozart wind serenade and then following it up with a Mozart symphony. "The symphony was for small orchestra but coming after something for a dozen players, I thought it got across what a symphonic concert must have been in Mozart's time — the sensory overkill of its day." Summing up, Thomas said of programming that he supposed the greatest influence on him was the philosophy behind the Monday Evenings, a Los Angeles concert series for which he was a conductor in 1964-1968. "We did new, very new, old, very old, but they all had to be great."

Tanglewood patrons who also go to the Berkshire Music Center concerts may remember this same Michael Tilson Thomas in the late 1960s. In the summer of 1968, he won the Koussevitzky Prize for conducting. In his high school days, music had keen competition from the sciences. His interests then were in mineralogy, crystallography, inorganic and then organic chemistry, and he won prizes at the school science fairs. Bright enough to combine the last two years of high school with the first two years of the University of Southern California, he switched for good to music. As he told another interviewer, "the men of the arts impressed me more than the men of science." He says now he thinks that he has absorbed all the West Coast has to offer, but he made the most of those years. "You cannot imagine the diverse influences on the Coast . . . I would play the piano accompaniment of a Haydn cello concerto for a Gregor Piatigorsky class in the morning, then work on a Haydn symphony in the afternoon with Pierre Boulez — this provides an incredible artistic shock. I got to know Igor Stravinsky and Robert Craft and of course worked with my teachers, Ingolf Dahl and Robert Crown. Crown taught me piano (Thomas is pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players), and Dahl conducting, but Dahl really taught ear training, music history, structural analysis. His is an overwhelming figure."

Seasoned by an appointment as assistant conductor to Boulez at the Beyreuth Festival of 1966 and at California's Ojai Festival in 1967, Thomas had the same title when he joined the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has just been elevated to associate conductor here and has a contract through the 1971-72 season. The new title will give him, he says, more "performing" (conducting) and less "covering" (understudying). But it was as "cover" in the fine old tradition of stage sagas, that Thomas came so far so fast. A flare-up of an infection having struck BSO music director William Steinberg last October at the intermission of a Philharmonic Hall concert, Steinberg told Thomas "to put on your suit . . . I think you're going to conduct." He did, and Steinberg's illness continuing intermittently through the winter, conducted 30 more concerts. Popular with Boston audiences, Thomas is in demand elsewhere as a guest conductor: two dates this summer at the Ravinia Festival, a Mozart Requiem in New York after Tanglewood, winter concerts in Buffalo and Rochester. What was to have been a vacation in late May and early June found Thomas "doing my filling-in thing again" (wry smile) for an ailing conductor and the London Symphony Orchestra. "Beethoven Violin Concerto first half, then all Stravinsky. Three pieces I'd always wanted to do together," he said mentioning the Symphonies for Wind Instruments, the Symphony in C and the Symphony in Three Movements, with the air of one for whom indulgence is sweet and necessary.

Photographs by Warren Fowler

Globe

Michael Tilson Thomas: Wunderkind of the Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas

Spaced-Out Music for the Great Outdoors

Globe

By Margo Miller

LENOX, Mass.

We were talking about his two Tanglewood programs and Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducts the Boston Symphony on Sunday, July 19, and again on Saturday, Aug. 8, was explaining something about music outdoors.

You need a music of great clarity for outdoors, he said, a music whose "harmonies are spaced out." He was saying this, and, at the same time, pantomiming with a good deal of body English what a music of clarity looks like. A conversation with Thomas includes words, of course — great flights of lucid, rapidly spoken sentences, delivered at you with his direct, gray-eyed gaze and sometimes accompanied by a musical interlude of him singing and conducting. You have been buttonholed by one of the best buttonholers. It would seem an almost childish performance, the kind that brooks no interruption or intermission, but for the fact that Thomas sweetly assumes you to have his own serious concern for the subject. If there is also a theatricality in Thomas's conversation — the body English, the conducting — it is the practical theatricality of the actor, the little things that reinforce spoken ideas. Visual in the extreme is Thomas and not surprisingly, for he is the grandson of the Thomashefskys of Yiddish theatre fame and the son of Ted Thomas, a Hollywood screen writer. Watching Michael Thomas on the podium, music critics have noticed his clear way with the music and so do the musicians under him, though the veterans are likely to follow praise of Thomas with the remark that at 25 he still has a few things to learn.

Miss Miller is on the editorial staff of the Boston Globe.

Clarity is a criterion for music outdoors: Thus, at the chamber orchestra concert on the 17th, Haydn's Symphony No. 98 to begin and Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" Suite to end, and in between, with soprano Bethany Beardslee as soloist, the Bach Cantata No. 51 and for Krenek's 70th birthday, the concert aria "Die Nachtigall." "Radiant, radiant," is how Thomas describes the Krenek.

On the Aug. 8 program: More or less a standard opening of overture (Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter") and concerto (the Third Prokofieff, with pianist Gary Graffman). Thomas mentions his present Russian kick, his reading of the memoirs of the "Russian Five," of whom Rimsky was one and to Thomas's way of thinking the despoiler of Moussorgsky's music (Thomas would like to revive the Moussorgsky "Night on Bald Mountain" — with chorus). Of this Russian opening he says "These are my genes catching up with me." After intermission on the 8th come two Debussy pieces, "Afternoon of a Faun" and "La Mer." He says he has always wanted to do them outdoors. And between them he will insert two or three of the Debussy-orchestrated "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie.

Here reasoning flows back and forth. Practical to do because brief (six minutes), an acknowledgment of the Debussy-Satie friendship, delightful music though not as well known as Thomas would like (though the rock group Blood Sweat and Tears do them) and linked to "Faun" by way of dance. "Faun" was commissioned by Diaghilev for Nijinsky to choreograph and dance (and anything of the Diaghilev era fascinates Thomas), and "Gymnopedies" (Thomas quoting Satie) is a slow, athletic Greek dance of great control and plastique. Upon these words, Thomas was out of his chair and had fastened himself into a slow, very sculptured sequence of the ballet pose known as the "attitude."

Programming, Thomas had said elsewhere in this conversation, "should avoid predictability." Choice of music is one way but even when confined to one composer it can be done. Thomas recalled once starting a program with a Mozart wind serenade and then following it up with a Mozart symphony. "The symphony was for small orchestra but coming after something for a dozen players, I thought it got across what a symphonic concert must have been in Mozart's time — the sensory overkill of its day." Summing up, Thomas said of programming that he supposed the greatest influence on him was the philosophy behind the Monday Evenings, a Los Angeles concert series for which he was a conductor in 1964-1968. "We did new, very new, old, very old, but they all had to be great."

Tanglewood patrons who also go to the Berkshire Music Center concerts may remember this same Michael Tilson Thomas in the late 1960s. In the summer of 1968, he won the Koussevitzky Prize for conducting. In his high school days, music had keen competition from the sciences. His interests then were in mineralogy, crystallography, inorganic and then organic chemistry, and he won prizes at the school science fairs. Bright enough to combine the last two years of high school with the first two years of the University of Southern California, he switched for good to music. As he told another interviewer, "the men of the arts impressed me more than the men of science." He says now he thinks that he has absorbed all the West Coast has to offer, but he made the most of those years. "You cannot imagine the diverse influences on the Coast . . . I would play the piano accompaniment of a Haydn cello concerto for a Gregor Piatigorsky class in the morning, then work on a Haydn symphony in the afternoon with Pierre Boulez — this provides an incredible artistic shock. I got to know Igor Stravinsky and Robert Craft and of course worked with my teachers, Ingolf Dahl and Robert Crown. Crown taught me piano (Thomas is pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players), and Dahl conducting, but Dahl really taught ear training, music history, structural analysis. His is an overwhelming figure."

Seasoned by an appointment as assistant conductor to Boulez at the Beyreuth Festival of 1966 and at California's Ojai Festival in 1967, Thomas had the same title when he joined the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has just been elevated to associate conductor here and has a contract through the 1971-72 season. The new title will give him, he says, more "performing" (conducting) and less "covering" (understudying). But it was as "cover" in the fine old tradition of stage sagas, that Thomas came so far so fast. A flare-up of an infection having struck BSO music director William Steinberg last October at the intermission of a Philharmonic Hall concert, Steinberg told Thomas "to put on your suit . . . i think you're going to conduct." He did, and Steinberg's illness continuing intermittently through the winter, conducted 30 more concerts. Popular with Boston audiences, Thomas is in demand elsewhere as a guest conductor: two dates this summer at the Ravinia Festival, a Mozart Requiem in New York after Tanglewood, winter concerts in Buffalo and Rochester. What was to have been a vacation in late May and early June found Thomas "doing my filling-in thing again" (wry smile) for an ailing conductor and the London Symphony Orchestra. "Beethoven Violin Concerto first half, then all Stravinsky. Three pieces I'd always wanted to do together," he said mentioning the Symphonies for Wind Instruments, the Symphony in C and the Symphony in Three Movements, with the air of one for whom indulgence is sweet and necessary.

Photographs by Warren Fowler

Globe

Michael Tilson Thomas: Wunderkind of the Boston Symphony

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Whitestone Photo

Lili Kraus with Seiji Ozawa, conductor, at Tanglewood

Applause from four continents

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Lili Kraus is one of those extraordinary people to whom nothing inconsequential ever seems to happen. A pianist, Hungarian-born, and revered on four continents, she has played at wedding festivities for the Shah of Iran; in the first program ever of secular music heard in England's Canterbury Cathedral; in the inaugural concert arranged for Brazil's pristine new capital, Brasília; in ornate Moroccan palaces, and with the late Dr. Albert Schweitzer as audience in the bare mess hall of his hospital in French Equatorial Africa (now Gabon). On the darker side, she spent three years (one of them at hard labor) in Japanese concentration camps in Java during World War II, a test of the inner self as unremitting as it was unexpected.

Chatting with Mme Kraus (as she is called by everyone) while she rocked in a comfortable wicker chair on a wide, shaded hotel veranda near Tanglewood — she returned to the Boston Symphony there in July — one wondered where to begin to probe such an unusual career.

The smiling, healthy-complexioned woman in a smart white pant-suit, hair piled high, unostentatious but richly handsome earrings of clusters of small green dangling stones, and a ring or two of subdued heirloom quality, was very much the unquenchably reassured star performer. She told of a full schedule of television appearances and radio interviews in New York, wondered how anyone could be a music critic, admitted to enjoying interviews (careful, she's about to interview you), and quite sincerely said the right things in praise of the lush green countryside in which she was a first-time guest.

Time to break the summer Berkshire ice. Would she consider it rude to be asked, not about her triumphs and honors, but about those dark days when her younger career was seemingly destroyed, her family—husband and two children—taken from her, and her daily diet a form of primitive slavery?

Mme Kraus, surprisingly, laughed rather whimsically. "I never think of it any more," she said. "So long ago — it was another Lili Kraus. So much has happened since then. . . ." But her eyes and her expression told that she was slipping back to those days.

Once she and her late husband, Dr. Otto Mandl, a professor of philosophy, had made a world tour without their two young children, and missed them so that they vowed never to be away from them so long again. So, when a concert tour of the East Indies was proposed, the family went together. They took a house in Bandung, where it was cooler, and Mme Kraus planned to move out to her recitals from the Javanese capital, Batavia.

It was 1940, and despite general disbelief, the Japanese did move in. As a British citizen, Mme Kraus—along with the American wife of the Dutch governor of the island, and a French woman—was seized on a false conspiracy charge, imprisoned without recourse in a small subterranean cell with 12 other women, and without knowing the fate of her husband and children, consigned to hard labor.

The fanatic tensions of the time, her husband's futile efforts to serve in her stead, the extremes to which one human's treatment of another were carried are still unfathomable parts of the story. Caught in this trap, Mme Kraus admits to realizing two choices—to allow herself to be broken by the circumstances, or to survive on the basic ingredients of her musical training, her discipline, sensitivity, and toughness. Of the two, she chose the latter.

"I am one who dreams all the time—fantastic dreams," said Mme Kraus. "But the whole time I was there, I never dreamed once about my husband or my children. The other women use to say 'Why are you so cheerful? You never tell us about your family' 'No,' I reply, "I don't.' And that was all. I had put them away in my subconscious mind, where we could be together in spirit, safe from my fears and uncertainties for them. Instead, I concentrated on the work I had to do. And as I worked, I played music in my mind. Although there was a piano in the prison office, I had no access to it, of course."

"Work" varied every fortnight. "The other women would say 'Let us do it, you must save your hands,' but as it turned out I was the only one who finally would reach into the street gutters and take out the filth with my hands to unclog the drains. It had to be done. It took strong inner reasoning, I must say, but I was not in a position to argue. After all, hands can be washed. The next week, I'd carry patients and their bedding on my back in the hospital. I weighed less than 100 pounds by then, but thanks to the Lord's mercy and to music — and they are the same — I was able to do this and more and come out alive."

The rest of the story reads like a wildly unrealistic film script. Being summoned by the prison commandant to be told that the charge under which she had been imprisoned had been found to be false; that she would join her husband and children in a family detention camp (where they spent two more years); that she had learned to believe nothing that she was told by her captors.

Little by little, it came true. "How is the piano?" the Japanese interpreter asked who had committed her and was on hand before she was released. "Have you been playing?" Mme Kraus, in the remnants of the dress she was wearing when she was seized a year before, plus some torn pajama pants, gazed at him speechless. "There's a piano here, come in and play."

"Do I remember what I played?" she exclaimed in an exuberant crescendo. "The 'Wanderer Fantasy,' some Mozart, of course. . . . Then I was put on an army truck, with an armed guard—all 90 pounds of me—and yes, there was a bag of cement, and I was taken to another part of the partitioned city. There were bananas on a table in the house where I was delivered. They couldn't believe that I hadn't seen one or eaten anything but a cup of rice a day for a year."

When freedom finally came, Mme Kraus found that manual labor had made her fingers unusually strong, but without suppleness or sensitivity of touch. It meant a long road back, of practice and conditioning, and recouping not only her broken career but shattered family fortunes. Soon she was playing in Australia and New Zealand, and for her "unrelenting efforts" in the postwar era, she was granted honorary citizenship by the latter country.

Mme Kraus — the "now" Lili Kraus — is back on the concert stages of the world, with an enhanced reputation on four continents. She tours ceaselessly. "Next year I am playing from September 29 to May 20 in the United States, with four weeks abroad. I tell myself, only three years more. Besides, my son-in-law, Dr. Fergus Pope, and I are partners in a 700-acre farm in the mountains of North Carolina. He is the only obstetrician in four counties. There is to be a center for communal planning and vocational guidance, and a clinic for retarded children. Around my house I am building a center for music — 'Music in the Mountains' — where those people who have never had anything like that before, can come to hear and to perform. If one has a gift, one must develop the generosity to share it."

In retrospect, it seemed like a heartless thing to have done, on a shining Berkshire afternoon, to dig into a nightmarish past, particularly when there were so many more dazzling aspects of this second independently triumphant career to explore.

Perhaps it was the serenity of the time and place, and the fact that Mme Kraus had had a day or two away from a grinding schedule. But she still had a few more things to say about that unthinkable year: "I became convinced," she said, "that whatever happened . . . I was a vessel through which God was speaking.

"I tell you," said this handsome woman who has thrilled countless thousands with the keyboard touch of the same fingers that dredged filthy gutters in Batavia, "It was an invaluable experience."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 14 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Tries New Ways To Make Money on Classics

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — A year ago, Tanglewood was suffering from a number of headaches common to summer music festivals: such as rain, rising costs, the drifting away of audiences to other projects or types of music.

Some of those were "acts of God" and could not be controlled; others were trends on the part of people, and nearly as hard to regulate. But Tanglewood is still trying.

Meanwhile the newcomers, Blossom Music Cinter in Ohio (Cleveland Orchestra) and Saratoga Performing Arts Center (Philadelphia Orchestra) as well as Meadow Brook in Michigan (Detroit Symphony) have not been immune. They have all found it hard to make money on classical orchestral concerts.

"Trends" Concert

Tanglewood last year used five "Contemporary Trends" events to attract young crowds, and brought back Arthur Feidler and the Boston "Pops" for two added concerts at the season's end. This year three "Trends" concerts and the one usual "Pops" betoken a return to 1968 proportionings.

Last Tuesday's first "Trends" Concert, under the sponsorship of "Fillmore at Tanglewood," shattered attendance records when 18,784 paid from $4 up to get in. Another 6,000 are thought to have gained access by more devious routes.

One may question: If summer festivals do not make money, why have them? Even ignoring educational projects caried on during festival seasons, there still is a vital reason. All the larger symphony orchestras have been pushed in recent seasons by the players' unions, to provide virtually 52 weeks per year of performances and paid vacations.

Seiji Ozawa

Some Alternative

The hard alternative (a shorter season) would have the effect of establishing completely fantastic rates per perfomance for the formal winter and spring season, rates which could bankrupt the orchestras' basic years.

Talcott M. Banks of the BSO directorate recently attributed ⅓ of Boston's latest annual deficit to its activities at Tanglewood. But let Tanglewood cease operations, and few would dare guess how the total Boston deficit would soar, since BSO musicians would still demand a certain minimum annual income, assured by their contract.

Boston devoted great effort in April to a ball which netted $132,000 to help reduce the deficit. Much remains to be done.

New Image

Tanglewood has not run out of ideas. It is creating a new image. The ugly, hard old seats of the music shed are gone; new roomier ones are arranged more attractively.

Also, the time-honored system of conductorship went overboard when Erich Leinsdorf left.

William Steinberg, interim BSO conductor, plagued by illnesses, conducts only four of the six Beethoven commemorative programs in 1970. The others will be led by Antal Dovati and Max Rudolf. Of the 18 remaining concerts, Seiji Ozawa, young Japanese artistic director at Tanglewood, gets eight; associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas two; and co-director Gunther Schuller, advisor Leonard Bernstein and six guest conductors, one concert each.

In 1969, 15 of the 24 major concerts were conducted by Leinsdorf and nine by others.

Attracting Youngsters

It would seem that the new scheme would attract more people. The 1970 programs at Tanglewood also demonstrate a greater readiness to offer some of the "very new" along with the "tried and true old," probably as the result of the Schuller-Ozawa influence.

It is a questionable move for attracting people of middle age, but it is an essential gesture to youth and to contemporary composers.

The management boasts that its 1970 repertory ranges from Haydn, Mozart and The Bachs to Ligeti, Krenek, Lutoslawski and Xenakis.

Lots of Soloists

Tanglewood might boast with equal pride that its many 19th century romanticists are elbowed in programs by such greats as Mahler and "easy-to-take" 20th century composers.

BLANK PAGE

175

Talk to Area Businessmen

Tanglewood Said 'In Peril' Unless Annual Gifts Upped

Berkshire County businessmen were advised here yesterday that unless area businesses substantially increase their annual giving to Tanglewood, the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer program is "very much in peril."

Talcott Banks of Boston, chairman of the BSO's board of trustees, said the operations at Tanglewood in the summer account for about one-third of the BSO's annual deficit of $1.5 million. He said the summer festival costs about $1 million to produce and ticket sales yield only about $500,000; that while there is income from endowments, the BSO has had to dip into capital reserves to keep going.

Yesterday's kickoff luncheon of the business committee of the Council of Tanglewood Friends was held at the Country Club of Pittsfield. Accompanying Banks for the talk to the businessmen were David Rockefeller Jr., BSO's development coordinator, and Robert Corcoran of the BSO business staff.

$27,500 Sought

Businessmen were advised that they are expected to give $27,500 this year—$7,500 more than was contributed last year when the annual giving program was launched—if the BSO's over-all 1972 goal of $700,000 is to be met, and if the summer operation is to be continued. It was noted that both the Cleveland and Chicago symphony orchestras "do not foresee" summer festivals in 1971.

A brochure distributed at the luncheon estimates that Tanglewood generates more than $5-million in tourist business for the Berkshires. It estimates that 85 per cent of the audiences at Tanglewood come into the Berkshires from outside the area and contribute substantially to sales in stores, motels and restaurants. It notes, too, that more than 40 members of the BSO have either bought or built homes in the Berkshires.

Among those attending the luncheon were Robert S. Alsop, Arthur R. Birchard Jr., Russell Bolduc, Samuel Boxer, John H. Brooks, Ernest H. Brundage, Curtis Buttenheim, Thomas R. Carrington, John T. English, John H. Fitzpatrick, John V. Geary, Roger G. Gendreau, James C. Hart, chairman of the county business committee, Joseph T. Kelley, James F. Kiley, E. Stewart Morrison, Mrs. Richard G. Osborne, James R. Sloane and Donald A. Thurston.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Fete In Dire Straits

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI)—The world famous Tanglewood Music Festival may be forced to close unless local businessmen can raise $27,000.

Talcott Bank, head of trustees for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which operates the festival held annually in near by Lenox, told a meeting of local business officials Thursday that summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. He said the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,725 (S) 208,348

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Annual Tanglewood Music Festival Facing Problems

Pittsfield, Mass. — (AP) — The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees yesterday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1 million projected cost of the festival.

The request is $7,500 more than the businessmen donated last year.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK POST
Friday, April 24, 1970

Tanglewood Faces Financial Trouble

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, Tuesday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1-million projected cost of the festival.

The request is $7,500 more than the businessmen donated last year.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

MAY 1 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, has asked businessmen in Berkshires to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1 million projected cost of the festival.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

APR 24 1970

Tanglewood Music Festival May Be Discontinued

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) —The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, yesterday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27-500 this year toward the $1-million projected cost of the festival.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

Tanglewood Music Festival May Be Discontinued

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) —The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, yesterday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27-500 this year toward the $1-million projected cost of the festival.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 568,377

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood fest seeking $27,500

PITTSFIELD — The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued unless local businessmen raise $27,500, the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said yesterday.

Talcott Banks said at a meeting of businessmen in the Berkshire area they must donate the $27,500 toward the $1 million projected cost of the festival, an amount $7500 more than the businessmen donated last year.

He noted summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood faced the same prospect.

Banks said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants.

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Festival In Bay State Faces Shutdown

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI) — The head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said Thursday the annual Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox would be forced to close unless local businessmen raise $27,000.

Talcot Bank, in a meeting with local business officials, noted summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shutdown because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood, operated each summer by the Boston Symphony, faced the same prospect.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK POST
Friday, April 24, 1970

Tanglewood Music Festival May Be Discontinued

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) —The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, yesterday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27-500 this year toward the $1-million projected cost of the festival.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood May Be Cancelled

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may have to shut down its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the BSO's trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit in 1969.

Banks has asked Berkshire merchants to increase their annual donations by $7500 this year, to a total of $27,000

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of t he festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN 3,221,849

APR 29 1970

Tanglewood In Trouble

The Tanglewood Music Festival, annual summer season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in jeopardy because of lack of funds. Talcott Banks, chairman of the symphony's trustees, said the festival near Pittsfield, Mass., would have to be discontinued if increased donations are not received to meet the $1 million cost. Banks said he has asked businessmen in the Berkshires area home of the festival, to increase their yearly contributions.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382

MAY 1 1970

Lack of Funds Threatening Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI)—The famous Tanglewood Music Festival may be forced to close unless local businessmen can raise $27,000.

Talcott Bank, head of trustees for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which operates the festival held annually in near-by Lenox, told business officials that summer festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of money. Tanglewood faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. He said the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

176

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Saturday, April 25, 1970

Tanglewood In Trouble

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The annual Tanglewood Music Festival may be discontinued if donations are not increased.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, has asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1-million projected cost of the festival.

The request is $7,500 more than the businessmen donated last year.

Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's defiiit last year.

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
(E) 19,775

APR 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Festival Is Shy of Funds

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI)— The world famous Tanglewood Music Festival may be forced to close unless local businessmen can raise $27,000.

Talcott Bank, head of trustees for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which operates the festival held annually in nearby Lenox, told a meeting of local business officials that summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. He said the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES
D. 8,500

APR 27 1970

Help Needed

First it was the Lake George Opera Festival. Its 1969 season was a success, artistically, but financially it was not. Its officers did a lot of soul searching before deciding to continue performances this summer, but, happily, they went ahead. An appeal for funds helped although it fell short of what was needed. Its schedule of performances is a promising one and should get an enthusiastic response.

Then it was the Glens Falls Concert Association. An old and established institution in the city, it simply did not have a sufficient financial outlook for next season so it decided to take a sabbatical in the hope, and expectation, that the series, so long an ornament to the city and a boon to music lovers in the whole area, could be resumed in 1971-72. Meanwhile, it has appealed to the public for volunteers to help it build up membership and finances. Those who love, and can hardly live without, good music now have an opportunity to lend a hand to a good cause. It is hoped that the association can again be the esthetic and cultural instrument it always has been.

Word also comes that the Tanglewood Music Festival is in trouble. The Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees have asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1 million estimated cost of the festival, or $7,500 more than they gave last year. If donations are not increased the Festival may be discontinued. It accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

There are few enough musical attractions of high caliber. To lose these would be tragic.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Lenox Festival May Close

PITTSFIELD, (UPI) — The head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said yesterday the annual Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox would be forced to close unless local businessmen raise $27,000.

Talcot Bank, in a meeting with local business officials, noted summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood, operated each summer by the Boston Symphony, faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. In turn, he said, the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,00

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Large Deficit May Spell End Of Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to close its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the B.S.O.'s trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit last year.

Banks Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshires to increase their annual donations by $7,500 this year, for a total of $27,000.

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of the festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

EXPRESS
NEWPORT, VERMONT
(E) 4,280

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony May Close Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to close its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the B.S.O.'s trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit last year.

Banks Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshires to increase their annual donations by $7,500 this year, for a total of $27,000.

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of the festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 209,240

MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Future After '70 Jeopardized

Lenox, Mass. — (UPI) — This summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances, the sponsoring Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday.

The orchestra made the announcement to clear up confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the summer program.

A spokesman for the trustees said earlier that if the summer program was to continue, local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

APR 24 1970 New England News

Tanglewood Has Money Problem

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI)— The world famous Tanglewood Music Festival may be forced to close unless local businessmen can raise $27,000.

Talcott Bank, head of trustees for the Boston Symphony Orchestra which operates the festival held annually in nearby Lenox, told a meeting of local business officials Thursday that summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. He said the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT
(E) 8,700

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE

MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Series May End This Year

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — This summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances, the sponsoring Boston Symphony Orchestra said Monday.

The orchestra made the announcement to clear up confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the summer program.

A spokesman for the trustees said earlier that if the summer program was to continue, local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

Tanglewood Festival May Close Down

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to close its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the B.S.O.'s trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit last year.

Banks Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshires to increase their annual donations by $7,500 this year, for a total of $27,000.

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of the festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

BIDDEFORD-SACO JOURNAL
BIDDEFORD, MAINE
(E) 9,068

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Festival May Be Forced To Close

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP — The Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to close its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the B.S.O.'s trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit last year.

Banks Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshires to increase their annual donations by $7,500 this year, for a total of $27,000.

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of the festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

May Be Forced To Close Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra may be forced to close its annual Tanglewood Music Festival for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the B.S.O.'s trustees, said Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Symphony's deficit last year.

Banks Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshires to increase their annual donations by $7,500 this year, for a total of $27,000.

Without increased donations to meet the $1 million cost of the festival, he said, it may have to be discontinued.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 152,525

MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Fund Lack Dims Concert Future

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — This summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances, the sponsoring Boston Symphony Orchestra said Monday.

The orchestra made the announcement to clear up confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the summer program.

A spokesman for the trustees said earlier that if the summer program was to continue, local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD STILL ON

BOSTON (UPI)—Boston Symphony Orchestra officials denied Friday reports the Tanglewood Festival would not open this summer. "The upcoming summer season will definitely take place," an official said.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

MAY 21 1970 New England Newsclip

From the Wings

By FRANCINE TREVENS

Despite announced financial difficulties, the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated positively that the summer season at Tanglewood, the season's summer home, would definitely take place. There will be 24 Tanglewood concerts and the Berkshire Music Center School will operate. Good news for all who have come to take Tanglewood for granted. It would be good news for the orchestra if they could raise the $27,500 they need, too.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUR.
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Lockport Union Sun & Journal
Saturday, May 2, 1970

Berkshire Festival Schedule Carries

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUR.
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK POST
Thursday, May 14, 1970

Tanglewood Fete On

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the summer season at Tanglewood will take place, despite a recent report that the festival would be off unless Tanglewood area businessmen could raise $27,500.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Festival Still Set for Summer

BOSTON (AP)—The annual Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox in the Berkshires will take place as scheduled this summer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra says.

An orchestra spokesman said the announcement was made Friday because of published reports that financial problems might force the festival to close.

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Festival Faces Money Trouble

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI) — The head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said Thursday the annual Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox would be forced to close unless local businessmen raise $27,000.

Talcot Bank, in a meeting with local business officials, noted summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood, operated each summer by the Boston Symphony, faced the same prospect.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. In turn, he said, the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshires by raising $27,000.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood on, BSO announces

United Press International

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra says this Summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances.

The orchestra made the announcement yesterday to clear up what it said was confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the Summer program.

At that time, a spokesman for the trustees said if the Summer program was to continue local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
(E) 19,775

MAY 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Festival On At Tanglewood

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated today that the upcoming summer season at Tanglewood, BSO summer home, will definitely take place. A wire service report had indicated earlier that unless Tanglewood-area businessmen quickly raise $27,500 this summer's festival was off. The erroneous report stemmed from an incorrect account of a speech delivered to Berkshire Hills businessmen by Talcott M. Banks, BSO Trustee President.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Chairman for election of officers.

TANGLEWOOD STILL ON

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Symphony Orchestra officials denied Friday reports the Tanglewood Festival would not open this summer. "The upcoming summer season will definitely take place," an official said.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood not closing

Boston

A spokesman for the Boston Symphony Orchestra denied that its annual Tanglewood Music Festival was in imminent danger of closing for lack of funds.

Talcott Banks, chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, Thursday asked businessmen in the Berkshire area to donate $27,500 this year toward the $1 million projected cost of the festival.

The request is $7,500 more than the businessmen donated last year.

Mr. Banks noted that Tanglewood accounted for one-third of the Boston Symphony's deficit last year.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350

APR 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Has Money Woes

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (UPI) — The head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said Thursday the annual Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox would be forced to close unless local businessmen raise $27,000.

Talcot Bank, in a meeting with local business officials, noted summer music festivals in Chicago and Cleveland were scheduled to shut down because of a lack of funds and Tanglewood, operated each summer by the Boston Symphony, faced the same prospects.

Bank said the festival, which normally starts in late May or early June, attracts large numbers of tourists to the region to the benefit of local merchants. In turn, he said, the merchants should help try to keep the festival in the Berkshire by raising $27,000.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood on, BSO announces

United Press International

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra says this Summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances.

The orchestra made the announcement yesterday to clear up what it said was confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the Summer program.

At that time, a spokesman for the trustees said if the Summer program was to continue local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

New York Post
D. 703,180 SAT. 369,902

MAY 14 1970 Byfield

Tanglewood Fete On

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the summer season at Tanglewood will take place, despite a recent report that the festival would be off unless Tanglewood area businessmen could raise $27,500.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Festival On As Scheduled At Tanglewood

BOSTON (AP)—The annual Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox in the Berkshires will take place as scheduled this summer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra says.

An orchestra spokesman said the announcement was made Friday because of published reports that financial problems might force the festival to close.

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD STILL ON

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Symphony Orchestra officials denied Friday reports the Tanglewood Festival would not open this summer. "The upcoming summer season will definitely take place," an official said.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

MAY 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood cancellation called 'erroneous'

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra terms "erroneous" a wire service report last month that the upcoming summer season at Tanglewood would be cancelled unless Tanglewood-area businessmen quickly raised $27,500 to help defray expenses.

A report that the orchestra's summer program was "very much in peril" is said to stem from an incorrect account of a speech delivered April 22 to Berkshire Hills businessmen by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

Bank's speech referred to the well known financial problems of American symphony orchestras, which he said the Boston Symphony shares.

Businessmen were advised that they were expected to give $27,500 this year — $7,500 more than was contributed last year.

Banks said that the Berkshire Music Festival (and presumably a portion of the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony) accounts for about one-third of the orchestra's annual deficit of $1.5 million.

The Tanglewood season of eight weeks costs about $1-million, only half of which is realized in ticket sales. There is income from the orchestra's endowment fund but it has been necessary to use capital reserves.

Banks referred to long-term jeopardy of all such summer festivals.

The orchestra's management stated that the Banks discussion dealt with the outlook over the next several years and did not in any way imply that Tanglewood might be cancelled this summer.

There will be 24 regular concerts in the Berkshire Music Festival, from July 3 through August 23.

Concerts will be Friday nights at 9 p.m. (with a Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. for early-comers), Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m.

This summer's opening weekends will not be devoted to baroque music played by a reduced orchestra.

New Music Director

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's new music director, will conduct the opening concert on July 3 with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" for chorus and orchestra, Ligeti's "Atmospheres," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist for the Saturday, July 4, program in Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D. Balance of the program is Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, and Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Linz" Symphony.

Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood, will close the first weekend, July 5, with Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection," with the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Boston Symphony.

Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will not conduct at Tanglewood this summer as previously announced. Ormandy is undergoing surgery this summer which will keep him from his own Saratoga Performing Arts appearances until the final weekend, late in August.

Other Conductors

Other Tanglewood conductors this summer are William Steinberg, Aaron Copland, and Arthur Fiedler, Gunther Schuller, Fruhbeck de Burgos, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Piano soloist are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yugi Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

The violinists are Silverstein, Ishtak Perlman, and Paul Zukowsky, who recently gave a recital at Alden Hall, under the joint auspices of the Worcester Art Museum and Worcester Polytechnic Institute. Cello soloist will be Jules Eskin of the Boston Symphony.

Singers are John Alexander, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Loma Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau and Teresa Stratas.

Beethoven Concerts

Two weekends of Beethoven concerts will be conducted by Steinberg to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

They are July 31-Aug. 2, and Aug. 14-16. The five piano concertos will be played by Frank, Watts, Ashkenazy, Firkusny and Lowenthal. In addition will be Beethoven's Triple Concerto, overtures and symphonies, including the ninth on August 16.

Other highlights are the Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Ozawa to close the festival on Aug. 23, and Ozawa conducting a concert staging of Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte," July 11.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO to conduct annual festival in Berkshires

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the Orchestra's press office.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Saturday, May 2, 1970

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

785

TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL

Boston — (AP) — The annual Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox in the Berkshires will take place as scheduled this summer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra says. An orchestra spokesman said the announcement was made Friday to counteract published reports that financial problems might force the festival to close.

Tanglewood open

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Saturday, May 2, 1970

Tanglewood Event Set This Summer

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
AUBURN CITIZEN ADVERTISER
Saturday, May 2, 1970

Tanglewood to Bloom

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520 (S) 14,727

MAY 3 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD STILL ON

BOSTON (UPI)—Boston Symphony Orchestra officials denied Friday reports the Tanglewood Festival would not open this summer. "The upcoming summer season will definitely take place," an official said.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034

MAY 2 1970 New England Newsclip

785

Tanglewood Still On

BOSTON (UPI)—Boston Symphony Orchestra officials denied Friday reports the Tanglewood Festival would not open this summer. "The upcoming summer season will definitely take place," an official said

music

SUMMER HIGHLIGHTS

It didn't seem to be a summer of musical discontent in New York. The Philharmonic, the Metropolitan Opera, and other, less famous organizations brought free music to large and small parks. Filmed operas drew big audiences to Philharmonic Hall, which also housed a Mozart-Haydn-Schubert festival, some jazz from Preservation Hall, New Orleans, and a show-bizzy debut "recital" by Ivan Rebroff.

Beyond city and state borders, but accessible with varying degrees of difficulty, thanks to the invention of the wheel were the exalted Marlboro in Vermont, the famous Tanglewood in the Berkshires, and the intimate Caramoor in Upper Westchester. Add to these summer music festivals a relative newcomer at Waterloo Village, a pleasantly and not overpoweringly restored Colonial settlement complete with gardens, brooks, ponds, frame houses, and an acoustically decent concert tent in which no less than Pablo Casals has been pleased to conduct these past two summers en route from San Juan to Marlboro.

One of the highest of the summer highlights surely was Don Pablo, at the age of 93, up there on the podium and amidst a crackling wind that threatened to bring the tent down on all our heads, rehearsing in the afternoon and presenting to the public that June night a conception of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony contrasting fury with grace in the first three movements and driving the finale at maximum pressure on the principal voice in the moment's counterpoint without ever pulling apart the over-all structural complex. Whenever that balance between form and content is achieved in that kind of music, the flame of genius burns up planets.

It's been obvious for more than a few years now that Alexander Schneider practices the Casals doctrine of keeping music, musicians, and audiences awake. Schneider is the inexhaustible live wire on a circuit of musical electricity that has stretched from Prades to Marlboro, or from Casals to Rudolf Serkin. It was evident certainly in so many of those New School concerts in winters past, and emphatically last December in Carnegie Hall, with Schneider leading a crash-coached group of string students in some of the most breathtaking Bach I had ever heard. (Mr. Schneider looks forward to more of this next December.) The live wire was also working at the Waterloo Village concert to accompany Mieczyslaw Horszowski's performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, a performance lacking a little in keyboard glitter and dash but extremely sensitive to the way phrases should begin, soar, and close.

About Marlboro I can give no report. Hoping to get there one summer or other, I can only relay the reaction of a usually blase acquaintance, to wit: "Go—even if you have to walk all the way."

Tanglewood, which used to prosper so mightily by reducing the 50-Pieces formula once propounded by Virgil Thomson down to 35, has been saving its soul these last few years by presenting, with the help of the Fromm Foundation, a week of up-to-the-minute contemporary music. As fate would have it, I missed the Fromm week this year and only got up to the Berkshires for Mahler's Second Symphony, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Christa Ludwig, Lorna Haywood, and an army of choristers all conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Despite my extreme-side seat location, at which some of the work's biggest effects seemed noticeably dampened, this was a performance with tremendous tension and long-breathed song. If Miss Ludwig sang the "Urlicht" movement with nothing like the transfixing, childlike intensity Jennie Tourel once brought to it on the very same stage, she sang it gorgeously none the less. And as for the Bernstein manner with the earth-shaking finale, he once more made it evident that, if you've heard one apocalypse, you haven't necessarily heard them all.

music

Continued from page 36

A good deal closer to New York City is Caramoor, and if the Rosen estate where this all-outdoor festival takes place was hit very hard by some raw weather this summer, compensation was at hand in the thoroughly unhackneyed programming by the musical director, Julius Rudel. A couple of the concerts were discussed some weeks ago in this column, but I wouldn't want to let more time go by without talking about Mr. Rudel's big-scaled revival of Mozart's "Idomeneo," the American premiere of Malcolm Williamson's opera, "The Growing Castle," and one particularly outstanding concert.

The "Idomeneo" was sung and played grandly and heroically, for the most part. As it happened, any strivings for orchestral delicacy, and there are golden opportunities for it, had to be abandoned in any case; the evening's rain was somewhat too steady. Tenor George Shirley, in the title role, charged gallantly and successfully through "Furo del mar," and Bianca Sauler, Maralin Niska, John Stewart, and Richard Stilwell handled their abridged roles competently. This despite Tito Capobianco's absolutely frilly and silly staging, which sourrounded every principal with his or her own little corps de ballet and spread asunder as far as possible those whom music and libretto had joined together. And no hint of a sea monster, although Bruce Harrow's luxuriantly feathered costumes were a treat.

Mr. Williamson's libretto for his opera skillfully condenses Strindberg's "A Dream Play," but the music lacks the power to make the opera exist on its own terms. It's true that the music in Kristina's "pasting" scene trips along engagingly, especially as sung by Nancy Williams, but the rest of the score, for all its staying on the conservative side of modernism, traces frail excuses for singing, except near the end, when goddess and poet part and a comfortable evocation of Richard Strauss takes over. The composer, behind the scenes, played a number of percussion and keyboard instruments, and the cast was made up of Clarice Carson, a bit too external and vocally stiff, as the goddess, and Miss Williams, the ever dependable William Metcalf, and the extremely promising Brent Ellis taking several roles each.

Mr. Rudel's final concert of the festival was as varied an assortment of Viennese music as you might ever encounter in one evening, except that something from the Schoenberg school might also have been included. But how often on a summer's night do you get, in one sitting, Maureen Forrester's rich contralto encompassing the grandeur of the Brahms "Alto Rhapsody" and following it up with three of Mahler's "Wunderhorn" songs, an excellent male chorus in two Schubert songs, Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture, Haydn's 95th Symphony, and a couple of Johann Strauss polkas? Almost everything was stylistically right, except for the fact that Miss Forrester hit Mahler's "Rhine Legend" with a little too much beer-hall bounce. But she more than made up for that with her sumptuously vocalized and powerfully acted account of the same composer's "Where the Beautiful Trumpets Blow."

—Leighton Kerner

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

DESPITE the economic squeeze, cultural events in Berkshire County didn't come off too badly this summer. Tanglewood, of course, was the keystone, and its draw of 257,419 patrons, up 20,482 from the year before, contributed to the fallout patronage of all the other events.

Attendance at the 24 regular Boston Symphony concerts was 186,190, up about 11,000 from the year before, but nowhere near the record of 213,000 set in 1963. The big boost this year came from the 51,459 people who attended the three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood Contemporary Trends concerts, and although this is good in its way, it has nothing to do with Tanglewood or what it basically stands for. The big draws for the classical season were the Beethoven weekends, and this, despite the howls of the avant-garde howlers, is what Tanglewood really stands for.

* * *

SUMMER THEATRE attendance was down in both ends of the county, Williamstown drawing about 70 per cent capacity, down about 10 per cent from the year before, and the Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge doing about 60 per cent of capacity, down some 15 per cent from the year before.

The BTF went through an internal upheaval just before the season started. William Gibson, president of the BTF, decided that the schedule set up by executive producer Lynn Austin was not within the goals of his faction, which was to present "original, American plays." Miss Austin resigned and Arthur Penn, who had been serving as artistic director for the past three years, stepped down. The Gibson group seems quite happy with the new direction of their theatre, and Miss Austin has taken steps to establish a group on the grounds of Music Inn next summer which will represent her approach to contemporary theatre. It could be that next summer we will have a most active third force in summer theatre around here. Meanwhile, the BTF is tentatively planning to present at least four "workshop" productions in Stockbridge during the fall and winter.

* * *

JACOB'S PILLOW reports that its attendance ended up just about the same as last year despite the tight situation. The Pillow presented 65 performances (4 more than ever before), including three world premieres. The big breakthrough sartorially was the dropping of tutus for form-revealing tights, which could stir new interest from a whole new group.

The movie business was spotty during the summer, with M*A*S*H the surprise hit of the season. The "nudie" movies did not fare as well as some people might expect. They did a respectable (I write some pretty subtle stuff, don't I?) amount of business, but nothing to make the theatres offer sex as a steady diet.

* * *

RESTAURANT BUSINESS in the county held up fairly well in comparison to last year, some of the restaurants showing a slight increase. Which goes to prove that the stomach is a cultural attraction that never loses its savor, and also that the restaurants around here give a pretty good show for the money.

The rock and folk concerts at Music Inn had ups and downs depending on the attraction and the weather, the smashing successes balanced off by the few dismal events, but when it comes to Nature and show biz, there's no telling if it's going to rain or pour.

Over the river, Saratoga had a pretty good year, especially in its ballet, which jumped some 50 per cent over the previous year. Their contemporary trends concerts consisted of anybody and everything, from the stars of "Hee Haw" to the Kitchen Sink (a rock group?).

All in all, it was a lively summer, and, all in all, it's a Lively World.

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, OHIO
D. 175,468 SUN. 203,118
AUG 30 1970

Fine Arts Report

by Theodore Price

MORE STATISTICS?

Tanglewood, the inland Summer home of the Boston Orchestra closed its 1970 season last week with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last year, according to New York Times critic Donal Henahan.

Total attendance for the 8-week festival, reports Henahan was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969. Twenty-four symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190, against 1969's 175,468.

Three rock concerts brought 51,459 through the Tanglewood turnstiles. The season's largest crowd, 18,784, attended the July 7 evening performance featuring The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500
SEP 10 1970

BRICKTOWN, N. J.
DAILY OBSERVER
DAILY 8,500
SEP 4 1970

Tanglewood Rock Drew Record Crowds

NEW YORK — Summer of 1970 - a time when almost any outdoor rock gathering was doomed to either a rip-off, a riot or both - a time when the high hopes of the "Woodstock nation" were brutally crushed, Bill Graham and Tanglewood succeeded in producing three successful rock concerts at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, which reached, without untoward incident, a record-breaking 51,000 people.

For the first time in Tanglewood's history, the 12,000 plus people in attendance on the lawn were able to see the concerts as well as hear them, from a giant 20 x 16 foot color television screen onto which Joshua Television, with it's highly sophisticated MTS equipment, projected the concerts simultaneously, while at the same time feeding the show to tape, for later editing and possible use as a TV special.

Filmore at Tanglewood's 1970 summer season, which was produced as a Contempory Trends Concert under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, featured THE WHO, JETHRO TULL and IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY on July 7, CHICAGO, JOHN SEBASTIAN and THE PRESERVATION HALL JAZZ BAND on July 21, and SANTANA, MILES DAVIS and THE VOICES OF EAST HARLEM on August 18.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
SEP 1 1970
New England Newsclip

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT
(E) 1,700
1970
New England Newsclip

Lively World

Beethoven

By Milton R. Bass

IF BEETHOVEN were alive today, he would be 200 years old.

But Beethoven IS alive today. Anyone who attended the Beethoven weekends at Tanglewood this summer could see from the audience reaction that Beethoven is alive and well and living wherever classical music is played.

Which brings us to the next life-death problem. There are those who say that within five years there will be no classical recordings made in the United States. An article in Newsweek recently stated that classical record sales have nosedived in this country because of "youth turned off by the concert hall's irrelevance, a shrinking number of serious-record stores, a union that has almost priced orchestras out of the market, radio stations dominated by pop re-leases, a record-buying public that only responds to a few glittering names, a repertory glutted by old war-horses."

* * *

OUR OWN Boston Symphony Orchestra severed its relationship with RCA Victor last year to go with Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. The BSO hinted that it wanted out of its long-standing RCA contract because the American outfit would not be doing any classical recordings in a few years. But it was no secret that RCA was not having much luck selling BSO recordings, that it was putting pressure on the BSO to hire a glamorous conductor and that the only reason it had stuck with the BSO was that the Pops recordings were a big seller. Arthur Fiedler's birthday gift to the BSO was a letter stating that he, too, would sign with DGG.

* * *

WARREN SYER, publisher of High Fidelity magazine in Great Barrington, says there is no doubt that the classical recording business is in trouble in this country, but this has nothing to do with classical music. High Fidelity's circulation has soared to 200,000, which indicates that there are a lot of people who take their music seriously. Advertising from recording companies, however, has dropped from 22 per cent to 10 per cent, which means that the equipment people are the ones who are supporting the reviews, etc.

Some feel that a great deal of the problem lies in the fact that most of the recording companies are now run by lawyers or accountants, men who came up through the business office rather than the talent side. These men are interested only in numbers, and if classical records seem soft, then they pull back rather than attempt to charge forward.

* * *

AND WHEN WERE you last able to ask a clerk in a record store a question about classical music and get an answer? There was a time when you could hear a theme on the radio, go in a record store and hum it and the clerk would be able to identify the piece and get the record for you. Try it now and see what happens.

Also, the public is not interested in contemporary classical music. It is almost impossible to draw a crowd to a concert hall for contemporary compositions, let alone sell anybody a recording of them. Aaron Copland is about the last of the contemporary composers who writes music that sells, and they just celebrated his 70th birthday.

Some people maintain that classical music is dying because the younger generation associates it with the Establishment and puts it down, but Syer says his people go around the country to all the colleges, and they hear an amazing amount of classical music coming out of the dorm windows. This is a rather informal survey, to be sure, but it does indicate a positive attitude.

music

SUMMER HIGHLIGHTS

It didn't seem to be a summer of musical discontent in New York. The Philharmonic, the Metropolitan Opera, and other, less famous organizations brought free music to large and small parks. Filmed operas drew big audiences to Philharmonic Hall, which also housed a Mozart-Haydn-Schubert festival, some jazz from Preservation Hall, New Orleans, and a showbizzy debut "recital" by Ivan Rebroff.

Beyond city and state borders, but accessible with varying degrees of difficulty, thanks to the invention of the wheel were the exalted Marlboro in Vermont, the famous Tanglewood in the Berkshires, and the intimate Caramoor in Upper Westchester. Add to these summer music festivals a relative newcomer at Waterloo Village, a pleasantly and not overpoweringly restored Colonial settlement complete with gardens, brooks, ponds, frame houses, and an acoustically decent concert tent in which no less than Pablo Casals has been pleased to conduct these past two summers en route from San Juan to Marlboro.

One of the highest of the summer highlights surely was Don Pablo, at the age of 93, up there on the podium and amidst a crackling wind that threatened to bring the tent down on all our heads, rehearsing in the afternoon and presenting to the public that June night a conception of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony contrasting fury with grace in the first three movements and driving the finale at maximum pressure on the principal voice in the moment's counterpoint without ever pulling apart the over-all structural complex. Whenever that balance between form and content is achieved in that kind of music, the flame of genius burns up planets.

It's been obvious for more than a few years now that Alexander Schneider practices the Casals doctrine of keeping music, musicians, and audiences awake. Schneider is the inexhaustible live wire on a circuit of musical electricity that has stretched from Prades to Marlboro, or from Casals to Rudolf Serkin. It was evident certainly in so many of those New School concerts in winters past, and emphatically last December in Carnegie Hall, with Schneider leading a crash-coached group of string students in some of the most breathtaking Bach I had ever heard. (Mr. Schneider looks forward to more of this next December.) The live wire was also working at the Waterloo Village concert to accompany Mieczyslaw Horszowski's performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, a performance lacking a little in keyboard glitter and dash but extremely sensitive to the way phrases should begin, soar, and close.

About Marlboro I can give no report. Hoping to get there one summer or other, I can only relay the reaction of a usually blase acquaintance, to wit: "Go—even if you have to walk all the way."

Tanglewood, which used to prosper so mightily by reducing the 50-Pieces formula once propounded by Virgil Thomson down to 35, has been saving its soul these last few years by presenting, with the help of the Fromm Foundation, a week of up-to-the-minute contemporary music. As fate would have it, I missed the Fromm week this year and only got up to the Berkshires for Mahler's Second Symphony, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Christa Ludwig, Lorna Haywood, and an army of choristers all conducted

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

SEP 10 1970

music

Continued from page 36

by Leonard Bernstein. Despite my extreme-side seat location, at which some of the work's biggest effects seemed noticeably dampened, this was a performance with tremendous tension and long-breathed song. If Miss Ludwig sang the "Urlicht" movement with nothing like the transfixing, childlike intensity Jennie Tourel once brought to it on the very same stage, she sang it gorgeously none the less. And as for the Bernstein manner with the earth-shaking finale, he once more made it evident that, if you've heard one apocalypse, you haven't necessarily heard them all.

A good deal closer to New York City is Caramoor, and if the Rosen estate where this all-outdoor festival takes place was hit very hard by some raw weather this summer, compensation was at hand in the thoroughly unhackneyed programming by the musical director, Julius Rudel. A couple of the concerts were discussed some weeks ago in this column, but I wouldn't want to let more time go by without talking about Mr. Rudel's big-scaled revival of Mozart's "Idomeneo," the American premiere of Malcolm Williamson's opera, "The Growing Castle," and one particularly outstanding concert.

The "Idomeneo" was sung and played grandly and heroically, for the most part. As it happened, any strivings for orchestral delicacy, and there are golden opportunities for it, had to be abandoned in any case; the evening's rain was somewhat too steady. Tenor George Shirley, in the title role, charged gallantly and successfully through "Furo del mar," and Bianca Sauler, Maralin Niska, John Stewart, and Richard Stilwell handled their abridged roles competently. This despite Tito Capobianco's absolutely frilly and silly staging, which sourrounded every principal with his or her own little corps de ballet and spread asunder as far as possible those whom music and libretto had joined together. And no hint of a sea monster, although Bruce Harrow's luxuriantly feathered costumes were a treat.

Mr. Williamson's libretto for his opera skillfully condenses Strindberg's "A Dream Play," but the music lacks the power to make the opera exist on its own terms. It's true that the music in Kristina's "pasting" scene trips along engagingly, especially as sung by Nancy Williams, but the rest of the score, for all its staying on the conservative side of modernism, traces frail excuses for singing, except near the end, when goddess and poet part and a comfortable evocation of Richard Strauss takes over. The composer, behind the scenes, played a number of percussion and keyboard instruments, and the cast was made up of Clarice Carson, a bit too external and vocally stiff, as the goddess, and Miss Williams, the ever dependable William Metcalf, and the extremely promising Brent Ellis taking several roles each.

Mr. Rudel's final concert of the festival was as varied an assortment of Viennese music as you might ever encounter in one evening, except that something from the Schoenberg school might also have been included. But how often on a summer's night do you get, in one sitting, Maureen Forrester's rich contralto encompassing the grandeur of the Brahms "Alto Rhapsody" and following it up with three of Mahler's "Wunderhorn" songs, an excellent male chorus in two Schubert songs, Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture, Haydn's 95th Symphony, and a couple of Johann Strauss polkas? Almost everything was stylistically right, except for the fact that Miss Forrester hit Mahler's "Rhine Legend" with a little too much beer-hall bounce. But she more than made up for that with her sumptuously vocalized and powerfully acted account of the same composer's "Where the Beautiful Trumpets Blow."

—Leighton Kerner

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, OHIO
D. 175,468 SUN. 203,118

AUG 30 1970

Fine Arts Report

by Theodore Price

MORE STATISTICS?

Tanglewood, the inland Summer home of the Boston Orchestra closed its 1970 season last week with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last year, according to New York Times critic Donal Henahan.

Total attendance for the 8-week festival, reports Henahan was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969. Twenty-four symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190, against 1969's 175,468.

Three rock concerts brought 51,459 through the Tanglewood turnstiles. The season's largest crowd, 18,784, attended the July 7 evening performance featuring The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day.

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

DESPITE the economic squeeze, cultural events in Berkshire County didn't come off too badly this summer. Tanglewood, of course, was the keystone, and its draw of 257,419 patrons, up 20,482 from the year before, contributed to the fallout patronage of all the other events.

Attendance at the 24 regular Boston Symphony concerts was 186,190, up about 11,000 from the year before, but nowhere near the record of 213,000 set in 1963. The big boost this year came from the 51,459 people who attended the three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood Contemporary Trends concerts, and although this is good in its way, it has nothing to do with Tanglewood or what it basically stands for. The big draws for the classical season were the Beethoven weekends, and this, despite the howls of the avant-garde howlers, is what Tanglewood really stands for.

* * *

SUMMER THEATRE attendance was down in both ends of the county, Williamstown drawing about 70 per cent capacity, down about 10 per cent from the year before, and the Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge doing about 60 per cent of capacity, down some 15 per cent from the year before.

The BTF went through an internal upheaval just before the season started. William Gibson, president of the BTF, decided that the schedule set up by executive producer Lynn Austin was not within the goals of his faction, which was to present "original, American plays." Miss Austin resigned and Arthur Penn, who had been serving as artistic director for the past three years, stepped down. The Gibson group seems quite happy with the new direction of their theatre, and Miss Austin has taken steps to establish a group on the grounds of Music Inn next summer which will represent her approach to contemporary theatre. It could be that next summer we will have a most active third force in summer theatre around here. Meanwhile, the BTF is tentatively planning to present at least four "workshop" productions in Stockbridge during the fall and winter.

* * *

JACOB'S PILLOW reports that its attendance ended up just about the same as last year despite the tight situation. The Pillow presented 65 performances (4 more than ever before), including three world premieres. The big breakthrough sartorially was the dropping of tutus for form-revealing tights, which could stir new interest from a whole new group.

The movie business was spotty during the summer, with M*A*S*H the surprise hit of the season. The "nudie" movies did not fare as well as some people might expect. They did a respectable (I write some pretty subtle stuff, don't I?) amount of business, but nothing to make the theatres offer sex as a steady diet.

* * *

RESTAURANT BUSINESS in the county held up fairly well in comparison to last year, some of the restaurants showing a slight increase. Which goes to prove that the stomach is a cultural attraction that never loses its savor, and also that the restaurants around here give a pretty good show for the money.

The rock and folk concerts at Music Inn had ups and downs depending on the attraction and the weather, the smashing successes balanced off by the few dismal events, but when it comes to Nature and show biz, there's no telling if it's going to rain or pour.

Over the river, Saratoga had a pretty good year, especially in its ballet, which jumped some 50 per cent over the previous year. Their contemporary trends concerts consisted of anybody and everything, from the stars of "Hee Haw" to the Kitchen Sink (a rock group?).

All in all, it was a lively summer, and, all in all, it's a Lively World.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 1 1970

New England Newsclip

BRICKTOWN, N. J.
DAILY OBSERVER
DAILY 8,500

SEP 4 1970

Tanglewood Rock Drew Record Crowds

NEW YORK — Summer of 1970 - a time when almost any outdoor rock gathering was doomed to either a rip-off, a riot or both - a time when the high hopes of the "Woodstock nation" were brutally crushed, Bill Graham and Tanglewood succeeded in producing three successful rock concerts at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, which reached, without untoward incident, a record-breaking 51,000 people.

For the first time in Tanglewood's history, the 12,000 plus people in attendance on the lawn were able to see the concerts as well as hear them, from a giant 20 x 16 foot color television screen onto which Joshua Television, with it's highly sophisticated MTS equipment, projected the concerts simultaneously, while at the same time feeding the show to tape, for later editing and possible use as a TV special.

Fillmore at Tanglewood's 1970 summer season, which was produced as a Contempory Trends Concert under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, featured THE WHO, JETHRO TULL and IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY on July 7, CHICAGO, JOHN SEBASTIAN and THE PRESERVATION HALL JAZZ BAND on July 21, and SANTANA, MILES DAVIS and THE VOICES OF EAST HARLEM on August 18.

VERMONT

New England Newsclip

Lively World

Beethoven

By Milton R. Bass

IF BEETHOVEN were alive today, he would be 200 years old.

But Beethoven IS alive today. Anyone who attended the Beethoven weekends at Tanglewood this summer could see from the audience reaction that Beethoven is alive and well and living wherever classical music is played.

Which brings us to the next life-death problem. There are those who say that within five years there will be no classical recordings made in the United States. An article in Newsweek recently stated that classical record sales have nosedived in this country because of "youth turned off by the concert hall's irrelevance, a shrinking number of serious-record stores, a union that has almost priced orchestras out of the market, radio stations dominated by pop re-leases, a record-buying public that only responds to a few glittering names, a repertory glutted by old war-horses."

* * *

OUR OWN Boston Symphony Orchestra severed its relationship with RCA Victor last year to go with Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. The BSO hinted that it wanted out of its long-standing RCA contract because the American outfit would not be doing any classical recordings in a few years. But it was no secret that RCA was not having much luck selling BSO recordings, that it was putting pressure on the BSO to hire a glamorous conductor and that the only reason it had stuck with the BSO was that the Pops recordings were a big seller. Arthur Fiedler's birthday gift to the BSO was a letter stating that he, too, would sign with DGG.

* * *

WARREN SYER, publisher of High Fidelity magazine in Great Barrington, says there is no doubt that the classical recording business is in trouble in this country, but this has nothing to do with classical music. High Fidelity's circulation has soared to 200,000, which indicates that there are a lot of people who take their music seriously. Advertising from recording companies, however, has dropped from 22 per cent to 10 per cent, which means that the equipment people are the ones who are supporting the reviews, etc.

Some feel that a great deal of the problem lies in the fact that most of the recording companies are now run by lawyers or accountants, men who came up through the business office rather than the talent side. These men are interested only in numbers, and if classical records seem soft, then they pull back rather than attempt to charge forward.

* * *

AND WHEN WERE you last able to ask a clerk in a record store a question about classical music and get an answer? There was a time when you could hear a theme on the radio, go in a record store and hum it and the clerk would be able to identify the piece and get the record for you. Try it now and see what happens.

Also, the public is not interested in contemporary classical music. It is almost impossible to draw a crowd to a concert hall for contemporary compositions, let alone sell anybody a recording of them. Aaron Copland is about the last of the contemporary composers who writes music that sells, and they just celebrated his 70th birthday.

Some people maintain that classical music is dying because the younger generation associates it with the Establishment and puts it down, but Syer says his people go around the country to all the colleges, and they hear an amazing amount of classical music coming out of the dorm windows. This is a rather informal survey, to be sure, but it does indicate a positive attitude.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Pop Mixed With Classics Pays Off

Tanglewood Attracts 186,190

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — In spite of an overdose of bad weather, which reduced lawn audiences, the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood reported increased attendance over 1969.

Tanglewood's 33rd festival reported 186,190 at 24 major concerts by the Boston Symphony and eight open rehearsals, averaging 7,100 a concert.

Total attendance at paid public events at Tanglewood this year was over one-quarter million, several times the number of patrons the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in New York had for comparable forms of music.

69,787 at Saratoga

Saratoga this summer drew 69,787 to 18 concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra, an average of 3,877 a concert.

While total ticket sales at Saratoga Springs soared from 1969's 231,434 to 338,696, special popular events accounted for 192,342 of this, and another 74,566 was for ballet.

Both Tanglewood and Saratoga registered attendance increases in all departments. Saratoga's soaring grand total (56 per cent over 1969) was produced by a host of special events, and in the field of classical music Saratoga added only 5 per cent and Tanglewood 6 per cent.

Saratoga had generally good weather, while Tanglewood's many wet nights reduced lawn audiences. A saving element in the Berkshire picture was the two groups of Beethoven commemorative concerts, which turned out to be among the largest weekends in the history of Tanglewood.

25,000 Hear Rock

Saratoga set a new record on Sept. 1, when almost 25,000 attended the concert by "Chicago," a rock group.

Tanglewood also attracted the impressive average of 17,153 each to three Contemporary Trends concerts by popular groups, arranged by Fillmore-at-Tanglewood.

Seven-seasons-old Meadow Brook Music Festival in Rochester, Mich. hit the jackpot this summer by changing from four Detroit Symphony programs per week to two classical concerts, plus "rock and jazz" Fridays and "Pops" on Sundays. Attendance rose from 1969's discouraging 88,250 for 38 concerts to a record 127,572 for 34 events.

And it is clear that all these festivals are finding it expedient to mix youth and popular music with symphonic concerts.

Summer—And The Musical Atmosphere

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

What used to be — and to some still is — a pleasant summer vacation near a place where music abounds has become in recent years more of a working place for professionals and young people aspiring to a professional career.

One immediately is reminded of such places as the National Music Camp at Interlochen, Mich., which has always been a training place for the talented young, not that that the theaterical arts, dancing, and the plastic arts are forgotten.

But to many, Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival, Saratoga, Blossom, and Meadow Brook, just to mention a few, are names that conjure up pleasant evenings and Sunday afternoons with such as the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, and the Detroit Symphony under distinguished conductors with many distinguished soloists delighting with the standard repertoire.

This is no longer so. The repertoire by no means relies any longer on the tested masterworks exclusively, but experiments with lesser known old and very new works. The members of the respective orchestras are engaged in hard-working schedules as teachers in schools for talented young instrumentalists, composers, and conductors — and even critics.

Take Tanglewood, for example. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller shared the duties of artistic directors with Ozawa's principal responsibility the Festival Concerts, Schuller's main concern the Berkshire Music Center (the Boston Orchestra's summer academy for advanced music studies).

Leonard Bernstein, meanwhile, assumed a post as adviser, gave a series of classes and seminars, and conducted the Bostonians as well as the student orchestras.

Ozawa conducted Bernstein music, Bernstein conducted Mahler. Copland conducted Copland, Steinberg, and Rudolf; Dorati conducted Beethoven.

There was opera in concert verions, and there was music by Ligeti, Schoenberg, Satie, Webern, Xenakis, Schuller, Krenek, Szymanonwski, Scriabin, and Lutslawski, few of whose works appear during the winter seasons.

And there was Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood with Arthur Fiedler and six Contemporary Trends Concerts — a euphonism for some classy jazz and rock concerts that attracted more than 50,000 listeners.

An expanded conducting program, under the direction of veteran Leon Barzin of the National Orchestral Association, one of the earliest and consistently most productive training organizations in America, brought 11 conducting fellows into the caldron of activity.

There were eight weekly open rehearsals, the Festival of Contemporary Music (reported on last Sunday), young composers in residence, and, under a new artist-in-residence program, there was soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, who gave master classes. The list of soloists and other artists involved is much too long, however impressive, to catalog here.

* * *

Another activity, in which I was particularly interested and involved, was the 2nd Annual Critics Institute sponsored by the Music Critics Association (your reporter is in his third year as president) and the Fromm Music Foundation under the direction of Dr. Elliott Galkin, music critic of the Baltimore Sun, who also teaches at Goucher College and the Peabody Conservatory. Six junior critics were in residence from Aug. 13 through 23, attending rehearsals and concerts, meeting with composers and writing reviews under the tutelage of MCA senior critics Harold Schonberg of the New York Times, Irving Lowens of the Washington Star, Thomas Willis, of the Chicago Tribune, Elliott Galkin, and myself.

OFFICIALS TAKE TIME OUT FOR PHOTOGRAPHER AT TANGLEWOOD

From left, Dr. Elliott Galkin, director of the Critics' Fellowship Program; Leon Barzin, director of orchestral conducting; Mrs. Carolyn Raney, executive secretary; and Dr. Boris Nelson, The Blade's music critic

As one taught, one learned from the young critics — Father James Burns, writer for The Voice, Catholic Choirmaster, and Semaphore; James E. Harvey of the Flint (Mich.) Journal; Peggy Ann McKay of Denver, Colo.; Susan G. Raccoli, a student in the Rockefeller project for the training of music critics at the University of Southern California, and going to the Houston Post; James Roxbury, former stringer of the Washington Star and a composer as well, and Carol W. Steiner of the Buffalo Evening News and a contributor to Current Musicology.

The object of this program is the creation of a dynamic forum, exposed under pressure to as much contemporary music as one might hear during an entire season at home (except possibly in Buffalo, where Lukas Foss propheted such music), as well as the more standard fare by the Boston Symphony which framed the project with its weekend concerts.

Congenial as the group was, the analyses by all hands was by no means always so, but to a purpose, as the whole philosophy of criticism and its place in daily journalism had to be considered in depth. Not that there was always agreement. On the contrary, as we hear with our own ears, so our reactions based on knowledge and experience, still speak their own comment —and not always in the same journalese either, since newspapers vary as to whom they seek to serve.

One fact among many emerged and that was the keen ability of these critics to verbalize, an ability which was shared by at least two of the composers who — while speaking their own new language musically — shared their thoughts frankly and ably, Barbara Kolb and Richard Felciano. Avant-gardism doesn't require awe, although some sympathy, identification would help, we learned.

The avant-garde composer is aware of stylistic coteries, "parroting the same fashionable devices" — Bernstein had referred to it in his opening address running from "didactic super-serialism to frivolous dada — some merely opportunistic. We also learned once again, since no composer reads or is ever influenced by criticism (the clipping books fill themselves!), that critics only "bump our ego." We learned in a fascinating exchange between Paul Fromm, founder-director of the Fromm Music Foundation, and Harold Schonberg, what "sympathy" can mean (Fromm is very sympathetic to the experimental; Schoenberg is not). Fromm pleaded for the non-master approach, while Schoenberg insisted that progress only comes from the dissatisfied and rejected the good second-class composer, insisting on master-standards.

What emerged was really a mutual affection for quality, arrived at in different ways. What everyone seemed to agree on was what Bernstein had referred to previously — "While some new music is fascinating, some titillating, some of it touching and even beautiful, it almost never is noble." And yet, it seems that in these days of turmoil, proxy wars, and impatience for instantaneous solutions of our problems, the noble would serve humanity best.

* * *

Since my car insists on misbehaving after each 500 miles, I missed the Saturday concert by the Bostonians, conducted by William Steinberg, but my colleagues assured me that Beethoven's Choral Fantasy and Choral Symphony No. 9 were done well.

Sunday's concert, under the baton of Max Rudolf, formerly of the Cincinnati Symphony, also all-Beethoven, dished up a rather tepid No. 5, due, let's be charitable, to depressing humidity.

Things went better during the last weekend of concerts. On Friday night, Gunther Schuller conducted the orchestra in his own "Spectra" with a reseated ensemble, a work of juxta-posed colors, floating pigmentation on a prepared canvas, with Ravelian and Stravinskyan chromosomes. There was chromatic and motivistic recognition and the piece was durch-komponiert.

Paul Zukofsky, the patron-saint of avant-garde violin music and a superb violinist, dashed off superbly the Szymanowski Violin Concerto No. 1, a post-romantic work with echoes of Strauss and Bruckner, turning spasmodically atonal.

The big piece of the evening was Scriabin's "Le poeme de l'extase," opus 54, which once created a scandal. One wonders why? It is a Lisztian-Debussyan explosion of sound on sound, but must ectascy be so noisy? The program began with a rather pedantic reading of Wagner's "Rienzi Overture," which seemed to set the color basis for the music that followed.

Seiji Ozawa conducted the final two performances of the season on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. The evening program brought forth a splendid reading of Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, written in 1954, strongly influenced by Bartok and Hindemith and permeated with Polish folk material. It is a strong work and needs to be heard more often. There was also the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra.

The disappointment of the evening to me were Alexis Weissenberg's ideas of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, opus 30. I had listened to Weissenberg's weekend prelude recital on Friday evening and was amazed at his most prodigious technical equipment and how little music he made with it. There is an elegance and technical elan about his playing with undoubted appeal, but there are dynamic quirks from thunderous jetstream runs and chords to disappearing whispers and little in between. Ozawa did splendidly in holding down the orchestra during the Rachmaninoff, which was often, but just how far can a conductor do this, or how often. What emerged was a very uneven, tattered rendition which also showed the stitching in the composition.

It poured all night and by 10 a.m. on Sunday it looked as if the elements had conspired to lend a hand to the performance of Berlioz' "Grande Messe des Morts," opus 5, in memory of former Boston conductor Charles Munch. But by concert-time, the rain had stopped and the sun tried hard to dry things up a bit. The Berlioz Requiem is a mighty work, aimed at being colossal, to impress with its four extra brass choirs, greatly augmented orchestra, plus 8 pairs of timpani and 10 pairs of cymbals and a huge chorus and tenor soloist. Ozawa, conducting without score, impressed with his absolute knowledge of the material, his clear and always balanced delineations, and his awareness of the arch of the work.

There were times when this overall empathy led to blurred details, but on the other hand there was a sense of climax to the work which came off impressively. The four extra bands, set at the periphery of the huge shed, served in stereo effect, but how more meaningful must this become in a hall. There was much excitement, if not all the spiritual milieu inherent in the pages of this magnificent score.

A practical note in conclusion: Sacrificing a goodly number of admissions, Tanglwood's shed now has new wooden seats, affording good back support and greater leg room — and what a difference it makes from the previously uncomfortable, narrow metal chairs that could freeze any spine on a cool or wet evening. And the entire shed has been repainted. Perhaps all this practical comfort aided somewhat in bringing Tanglewood's total attendance up more than 20,000 from 1969 — 257,419 people attended and that's a good figure with which to end this report.

As I Hear It

Sneak Preview

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

TANGLEWOOD programs are largely gleaned from the concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays the preceding winter season in its home hall. The Boston management has just issued the contents of its 90th anniversary season (1970–71). A glance may allow us to get an early peek at what we will hear next summer.

The orchestra plays twenty-two weeks in three series, Friday afternoons, Saturday evenings and Tuesday evenings. This last series is divided unevenly between Symphony Hall and Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. There is a shorter series on Thursday evenings. The orchestra travels to Providence three times and to Philharmonic Hall in New York five times, where it repeats its Wednesday program on Fridays. This adds up to a lot of concerts but it doesn't mean the same number of programs for there can be as many as five repetitions of one.

* * * *

THE MUSICAL director of the orchestra, William Steinberg, will prepare six programs; Michael Thomas, the associate conductor, an equal number; Seiji Ozawa, Erich Leinsdorf and Rafael Kubelik, two each, and Donald Johanos, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Claudio Abbado and Bernard Haitink, one each.

Several first chair players from the orchestra's wind section will come forward for solos. Otherwise, there will be only one violinist soloist, Paul Zukovsky, in the William Schuman concerto; one cellist, Mstislav Rostropovich; three pianists, Maurizio Pollini, Joseph Kalichstein and Christoph Eschenbach. This is evidently the continuation of the policy of reducing expenses, but no one could have found fault with the brilliance of the artists chosen last year so on that score there need be no discrepant comment. I retain unforgettable memories, though, of Francescatti and Serkin in other years and of Christa Ludwig and Leopold Simoneau this year.

* * * *

A HASTY and probably inexact tabulation of the composers represented reveals that 45 are to be played. About a dozen are contemporaries. High man on the list is good old Mozart showing up on six programs, bad seconds are Beethoven, Stravinsky and Robert Schumann with only three each. Ravel, Schoenberg, Debussy, Prokofieff, Mahler, Brahms lower the gate to allow contemporary William Schuman to join their circle with two each. From here, however, the season looks good. The scattering of responsibility to nine conductors will not win unanimous approval, but maybe the spice of variety will compensate.

* * * *

IT WAS IN the spring of 1881 that Henry Lee Higginson founded the musical organization that brought world fame to Boston. At the time he published a statement of aims in which he expressed himself:

"My original scheme was to hire an orchestra of 60 men and a conductor, paying them all by the year, reserving for myself the right to all their time needed for rehearsals and for concerts and allowing them to give lessons when they have time. I should always wish to eschew vulgar music, such trash as is heard in the theatres, sentimental or sensational nonsense. I do not like Wagner's music, etc. etc."

In the first season 20 public rehearsals on Friday afterncons and 20 concerts on Saturday evenings were to be given. In the second season 26 concerts were given. The first concert took place on Oct. 22, 1881, in the Boston Music Hall. On Sept. 15, 1900, during the regime of Gov. Winthrop Murray Crane. Symphony Hall was inaugurated to replace the older hall, which had been built in 1852.

THE HISTORY of the organization and the parade of conductors and soloists make a list of unprecedented brilliance. The long list of works performed by the Boston Orchestra since its foundation testifies to a considerable catholicity of selection. All the shocking avant-garde composers of their eras were heard in Boston. Arnold Schoenberg was among them and H. Earle Johnson wrote that today one might say of Schoenberg what Oscar Wilde said of William Ernest Henley, the British poet and editor: "He has fought a good fight and has had to face every difficulty except popularity."

A summer series of daily concerts by a reduced contingent of the orchestra was inaugurated in 1885 under the name of the Music Hall Promenade Concerts, modeled on the London "Proms." After the erection of the new Symphony Hall in 1900, the summer concerts were renamed "Symphony Hall Pops" and later became known simply as "Boston Pops," of which Arthur Fiedler has been conductor since 1930.

* * * *

IN 1929, Fiedler launched a series of free outdoor concerts on the banks of the Charles River on the Boston site. These, known as Esplanade Concerts, are presented, weather permitting, six times a week in July.

The Boston Symphony came to the Berkshires in 1936, the third summer of the Berkshire Festivals. Serge Koussevitzky was the orchestra's conductor. They played the first summer under a tent at Holmwood, the second on the grounds of Tanglewood, still under a tent, however. But a storm prevented the completion of the Aug. 12 (1937) program. The immediate response to Koussevitzky's ultimatum — a permanent roof or no concerts — met immediate cooperation from the community, and the 1938 season was played in the Great Shed which today is the mecca of international interest of the musical world.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 26 1970 New England Newsclip

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,888 SUN. 200,492

SEP 6 1970

Magazine of the Sunday Herald Traveler
July 12, 1970

Herald

SUMMER FUN IN BOSTON / THE ESPLANADE STORY

Magazine of the
Sunday Herald Traveler
July 12, 1970

Herald

SUMMER FUN IN BOSTON / THE ESPLANADE STORY

The Esplanade Concerts:

The 42nd season will open at the Hatch Memorial Shell tomorrow with Arthur Fiedler again on the conductor's stand. But there'll be fewer concerts than ever before.

A FADING TRADITION?

by McLaren Harris

The 42nd season of Esplanade Concerts will open at the Hatch Memorial Shell tomorrow. It will be Arthur Fiedler's 42nd consecutive year on the Hatch podium and will begin with a gala, admission-free (as always) concert celebration of his 75th birthday. It will also be the smallest Esplanade season since the series was founded in 1929.

As he has done in recent years, Fiedler will conduct opening night only and then depart for engagements elsewhere. The orchestra itself will be away from the Esplanade for three days, July 14 through 16 (July 14 at Bunker Hill, July 15 at Smith Field, Hyde Park, and July 16 at City Hall Plaza in the morning and Rogers Park, Brighton, in the evening). Esplanade programs resume July 17 and continue; Sunday excepted, through July 25.

To many, the 10-concert, nine-day Esplanade schedule looks suspiciously like the latest in an extended series of cutbacks and revives fears that the series, which often seems to be regarded as a kind of stepchild by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, could disappear entirely. Not that the Symphony is solely at fault; it incurs a deficit well into six figures through normal operations, and the annual season of free outdoor programs, even at the virtually rent-free Hatch Shell, is anything but self-sustaining.

The Esplanade Concerts were wholly the innovation of Fiedler, then a Symphony violinist. "Libraries and museums are free, but for music you always have to dig into your pocket. Why?" he asked himself. And so he went about Beacon Hill and environs, ringing doorbells and enlisting support for outdoor symphony concerts. His donors were skeptical—they thought he would attract mostly sailors and winos—but they came across.

The Esplanade Concerts opened July 4, 1929, performed by 43 musicians under a small wooden shell constructed for the purpose by the Metropolitan District Commission, which owns the land along the Charles. Warnings notwithstanding, in six weeks Fiedler and his Symphony musicians drew audiences totaling half a million.

In the beginning the concerts were undertaken at the personal financial risk of Fiedler and his donors. The Symphony had no business agreements regarding the Esplanade; the trustees were not convinced the series would last. And they were almost right.

In the years following 1929 the Depression bit deeply into the usual sources of support and threatened closure of the Esplanade venture. As a last resort Fiedler made a public appeal to his audiences for small individual donations, and the response was sufficient to continue the concerts on a three-week basis and justify construction in 1934 of a new, larger shell of welded steel plates cast at the Somerville Iron Works.

Not only did the series survive, but it gave welcome summer employment to hard-pressed Symphony men during the 1930's. Finally, after more than a decade of Esplanade seasons and as the multi-purpose, $240,000 granite-and-teak Edward Hatch Memorial Shell was being built, the BSO recognized it as an official Symphony function and took over its business management. By 1948 (a year of renewed financial appeals) the orchestra's membership had reached 85.

One of the Esplanade orchestra's principles is that it be composed chiefly, if not entirely, of Boston Symphony musicians. But the Symphony faced an increasing commit-

Above: A musician's eye view of an Esplanade audience. Right: Arthur Fiedler in his customary position.

Continued on next page

flip over →

The concerts

by McLaren Harris

The 4
Concer
Hatch
row. I ler's 4
the H begin free (a bratio will al planad ries wa

As h years, opening depart where. will be nade f through Hill, J
Hyde
City H ing Brighto
planade

Continued from previous page

ment to a growing Tanglewood schedule—where, after all, tickets could be sold and exposure gained to a wider audience, especially from New York City. That, in turn, boosted the Symphony's income via enhanced record sales.

During his 13-year reign as Symphony music director Charles Munch instituted the Bach-Mozart Weekends at Tanglewood, whereby the first two weekends in Lenox (which overlapped with the annual Esplanade season) required a much-reduced orchestra. For the first such week, half the Symphony went to Tanglewood and the other half played at the Esplanade, augmented by local professionals. For the second week the two halves exchanged places.

For the first summer after Erich Leinsdorf assumed command (1963), the arrangement remained intact. Then for 1964 Leinsdorf and the trustees decided to subtract one week from the Esplanade season and add it to Tanglewood, bringing the latter to its current duration of eight weeks.

Also, the Bach-Mozart tradition began to falter. As Tanglewood's opening weekend traditionally falls close to July 4, it was deemed preferable to feature more extravagant orchestral works in proper holiday spirit (and again, it helped business). Bach and Mozart were relegated to the second and third weekends and the Esplanade dates were shifted here or there in response.

This year, Tanglewood's first two weekends are devoted primarily to larger works such as Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." The Esplanade season, July 13-25, is thus later than usual.

The decision to spend three

They come to the Esplanade concerts with their own chairs.

Above: Charles River provides a picturesque background for the Esplanade concerts. Right: Some of the Esplanade programs are designed for children.

concerts

Continued from page 25

definite, albeit less tangible, role in audience development. The casual listener who encounters Brahms or Beethoven for the first time at the Esplanade may become a regular Symphony subscriber later on. And the free programs support the Symphony's claim to status as a non-profit, educational institution (in the latter regard, it is curious to note that, as with this year's Pops programs, all notes about the music have been dropped from Esplanade program pamphlets).

The problems of the Esplanade Concerts are essentially the problems of the Hatch Shell, and chief among those is Storrow Drive. In the decade-plus between its construction and the highway's intrusion, the shell saw its greatest use and largest audiences. Concerts, drama, ballet, religious crusades, civic functions, war bond rallies and victory celebrations were held there.

When the highway was proposed, chief engineer Benjamin Fink stated that its presence would make "no appreciable difference" in conditions there. This explains why Mr. Fink was a highway engineer and not a musician or an acoustician and probably not even a listener. The inbound traffic tunnel at the Arlington street exit, which was put forth as the solution to the noise difficulty, surfaces within 50 yards of the stage with the constant engine roar of cars accelerating uphill.

Even though the only way to alleviate highway noise would be to build a wall along Storrow Drive, it has never been seriously considered. Instead, the villain in the shell's shortcomings has been identified as the electronic sound system—it has been reworked again this year—although electronics in almost any form constitute a distinctly unaesthetic encumbrance in musical performances.

The MDC's policy forbidding the charging of admission to Hatch Shell events has been called another major obstacle, as many organizations are unable to raise money otherwise to cover their own expenses. But even if the policy were changed it is questionable, if the noise problem remained uncorrected, whether enough paying customers could be attracted to underwrite such events as orchestra concerts.

Even if the Symphony were forced to relinquish its Esplanade activity, it is unlikely that the concerts would pass into total eclipse. They have become too deeply a part of municipal and metropolitan pride, as one may gather from the consistently good attendance during decent weather.

But musicians have pride, too, as well as stomachs. They must be paid, and most of them, if they are expected to exert their energies and talents, prefer to be heard. Until economic and physical conditions change, the Esplanade Concerts will probably not improve upon their current "season" of two weeks (or less) and will thus remain but a token of past accomplishment.

Boston Sunday Globe July 12, 1970

CITY SKYLINE is the backdrop for the Boston Symphony's free Esplanade Concerts at the Hatch Shell on Storrow Drive. Founder Arthur Fieldler conducts the opening tomorrow at 8:30. Then the orchestra makes a tour for Summerthing, playing Tuesday at the Bunker Hill Monument, Wednesday in Hyde Park, Thursday noon at Government Center and Thursday night in Brighton, before returning July 17-18 and 20-25 to the Hatch Shell.

MARQUEE / music set to Hatch in shell

By George McKinnon
Globe Staff

The Esplanade Concerts, Boston's favorite free Summer musical entertainment, is spreading out from its traditional riverbank location all over the city this Summer.

Tomorrow night at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler, who founded the concerts in 1929, will lift his baton at the Hatch Shell and the Boston Symphony members will start the annual program of symphonies, concertos, overtures, marches and light classics.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct at the Hatch Shell on July 17-18 and 20-25. Other concerts will be scattered throughout the city in a tie-in with Summerthing. Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Brighton, July 15, both at 8 p.m.; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, 11:45 a.m. and Rogers Park, Brighton, at 8 p.m., both on July 16. In addition there will be the children's concert at the Shell at 10:45 on July 22.

TWO BIG PICTURES are on the bill this week. Barbara Streisand's new Musical, "On a Clear Day You Can See Forever," with Yves Montand starts its New England premiere engagement at the Saxon on Wednesday.

"Cotton Come Comes to Harlem," with Godfrey Cambridge, Raymond St. Jacques and Calvin Lockhart starts Friday at the Music Hall. The film is a comedy-adventure involving two Harlem detectives. Actor Ossie Davis directed.

"The Hawaiians," the big Charlton Heston picture, has moved to the Cheri Theater Complex to make room for John Wayne's summer Western, "Chisum" at the Savoy.

SCHAEFER MUSIC FESTIVAL at Harvard Stadium will have the Grateful Dead and John Hammond Monday and on Wednesday Ike and Tina Turner and the Voices of East Harlem take over.

MORE HATCH SHELL activity on Thursday night when Re-CREATION 70, Cambridge's "summer celebration of the arts," will have a candlelight ceremony and the concert, which starts at 7, features a new light group and a blues recording artist.

ONE LAST DAY for the Newport Jazz Festival which winds up the annual bash today. And if you are in the mood for jazz but want something close to home. The Original Preservation Hall Jazz Band plays tonight at the South Shore Music Circus in Cohasset.

SUMMER THEATER programs include "Man of La Mancha" opening tomorrow night at the Cohasset tent. David McCallum stars in "Signpost for Murder" this week at the North Shore Music-Theater in Beverly and at the Cape Cod Melody Tent in Hyannis, "Cabaret" is returning for a second week.

If you are down Hyannis way you might look into the Racquet Club at the Sheraton Hyannis. Wayne Cochran and the Jam Family are entertaining through Wednesday.

Worcester Telegram

June 28, 1970

Free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade to begin July 13

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The 42nd season of free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will begin at 8:30 p.m, Monday evening, July 13, with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

For the first time since 1929, Fiedler will conduct only the opening program. The remaining 13 will be directed by Harry Ellis Dickson, a first violinist with the Boston Symphony.

This season, in collaboration with Boston Mayor Kevin White's "Summerthing" program, four concerts will be played off the Esplanade.

They are at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, July 16 (11:45 a.m.); and Rodgers Park, Brighton, July 16. The off-Esplanade evening concerts begin at 8 p.m.

There is one special concert for children this year, on the Esplanade July 22 at 10:15 a.m.

Remaining Esplanade concerts are July 17 and 18, July 20-25 at 8:30 p.m.

SARATOGA PERFORMING ARTS Festival continues to bolster its list of special money-making attractions. The festival's "main" portions are given by the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Canadian singer, songwriter, poet and novelist Leonard Cohen is scheduled for Aug. 10. Better-known Peter, Paul and Mary will make an appearance Aug. 3, and Sammy Davis Jr., Sept. 6.

HARRISON HOUSE of Glen Cove, N.Y., is offering a summer-long series of cultural weekend programs, beginning with "Close-Up on Bach," July 3-5.

Performers will be the renowned Bach pianist, Rosalyn Tureck, and organist Virgil Fox, who will perform on Worcester Community Concerts next season.

In addition to their individual recitals, Miss Tureck and Fox will participate with Harrison House guests in informal discussions, music seminars and critical evaluations of the music they play.

Some 150 guests will be accepted on a first-come, first-serve basis. Cost for the weekend is $170 for single occupancy, and $125 per person, double occupancy.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA leaves on Friday, April 2, 1971 for London on its first European tour since 1956. Conductors will be William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas.

The Boston Pops segment of the orchestra will be conducted by Arthur Fiedler in the first concerts that orchestra has ever played abroad.

Among the major cities to be visited are London, Berlin, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Vienna, Paris, Naples and Barcelona.

One unusual feature of the tour is that a number of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and Friends of Music at Tanglewood will accompany the orchestra to most of the cities on the schedule. They will participate in its social activities as well as attending concerts, opera, and ballet performances by European orchestras and performing companies.

THE 18TH COMPETITION for the best new work for mixed chorus is announced by the Ernest Bloch Award of Cedarhurst, Long Island.

The 1959 award was won by Prof. Relly Raffman, head of the music department at Clark University.

Organist Virgil Fox

Springfield Sunday Republican

June 28, 1970

185

Esplanade Concerts

BOSTON—The 42d season of free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade begins Monday evening July 13 at 8:30 pm with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Following the opening concert the remainder of the series will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. Concerts on the Esplanade are performed at 8:30 pm in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

This season, in collaboration with the Mayor's "Summerthing" program, four concerts will be played off the Esplanade: at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, July 16 (11:45 am); and Rodgers Park, Brighton, July 16. The three off - Esplanade evening concerts begin at 8 pm.

There is one special concert for children this year, on the Esplanade, July 22 at 10:15 am, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

"Summerthing" is produced by the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs under the direction of Katherine D. Kane. The Esplanade Concerts were found by Arthur Fiedler in 1929 to bring symphonic music to a large public free of charge.

Boston Globe June 28, 1970

Music and Dance / a summer listing

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-33

16

ESPLANADE CONCERTS — Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade, foot of Beacon Hill. Founded in 1929, by Arthur Fiedler who will conduct on opening night, July 13, these outdoor programs by the Boston Symphony offer symphonies, concertos, overtures, marches and light classics nightly at 8:30 (except when it rains) for audiences up to 15,000 people who bring blankets or folding chairs (some rental chairs available) to the Hatch Shell lawn. Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct on July 17–18 and 20–25 and also at the children's concert July 22 at 10:15 a.m. This year the Esplanade Concerts will tour four Summerthing neighborhoods: Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15, both at 8 p.m.; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, Boston, at 11:45 a.m., and Rodgers Park, Brighton, at 8 p.m., both on July 16. Both Esplanade and Summerthing are free.

MONDAYS AT HARVARD—Sanders Theater, Cambridge, at 8:30. July 6: Peter Serkin, piano (tentative). Bach's Goldberg Variations, selected works by Messiaen. July 13: Leonard Shure, piano. Beethoven, Sonata, Op. 101; Schumann, Fantasy; Schubert, C minor Sonata. July 20: New Cleveland Quartet, assisted by Raphael Hillyer, viola, and Leslie Parnas, cello. Brahms, Sextet; Beethoven, Viola Quintet; Bartok, Quartet No. 4. July 27; Lukas Foss. Aug. 3: Leon Kirchner.

GARDNER MUSEUM—The Fenway, Boston. Recitals and chamber groups. Every Sunday, Thursday and Saturday at 3, and on the first Thursday of every month at 8:30. Free.

NEW ENGLAND DANCE THEATER — Warehouse, 470 Parker st. (one and a half blocks east of the Museum of Fine Arts), Boston Boston. Music by Ezra Sims, new works by Toby Armour. Dancers include Miss Armour, Lolo Beckwith, Lois Ginandes, Ian Houston, Christina Jackmauh, Chip Largman, Bruce de St. Croix, Marlene Wallin and Rachel Whitman. Performances on July 17–19, 24–26 at 8:30.

Classical and the dance

Boston-Cambridge

SUMMERTHING—Boston, June 26–Sept. 7. Founded and sponsored by the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs in 1968, this Summer-long, everyday, day-long festival brings art, music, theater, dance, crafts, movies and all kinds of workshops into 14 Boston neighborhoods — Allston-Brighton, Charlestown, Columbia Point, Dorchester, East Boston, Hyde Park, Jamaica Plain, Mattapan, North End, Parker Hill-Fenway, Roxbury, South Boston, South End and West Roxbury-Roslindale. Touring groups include: Boston Symphony (see listing under "Esplanade" for details), the Boston Ballet (14 performances), Ronald Ingraham Concert Choir of gospel singers (12), Cambridge Opera Workshop (30 lecture-demonstrations for children, two performances), Mandala Folk Dancers (15), Musicians' Band Concerts, sponsored by the Boston Musicians' Assn., Local 9 of AF of M (42), Young Peoples Band (3), Twyla Tharp (five dance workshops, two performances), James Cunningham Dance Company (2). See additional listings for Summerthing in this section. Daily schedules will be published in The Globe and a recorded schedule can be heard by dialing 261-1660. Admission is free.

PLAYHOUSE IN THE PARK — Franklin Park, Roxbury, July 4–Sept. 7. Presented by Elma Lewis and the National Center of Afro-American Artists, the series, which is a showcase for local and national talent (Odetta, Duke Ellington), is free, performed in the open air, begins nightly at 8 and lets out at 10. The schedule, with details to be announced shortly: Dance or gospel or big name artists on Sundays, drama on Mondays and Tuesdays, rock concerts Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, and jazz on Saturdays.

MUSIC, Page A-36

16

186

Boston After Dark

June 30, 1970

Boston After Dark
July 7, 1970

Classical sound abounds around

By CRAIG STINSON

The Boston Symphony will open its 42nd season of concerts on the Charles River Esplanade on Monday, July 13. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the first concert; the remainder of the two-week series will be directed by Mr. Fiedler's regular assistant at the Pops, Harry Ellis Dickson. The concerts, at the Hatch Shell, are free and begin at 8:30.

This year in conjunction with Summerthing, the orchestra will play four concerts off the Esplanade: at Bunker Hill in Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field in Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza at Government Center, July 16 (at 8:45 p.m.,); and Rodgers Park in Brighton, July 16. The Charlestown, Hyde Park and Brighton concerts start at 8 p.m.

The BSO's Berkshire Festival Concerts, at Tanglewood (near Lenox, Mass.) open July 3 and run through August 23. This year the festival is under the artistic direction of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. Leonard Bernstein will serve in an advisory capacity.

The format for the festival will be the same as in previous summers. Concerts begin at 9 on Fridays, 8:30 on Saturdays and 2:30 on Sundays. There will be a "weekend prelude" every Friday evening at 7.

Indoor tickets range from four to eight dollars. For three dollars you can sit outside the shed on the grass and dig the fresh air as well as the music. Bring along a blanket, some insect repellant, and an ear trumpet.

Highlights of the festival: Ozawa's opening night program July 3 will include Leonard Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's Atmospheres (of Space Odyssey fame) and the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique. The July 5 concert will be devoted entirely to the "Resurrection" Symphony of Mahler. Leonard Bernstein will conduct, with Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig as soloists. On July 11, Ozawa will conduct Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello in what could turn out to be an exceptionally strong concert version of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte. On July 24, Aaron Copland, former director of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct a program including two of his own works (including the Clarinet Concerto), plus Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco and the Fifth Symphony of Schubert. Gunther Schuller will conduct his Spectra August 21, on a program with Weber's Freischuetz Overture, Szymanovski's Violin Concerto No. 1 (played by Paul Zukofsky), and the Poem of Ecstasy by Scriabin. Last, but hardly least, Mr. Ozawa will conduct the monumental Berlioz Requiem on August 23. That performance will be dedicated to the memory of the BSO's former conductor, Charles Munch.

The weekends of July 31-August 2 and August 14-16 will be devoted to Beethoven, in honor of the Composer's 200th birthday anniversary. William Steinberg, who is at the moment under medical house arrest, is scheduled to conduct four of the six programs. The Symphony's press office appears confident that Mr. Steinberg will be up and about by the middle of the summer.

Splendor of bygone days lingers on at Newport Music Festival concerts at The Breakers.

Once again this summer there will be three so-called Contemporary Trends concerts in the Tanglewood Shed: on July 7, July 21 and August 18. These concerts are offered in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East. The performers have not yet been announced.

On the other side of the Tanglewood Estate, on weekday evenings, there will be a great deal more music going on, presented by fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The BMC, which this year is under the artistic direction of Gunther Schuller, is the Boston Symphony's summer training center for advanced performers. Their concerts have traditionally been more adventurous (and sometimes more "professional") than the main festival events. The highlights of the summer at the BMC is the Fromm Festival in August — a week devoted entirely to modern music, including some new works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

Down the road a piece from Tanglewood is the Saratoga Arts Center (Saratoga Springs, N.Y.), the summer home of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet. The season there runs from June 20 to September 6. The Orchestra performs Wednesday (on some weeks Thursdays) and through Sundays. The programs that have been announced so far consist almost exclusively of standard 19th-century fare. Monday evenings, from July 6 to August 24, will be devoted to chamber ensembles of various sorts. Other music will be provided by Engelbert Humperdinck (July 13), the Band (July 20), Peter, Paul and Mary (August 3), Johnny Mathis (August 4), Leonard Cohen (August 10), Rod McKuen (August 18), the Fifth Dimension (August 24), Three Dog Night and the James Gang (August 25), Blood, Sweat and Tears (August 27), Jose Feliciano (August 28), Judy Collins and Arlo Guthrie (August 29), Oliver and the Young Americans (August 30), Chicago (September 1), Hee Haw (September 2), Guess Who (September 4), Bobby Sherman (September 5) and Sammy Davis Jr. (September 6).

The Marlboro Music Festival, under the direction of Rudolf Serkin, will present its 20th season of chamber and chamber-orchestra concerts at Marlboro College (off Rte. 9, just west of Brattleboro, Vt.) from July 11 to August 23. There will be three Friday evening events at 8:30; the rest of the concerts are on Saturdays at 8:30 and Sundays at 3. Pablo Casals is expected to put in his tenth annual appearance at some point during the summer.

Programs for the Marlboro concents are announced only a week ahead of the date, but the small auditorium is almost invariably sold out in advance. If you like chamber music and mountain air, it's worth risking a blind date. For ticket information, contact the Marlboro Music Festival, Marlboro, Vt. 05344 (802-254-8163).

West of Marlboro north of Saratoga is the unique Lake George Opera Festival. Performances are held in the auditorium of Queensbury High School, just outside of Glens Falls, New York. Dates and casts have not been announced yet, but the repertoire looks promising indeed. Five operas will be given: Stanley Silverman's multi - media freak show, Elephant Steps (premiered under Michael Tilson Thomas' direction at the Berkshire Music Center in the summer of '68); Benjamin Britten's Les Illuminations; La Boheme; Don Giovanni and a rarely heard opera by Haydn, reputedly his best, L'Infidelta Delusa. Information may be obtained by writing the festival at P.O. Box 41, Glens Falls, N.Y. 12801.

Finally, for those who delight in 19th-century obscurities and enjoy putting on formal attire, there will be a ten-day "Romantic Revival" festival in the "fabled mansions" of Newport, Rhode Island. The fete opens officially on Thursday, July 30, with a gala chamber concert, featuring Rheinberger's Nonet, Op. 139, and the Wolf-Ferrari Kammersymphonie, Op. 8. The preceding night there is to be a concert, Woodwind Quintet, Verdi's Fugitive Songs, and a Trio by Balfe.

From July 31 through August 8 there will be three programs a day, with music by such notables as Kalliwoda, K. Kummer, David, Fesca, Bazzini, Osborne, Herzogengerg, Wallce, Bishop, Stiebelt; Koczwara, Reissiger, Lacombe, Hahn, Molique, Pechatschek, Andrew, Sauget, Bertini, Briccialdi, Spindler, et. al. Ticket order forms may be obtained from the Newport Music Festival, 23 Bridge Street, Newport, R.I. 02840 (phone: 401-846-1140).

The Hopkins Center at Dartmouth, alas, will not be holding a 'Congregation of the Arts" this summer. This festival in past summers has been, in the opinion of many, the most rewarding in New England. But it has also cost a considerable sum. For the moment, the program is "under reconsideration."

BOSTON POPS ESPLANADE SEASON.
July 13: Arthur Fiedler cond., Esplanade.
July 14: Harry Ellis Dickson cond at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, 8 pm.
July 15: Harry Ellis Dickson cond at Smith Field, Hyde Park at 8 pm.
July 16: Rodgers Park, Brighton Harry Dickson cond, 8 pm.
July 17, 18: Harry Dickson cond at Esplanade, 8:30 pm.
July 20-25: Harry Dickson cond at Esplanade.
July 22: Children's Concert Harry Ellis Dickson conducts Esplanade at 10:15 am.

News
Milford, Mass.
July 6, 1970

ESPLANADE CONCERTS

BOSTON (UPI) — The 42nd season of Esplanade Concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler will open July 13 at 8:30 p.m. at the Hatch Memorial Shell. Fiedler will conduct the opening concert and Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the remainder of the series.

Herald News
Fall River, Mass

ESPLANADE CONCERTS

BOSTON (UPI) — The 42nd season of Esplanade Concerts b ythe Boston Pops Orchestra by the ~~Boston Pops Orchestra~~ Fiedler will open July 13 at 8:30 p.m. at the Hatch Memorial Shell. Fiedler will conduct the opening concert and Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the remainder of the series.

July 8, 1970

Norfolk County Free Press
Norwood, Mass.
July 8, 1970

Outdoor Concerts On the Esplanade

The forty-second season of e outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade begins Monday evening July 13 at 8:30 p.m. with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Following the opening conert, the remainder of the series will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. Concerts on the Esplanade are performed at 8:30 p.m. in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

This season, in collaboration with the Mayor's Summerthing program, four concerts will be played off the Esplanade: at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, July 16 (11:45 am); and Rodgers Park, Brighton, July 16. The three off-Esplanade evening concerts begin at 8 p.m.

There is one special concert for children this year, on the Esplanade, July 22 at 10:15 am, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

Summerthing is produced by the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs under the direction of Katherine D. Kane. The Esplanade Concerts were founded by Arthur Fiedler in 1919 to bring symphonic music to a large public free of charge. Since then, audiences ranging up to 20,000 at a single concert have heard the programs conducted by Mr. Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson.

Messenger (Norwood)
July 8, 1970

Outdoor Concerts On the Esplanade

The forty-second season of free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade begins Monday evening July 13 at 8:30 p.m. with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Following the opening conert, the remainder of the series will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. Concerts on the Esplanade are performed at 8:30 p.m. in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

This season, in collaboration with the Mayor's Summerthing program, four concerts will be played off the Esplanade: at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, July 16 (11:45 am); and Rodgers Park, Brighton, July 16. The three off-Esplanade evening concerts begin at 8 p.m.

There is one special concert for children this year, on the Esplanade, July 22 at 10:15 am, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

Summerthing is produced by the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs under the direction of Katherine D. Kane. The Esplanade Concerts were founded by Arthur Fiedler in 1919 to bring symphonic music to a large public free of charge. Since then, audiences ranging up to 20,000 at a single concert have heard the programs conducted by Mr. Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson.

Graphic (Newton, Mass)
July 9, 1970

Outdoor Concerts On the Esplanade

The forty-second season of free outdoor concerts on the Charles River Esplanade begins Monday evening July 13 at 8:30 p.m. with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Following the opening conert, the remainder of the series will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. Concerts on the Esplanade are performed at 8:30 p.m. in the Hatch Memorial Shell.

This season, in collaboration with the Mayor's Summerthing program, four concerts will be played off the Esplanade: at Bunker Hill, Charlestown, July 14; Smith Field, Hyde Park, July 15; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, July 16 (11:45 am); and Rodgers Park, Brighton, July 16. The three off-Esplanade evening concerts begin at 8 p.m.

There is one special concert for children this year, on the Esplanade, July 22 at 10:15 am, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

Summerthing is produced by the Mayor's Office of Cultural Affairs under the direction of Katherine D. Kane. The Esplanade Concerts were founded by Arthur Fiedler in 1919 to bring symphonic music to a large public free of charge. Since then, audiences ranging up to 20,000 at a single concert have heard the programs conducted by Mr. Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson.

Note: same story appeared in Press (Westwood, Mass) July 8, 1970)

Herald Traveler
July 12, 1970

Music

CLASSICAL

TODAY

Leonard Shure, pianist, in works of Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin and Schumann; Sanders Theater, 8:30 p.m.

Marlboro (Vt.) Music Festival, no program available; 3 p.m.

Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting works of Prokofiev, Schoenberg and Russo; Peter Serkin, piano soloist; Tanglewood, 2:30 p.m.

Eugene Indjic, pianist, in an all-Chopin program; Gardner Museum, 3 p.m.

R. Rice Nutting, organ, in works of Froberger, Soler and Franck; Park St. Church, 6:45 p.m.

Chamber Music Concert, no program available; Bundy Art Gallery, Waitsfield, Vt., 5 p.m.

Mari Tsumura, violin; Alliot Hall, St. Michael's College, Winooski, Vt.; 8 p.m.

MONDAY

Esplanade Concert, Arthur Fiedler conducting works of Chopin, Wagner; Eugene Indjic, piano soloist; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

TUESDAY

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Bunker Hill, Charlestown, 8 p.m.

Hungarian Quartet in works of Beethoven; Colby College, Waterville, Me., 8 p.m.

New Hampshire Festival, Thomas Nee conducting Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte"; Kingswood Aud., Wolfeboro, N. H., 8:30 p.m.

Weston Drama Workshop, Attilio Poto conducting Puccini's "Madame Butterfly"; Country School, Weston, 8:45 p.m.

Masterworks Chorale Summer Sing in a reading of Bloch's "Sacred Service"; Cary Hall, Mass. Ave., Lexington, 8 p.m.

WEDNESDAY

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Smith Field, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.

R. Rice Nutting, organ, in works of de Grigny, Simonds and Alain; Park St. Church, 12:10 p.m.

George Butler, organ, in works of Willan, Vierne, Cundick, Dupre and Sowerby; Methuen Memorial Music Hall, 8:30 p.m.

THURSDAY

Weston Drama Workshop, Attilio Poto conducting Puccini's "Madama Butterfly"; Country School, Weston, 8:45 p.m.

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; City Hall Plaza, Government Center, 11:45 p.m.

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Rodgers Park, Brighton, 8 p.m.

Ann Dànis, violin; John Felice, piano, in works of Bach, Mozart and Brahms; Gardner Museum, 3 p.m.

New Hampshire Festival, Thomas Nee conducting Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte"; Inter-Lakes Aud., Meredith, N. H., 8:30 p.m.

Aeolian Chamber Players in works of Reid, Messiaen, Mozart and Brahms; Smith Aud., Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., 8:15 p.m.

FRIDAY

Esplanade Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

Yuji Takahashi, piano, in works of Bach and Messiaen; Tanglewood, 7 p.m.

Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting works of Haydn, Mozart and Britten; Tanglewood, 9 p.m.

SATURDAY

Weston Drama Workshop, Attilio Poto conducting Puccini's "Madama Butterfly"; Country School, Weston, 8:45 p.m.

Marlboro (Vt.) Music Festival, no program available; 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting works of Mozart; Lili Krauss, piano soloist; Tanglewood, 8:30 p.m.

New Hampshire Festival, Thomas Nee conducting Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte"; Inter-Lakes Aud., Meredith, N. H., 8:30 p.m.

Betty Lou Austin, mezzo; Evelyn Harris, piano, in songs of Vaughan Williams and Dvorak; Gardner Museum, 3 p.m.

Esplanade Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

Berkshire Quartet in works of Blackwood, Schubert and Beethoven; Music Mountain, Falls Village, Conn., 3 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Fiedler Opens Esplanade Concerts July 13

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

FIEDLERIANA — Arthur Fiedler opens the 42nd season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade Monday, July 13, at 8:30 p.m., in the Hatch Memorial Shell. Following opening night, Harry Ellis Dickson assumes the podium for a series of Summerthing concerts at Bunker Hill (July 14), Smith Field (July 15), City Hall Plaza (July 16), and Rodgers Park, Brighton (July 16). All the Summerthing events take place at 8 p.m., with the exception of the 11:45 a.m. City Hall Plaza concert.

Esplanade concerts resume July 17 and 18, and July 20 through 25, with a special children's concert July 22 at 10:15 a.m.

Fiedler, who is celebrating his 75th birth year, his 57th year as a member of the Boston Symphony, and his 41st year as Boston Pops conductor, was recently made an honorary fire chief and citizen of Newton and Waltham.

EUROPEAN TOUR—William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas, Arthur Fiedler, the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops begin a European tour in April, 1971. Among major cities scheduled for concerts are London, Berlin, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Vienna, Paris, Naples and Barcelona. The tour opens in London's Royal Albert Hall with a Pops concert conducted by Arthur Fielder on April 4.

SYMPHONY — The Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra is seeking contributions that will enable it to accept an invitation to participate in the Israel Festival of Music and Drama this August. Also taking part in the festival will be Pablo Casals, Zubin Mehta, Isaac Stern, the Juilliard Quartet, etc. Donations are tax deductible and should be mailed to the orchestra at 855 Commonwealth Ave., Boston 02215.

Boston Globe
July 13, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR" — Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, tonight at 8:30. "Tribal rock" musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, directed by James Sharmon.

THE DORACS — Elma Lewis Playhouse-in-the-Park, Franklin Park, Roxbury, at 8 p.m. Popular music group, formerly of the Doves.

LEONARD SHURE — Sanders Theater, Cambridge, at 8:30. Pianist. Beethoven, Six Variations; Mozart, B flat major Sonata, K. 333; Chopin, Ballades in G minor, Op. 23, and F minor, Op. 52; Schumann, C major Phantasie, Op. 17.

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA—Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade, at 8:30. Founder Arthur Fielder conducting. Chopin, Polonaise Militaire and Piano Concerto No. 1 (Eugene Indjic); Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristam and Isolde" and Overture to "Die Meistersinger." ((The orchestra tours Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday for Summerthing, returns July 17-18 and 20-25 to the Esplanade.)

Boston Globe
July 14, 1970

Summerthing

Today's schedule for Summerthing, Boston's neighborhood festival, is as follows:

- Craftsmobile 1, 156 Monticello st., Columbia Point, 9 a.m.-noon.
- Craftsmobile 2, Parker Hill Playground, 9 a.m.-noon.
- Craftsmobile, Ballou and Jacobs sts., Dorchester, 9 a.m.
- People and Players Theater, Hawthorne House, Roxbury, 10 a.m.
- Earthmobile, Backster and W. 8th sts., South Boston, 10 a.m.-1 p.m.
- Plantmobile, Baptist Church, Hyde Park, 10:45 a.m.
- Drama Workshop for Children, Municipal Building, Chestnut Hill av., Brighton, 10:45 a.m.
- Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, Joyce Kilmer School, West Roxbury, 11 a.m.
- Musicians Union Band Concert, Boston Common, noon-2 p.m.
- Craftsmobile, Ames st. parking lot, Dorchester, 1 p.m.
- Theatermobile, Suzi Linn and her puppets, Roach and Dorchester av., Dorchester, 2 p.m.
- Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, North sq., North End, 2 p.m.
- Craftsmobile 1, Cornwall Playground, Jamaica Plain, 2-5 p.m.
- Craftsmobile 2, St. Angeles Schoolyard, Mattapan, 2-5 p.m.
- The Proposition Children's Show, Billings Field, West Roxbury, 2 p.m.
- People and Players Theater, Castle sq., South End, 2 p.m.
- Theatermobile, Funny Little Theater, Orient Heights Beach, East Boston, 3:30 p.m.
- Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, Ashmont Station, Dorchester, 4 p.m.
- Country Dance, Fenway Basketball Courts, 7:30 p.m.
- Ronald Ingraham Gospel Choir, Suffolk Downs, East Boston, 7:30 p.m.
- Moviebus, Baptist Church, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.
- Boston Pops, Bunker Hill Monument, 8 p.m.
- Musicwagon, Columbus Park, South Boston, 8 p.m.
- Mark Harvey's Jazz Rock Ensemble, Fallon Field, West Roxbury, 8 p.m.
- Block Party, Orchard Park, 8 p.m.
- Rock Concert, MDC Rink, Jamaica Plain, 8 p.m.
- Feria Italiana, North sq., North End, 7-10 p.m.
- Multimedia, Cathedral Project, South End, 8:30 p.m.

Boston Globe
July 14, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR"—Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, tonight at 8:30. "Tribal rock" musical accenting peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, and directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS" —Charles Playhouse, through Sept. 6, tonight at 8:30. Hit musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

SHORTY BILLUPS, THE RAYS-STARS—Elma Lewis Playhouse-in-the-Park, Franklin Park, Roxbury, at 8 p.m. Performers of Expo '67.

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA — Summerthing, Bunker Hill Monument, Charlestown, at 8. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting. Langendoen, Spirit of 1776 March; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5; The Star-Spangled Banner; Irish Suite; Loewe, "My Fair Lady" medley; Sousa, "The Stars and Stripes Forever.

Evening at Pop

A conspicuous exception to the hot weather froth on the commercial scene is Public Television's "Evening at Pops" with Arthur Fiedler, which is bringing the fine music of the unique organization to the nation Sunday nights at 10.

The most recent edition, featuring pianist Peter Nero in an all-Gershwin program, was a particular delight, with the noted keyboard artist showing his wizardry both in the set, semi-classical mold of "Rhapsody in Blue" and in the rippling improvisions of such tunes as "Embraceable You" and "Our Love Is Here to Stay" with the trio and "I've Got Rhythm" with the band.

The only fault to be found was a slight unevenness in the sound, particularly in the early stages.

Boston After Dark
July 14, 1970

CLASSICAL MUSIC

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL, Tanglewood, Lenox. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. For ticket info: (1-413-637-1600).

July 17: 7 pm: Weekend Prelude, Yuji Takahashi.

9 pm: SEIJI OZAWA conducts Haydn: Symphony no 86; Xenakis: Eonta, Britten: Serenade for tenor, horn & strings; Ibert: Divertissement. YUJI TAKAHASHI, JOHN ALEXANDER, JAMES STAGLIANO, soloists.

July 18: 10:30 am: Open Rehearsal.

8:30 pm: SEIJI OZAWA conducts MOZART program: Serenade no 10 for 13 wind instruments, piano concerto in D minor K. 466. Lili Kraus, piano.

July 19: 2 pm: MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conducts Haydn: Symphony no. 98; J.S. Bach: Cantata no. 51 "Jauchzet Gott"; Krenek: "Die Nachtigall"; Stravinsky: Pulcinella Suite. Bethany Beardslee, solo.

ISABELLA STEWART GARDNER MUSEUM, 2 Palace Rd, Bos. (LO 6-1401).

All recitals begin at 3 pm.

July 16: Ann Danis, violin.

July 18: Betty-Lou Austin, Mezzo-Soprano.

July 19: Composers String Quartet playing Mozart, Beethoven.

NEW CLEVELAND QUARTET, Sanders Theatre, Camb. Ticket info: (864-2630). Performing MON, July 20: 8:30 pm: Beethoven: Quintet in C major, op. 29; Bartok: Quartet No. 4; Brahms: Sextet in B-flat major, op. 18. assisted by Raphael Hillyer, viola, and Leslie Parnas, cello.

BOSTON POPS ESPLANADE SEASON:

Boston Pops Esplanade Season:
Harry Ellis Dickinson conducts—
July 14: Bunker Hill, Charlestown, 8 p.m.
July 15: Smith Field, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.

July 16: Rodgers Park, Brighton, 8 p.m.
July 17, 18: Esplanade, 8:30 p.m
July 20-25: Esplanade, 8:30 p.m.

It's out of Hatch Memorial Shell and off to the shadow of Bunker Hill Monument for men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Harry Ellis Dickson. As part of the Summerthing, the orchestra is taking its Esplanade concerts to spots throughout the city. First of these was High st. in Charlestown, where 2500 were in attendance.
—Record American Photo, Ray Lussier

Herald Traveler
July 7, 1970

DIAL CHATTER LINE 338-6666

Advice Wanted On Reception for Fall Wedding

DEAR NANCY:

We are in the delightful dilemma of planning a small, late afternoon wedding reception the first week in September. It seemed such a simple and lovely idea to begin with, but now due to conflicting ideas and opinions, even the flowers are beginning to wilt.

I hope and trust that among the many Chatter Liners who have either been guests or have actually planned such an affair successfuly, that some will be willing to share their ideas and experiences.

As menus and caterers are of prime concern, does anyone know of a caterer who specializes in garden-type parties? Particularly a caterer who can provide all services including the rental of chairs, tables, linens, etc.

We would also appreciate knowing of any pitfalls to avoid so that the beauty and dignity of the day will not be marred. Fortunately, we do have three of the main ingredients: a pretty garden, a beautiful bride, but most of all, love.

THE GARDEN GREMLIN

In a Fine Hand

DEAR BALL OF FIRE:

Recently our church had a testimonial inscribed in old English script done by a very fine engraver. I enjoyed his work so much I am having him address the envelopes and write the place cards for my daughter's wedding.

Among his samples was an elegantly inscribed and framed poem that seems to be very much on the idea of what you are looking for. His name is Sam Foilb and his telephone number is 296-6577.

MRS. BARBARA EGAN

DEAR BALL OF FIRE:

Regarding your inquiry as to where one might get a poem printed in old-fashioned script, may I recommend my services to you and anyone else interested in this type of work. I am at present trying to make a go of a small hand-lettering practice. I have samples of my work, lettering and illuminations in colors, at 105 Peterborough Street, Boston 02215. Call me if you are interested at 536-5649.

RUTH M. JACKSON

Problems with "Tops"

DEAR CHATTER LINE:

I recently purchased a maple kitchen set with a laminated table top. This top is wood grained and stays rather dull and streaky when wiped off with either a damp or dry cloth. Does anyone have a remedy for this condition or know of a special polish?

Also, I've heard from several sources that massaging the scalp with olive oil retards the growth of gray hair. This sounds ridiculous! Has anyone had any experience with it?

H.W.

Unsolicited Credit Cards

DEAR NANCY:

Yesterday, we had to pick up a registered letter at our local post office because we were not home when our mailman delivered. In 85 degree heat, and in the 4:30 p.m. traffic, we spent 20 minutes to do this—only to find it to be an unsolicited credit card sent to us by a Boston bank at the cost of 86 cents to them.

To say we were cross, would be putting it mildly. Time and effort wasted all around, Can something be done about this most annoying and growing situation?

MRS. A.M., LEXINGTON

Boston's Finest

DEAR HELLO TO MASS:

I suggest the swanboats at the Boston Public Garden for an inexpensive way for you and your husband and little son to have an outing. Also, there will be free concerts at the Esplanade directed by Arthur Fiedler.

TOOSER

THESE TWO activities are uniquely Boston. The schedule for the Boston Pops concerts at the Hatch Shell is as follows: concerts beginning at 8:30 p.m. on July 13, 17, 18 and 20 through 25; children's concert July 22 at 10:15 a.m.

Nancy Carson

A FEW WORDS OF ADVICE from the old maestro, Brookline's Arthur Fiedler, to soloist Eugene Indjic, soloist at the Monday evening Boston Pops concert at the Esplanade. (Photo by Charles Allen)

Citizen Item
July 16, 1970

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

Back Bay Ledger
July 16, 1970

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

Chronicle-Citizen
July 16, 1970

Page

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

Back Bay Ledger
July 16, 1970

EVERY SEAT IN THE HOUSE was filled--or every seat on the grass, as the Esplanade concerts got underway for their 42nd season Monday night, with its favorite conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler & Co. bathes Esplanade in lyric glow

By Louis Snyder
Music critic of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

People . . . people . . . quick-stepping across Boston Common and the Public Garden, from up and down Beacon Street, and through the gas-lit passages off Charles. Carrying beach chairs and blankets and babies, with youngsters tagging along, dogs on and off leashes, snowy-haired citizens and the young Levied set, serious singletons and exuberant young marrieds — all converging on the Esplanade, milling over the Fiedler Bridge, slowing Storrow Drive traffic—on a night made to order, cool but not chill, with a waxing moon and a mare's tail decorating an otherwise open sky.

They arrived to find a carpet of humanity already stretched out around Hatch Shell. Benches and folding chairs had long since been taken. ("Are there two people-places there?") But everyone found space somewhere, somehow, on pillows and folding contraptions brought from home, on fences, in trees, leaning against statues, or perched on stumps or hydrants or protuberances nobody ever noticed were there.

An animated picket fence was silhouetted against the Charles on the lagoon side, and still they kept arriving, threading their way through the smiling, peering, chattering, laughing, silent music-loving constituency of Boston. Age, color, and income bracket were indistinguishable in the general euphoria of the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Esplanade concerts.

Chopin to begin

The big shell glowed like a rosy-golden conch as WHDH's Vin Maloney came out before the white-jacketed orchestra to offer a gentlemanly greeting and introduce Mayor Kevin H. White. The concerts' 42nd season, gratitude to sponsors, a 75th-birthday anniversary — the moment that all those people had hurried here to share: the appearance of staunch, white-haired, rosy-cheeked, beaming Arthur Fiedler, baton in hand. The great boundless, varicolored mass out front swept to its feet with the roar of a tidal wave, spattering back applause at the amplified sounds from the stage, and then subsided as quickly as it had risen, when Mr. Fiedler, never one to dally where musicmaking is concerned, finished bowing and brought audience and orchestra to order with arms raised.

What followed was music in the Fiedler-Boston Symphony tradition — Glazunov's stirring setting of Chopin's Military Polonaise, a first-rate performance of Chopin's First Piano Concerto with Boston's talented young Eugene Indjic as soloist, then an intermission to stretch, look for a better situation, or defend your present one against all comers.

After the national anthem, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" — music to hear with eyes closed, or while watching stars appear, or holding hands a little tighter than before. Here and there, absorbed, were listeners one might more readily associate with "Let It Be," side by side with others perhaps remembering Karl Muck's reading of the Wagner with the BSO, or a Flagstad performance at the old Met.

Then the invigorating "Meistersinger" overture to bring everyone back to earth for a great string-filled, brass-crowing, sky-reaching finish. Long applause, bows, cheers, and waving at the players on the stage. Then picking up and moving off this musical island and back into town.

Esplanade concerts

Smith Field, Hyde Park

Wednesday, July 15, 8:00
Harry Ellis Dickson conducting

Triumphal March, from "Aida"	Verdi
Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Op. 95 "From the New World"	Dvorák
The Star-Spangled Banner
Selections from the "Irish Suite"	Anderson
Selections from "The Sound of Music"	Rodgers
The Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa

Christian Science Monitor
July 15, 1970

Herald Traveler

staggers toward the water cooler, hanging on to the desks—wheezing and gasping. Garbo as Camille was nothing compared to this broad.

We are sick of her performances and want to know what to do. —Alabama Gripe

DEAR A: Sorry, I'm with Camille. The air in the office is just as much hers as it is yours. You do not have the right to pollute it.

If you must smoke, go to the ladies room or out in the corridor—or to the lunch room.

★ ★ ★

DEAR ANN LANDERS:

My best girl friend (I'll call her Gert) confided in me seven months ago. She and Todd (my first cousin) got married secretly. Todd was drafted two months later. He is now in Vietnam.

It's none of my business but Gert has been dating a bum. I know the guy and he's not the type who would settle for a goodnight kiss.

I'm sick about the rotten deal Gert is giving Todd. I write to him twice a week. In his letters to me he keeps asking why she's too busy to write. I think he has an idea something is wrong. Shall I give him the word?

—On The Verge

DEAR ON: Get off it and keep the word to yourself. Your cousin can wait until he gets home to learn the glad tidings. When I was in Vietnam visiting our boys in the hospitals, the saddest kids I saw were the one who had received Dear Johns. It's the cruelest blow a man in the service can get. Don't de-

Citizen Item
July 16, 1970

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

Back Bay Hedger
July 16, 1970

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

Chronicle-Citizen
July 16, 1970

Page

Pops concert set today at City Hall

The Boston Pops concerts will move from its traditional Esplanade location for a special performance, to be given this morning (Thursday, July 16) as part of Summerthing.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the program, at 11:45 a.m., at City Hall Plaza in Government Center.

reader who feared her cat was a homosexual because he showd no interest in nice, healthy, girl cats.

Perhaps you'd be interested in Dr. Warren Thomas' view on that subject. Until recently, Dr. Thomas was director of the Henry Doorly Zoo in Omaha. Soon he will take over the directorship of a new zoo in Brownsville, Texas. Dr. Thomas was reluctant to attempt analysis of the cat in question, but he made these general observations:

"Animals are subject to various forms of abnormal sexual expression, but not to the extent found in humans. Higher species of animals, such as the apes, are most likely to indulge in apparent homosexual behavior. But this is not due to a psychological abnormality. It may be a matter of circumstances—such as two males being confined together without female companionship."

Another fact involving apes in captivity: "They know nothing about sex unless it is demonstrated by older members of the species. Apes have an instinctive sex drive, but they are not born with the knowledge of what to do about it. Some strange behavior can result. For example, we once had an orangutan who fell madly in love with a boot."

Thought you'd like to know, Ann. — Robert McMorris — Omaha World Herald

Back Bay Hedger
July 16, 1970

EVERY SEAT IN THE HOUSE was filled--or every seat on the grass, as the Esplanade concerts got underway for their 42nd se ason Monday night, with its favorite conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Chronicle-Citizen
Brookline, Mass July 16, 1970

A FEW WORDS OF ADVICE from the old maestro, Brookline's Arthur Fiedler, to soloist Eugene Indjic, soloist at the Monday evening Boston Pops concert at the Esplanade. (Photo by Charles Allen)

Fiedler & Co. bathes Esplanade in lyric glow

By Louis Snyder
Music critic of The Christian Science Monitor
Boston

People . . . people . . . quick-stepping across Boston Common and the Public Garden, from up and down Beacon Street, and through the gas-lit passages off Charles. Carrying beach chairs and blankets and babies, with youngsters tagging along, dogs on and off leashes, snowy-haired citizens and the young Levied set, serious singletons and exuberant young marrieds — all converging on the Esplanade, milling over the Fiedler Bridge, slowing Storrow Drive traffic—on a night made to order, cool but not chill, with a waxing moon and a mare's tail decorating an otherwise open sky.

They arrived to find a carpet of humanity already stretched out around Hatch Shell. Benches and folding chairs had long since been taken. ("Are there two people-places there?") But everyone found space somewhere, somehow, on pillows and folding contraptions brought from home, on fences, in trees, leaning against statues, or perched on stumps or hydrants or protuberances nobody ever noticed were there.

An animated picket fence was silhouetted against the Charles on the lagoon side, and still they kept arriving, threading their way through the smiling, peering, chattering, laughing, silent music-loving constituency of Boston. Age, color, and income bracket were indistinguishable in the general euphoria of the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Esplanade concerts.

Chopin to begin

The big shell glowed like a rosy-golden conch as WHDH's Vin Maloney came out before the white-jacketed orchestra to offer a gentlemanly greeting and introduce Mayor Kevin H. White. The concerts' 42nd season, gratitude to sponsors, a 75th-birthday anniversary — the moment that all those people had hurried here to share: the appearance of staunch, white-haired, rosy-cheeked, beaming Arthur Fiedler, baton in hand. The great boundless, varicolored mass out front swept to its feet with the roar of a tidal wave, spattering back applause at the amplified sounds from the stage, and then subsided as quickly as it had risen, when Mr. Fiedler, never one to dally where musicmaking is concerned, finished bowing and brought audience and orchestra to order with arms raised.

What followed was music in the Fiedler-Boston Symphony tradition — Glazunov's stirring setting of Chopin's Military Polonaise, a first-rate performance of Chopin's First Piano Concerto with Boston's talented young Eugene Indjic as soloist, then an intermission to stretch, look for a better situation, or defend your present one against all comers.

After the national anthem, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" — music to hear with eyes closed, or while watching stars appear, or holding hands a little tighter than before. Here and there, absorbed, were listeners one might more readily associate with "Let It Be," side by side with others perhaps remembering Karl Muck's reading of the Wagner with the BSO, or a Flagstad performance at the old Met.

Then the invigorating "Meistersinger" overture to bring everyone back to earth for a great string-filled, brass-crowing, sky-reaching finish. Long applause, bows, cheers, and waving at the players on the stage. Then picking up and moving off this musical island and back into town.

Esplanade concerts

Smith Field, Hyde Park

Wednesday, July 15, 8:00
Harry Ellis Dickson conducting

Triumphal March, from "Aida"	Verdi
Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Op. 95 "From the New World"	Dvořák
The Star-Spangled Banner
Selections from the "Irish Suite"	Anderson
Selections from "The Sound of Music"	Rodgers
The Stars and Stripes Forever	Sousa

Christian Science Monitor
July 15, 1970

190

Boston Herald Traveler July 14, 1970

Esplanade Sound Off—Fiedler Sounds Off

By DENNIS SULLIVAN
HT Staff Reporter

Twenty thousand persons jammed the Esplanade last night to hear and admire Arthur Fiedler, as much for himself as for his conducting of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Fiedler was furious. The crowd, he said, "is wonderful"; the music, fine; but of the amplification of the music —what the 20,000 heard—he said it was "certainly lousy."

"I almost walked off, I almost quit in the middle," he said during intermission, with his white hair wagging with every fretting turn he made.

"IT'S WONDERFUL to have all these people here," he said, "but if we're going to have these concerts, we must give them good music."

The problem, according to his 18-year-old son Peter, was interference with the electrical system in the Hatch Memorial Shell from a radio station at Emerson College.

His father, said Peter, is a perfectionist and what he says of his concerts and how much enjoyment they bring to an audience are different.

The crowd on the Charles River banks appeared hypnotized by Chopin, Wagner, the "Star Spangled Banner" and Arthur Fiedler.

People in wheelchairs, scores of babies, bike riders, boaters moored to the grassy banks listened to music without a sound and waited with anticipation when Fiedler fretted.

THE CONCERT WAS the first of the summer, Fiedler's only appearance during this 42nd season of Esplanade concerts. The program was dedicated to his 75th birthday season. He was 75 last December.

Fiedler arrived yesterday from San Francisco where he is conducting a similar summer concert series. He returns there today.

He said he never looks tired because, "I was born tired."

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by Harry Trask)
ARTHUR FIEDLER winces at a noise from sound system.

Herald Traveler July 13, 1970

Theater Tonight

"HAIR"—The rock musical about things contemporary, written by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by James Sherman at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

Esplanade Concert, Arthur Fiedler conducting works of Chopin and Wagner; Eugene Indjic, piano soloist; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

Record American July 13, 1970

Fiedler Will Open Esplanade Season

Arthur Fiedler conducts the opening concert of the two week 1970 Esplanade season at Hatch Memorial Shell tonight at 8:30 p. m. The concert opens with two pieces by Frederick Chopin, Polonaise Militaire and the Piano concerto no. 2 with Eugene Indjic as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Esplanade Orchestra in two pieces by Richard Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Overture to "Meistersinger."

Theater Tonight

"HAIR" — The rock musical about things contemporary, written by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by Jerome Sherman, at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonite at 8:30.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—The long running off-Broadway musical based on Rel's music and lyrics directed by Eric Blau at the Charles Playhouse. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

SUMMERTHING SYMPHONY CONCERT, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Bunker Hill, Charlestown, 8 p.m.

Christian Science Monitor July 14, 1970

Esplanade concerts

At Bunker Hill, Charlestown

Tuesday, July 14, 8:00
Harry Ellis Dickson conducting

March, Spirit of 1776 ..... Langendoen
Symphony no. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
The Star-Spangeled Banner
Irish Suite ..... Anderson
Selections from "My Fair Lady" ..... Loewe
The Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa

Summerthing schedule for today

Today's schedule for Summerthing, Boston's neighborhood festival, is as follows:

Craftsmobile 1, Parkins Schoolyard, South Boston, 9 a.m.-noon.

Craftsmobile 2, Archdale Project, West Roxbury, 9 a.m.-noon.

Craftsmobile, Walsh Playground, Dorchester, 9 a.m.

Theatremobile, Suzi Linn and her puppets, Dever School, Columbia Point, 10 a.m.

Earthmobile, Backster and W 8th sts., South Boston, 10 a.m.-1 p.m.

Theatremobile, Funny Little Theatre, St. Anthony's Church, Brighton, 11:30 a.m.

Musicians Union Band Concert, Boston Common, noon-2 p.m.

Craftsmobile, Tenean Beach, Dorchester, 1 p.m.

Dress-up Parade, Charles and Beacon sts., Beacon Hill, 1 p.m.

Craftsmobile, Cluny ct., Orchard Park, 2-5 p.m.

Craftsmobile 2, Trotter Schoolyard, Roxbury, 2-5 p.m.

Theatremobile, Suzi Linn and her puppets, Almont Playground, Mattapan, 2 p.m.

People and Players Theatre, Montana st., Roxbury, 2:30 p.m.

Youth Unlimited, Walker Playground, Dorchester, 2:30 p.m.

Theatremobile, Funny Little Theatre, 8th st. Playground, South End, 3:30 p.m.

People and Players Theatre, Molten, Charlestown, 6:30 p.m.

Feria Italiana, North sq., North End, 7-10 p.m.

Mark Harvey Jazz Rock Concert, Legion Field, East Boston, 7:30 p.m.

Boston Pops, Smith Field, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.

Rock Concert, Almont Playground, Mattapan, 8 p.m.

Rock Concert, Castle sq., South End, 8 p.m.

African Wilderness Slide Show, Building 19 Main, Parker Hill-Fenway, 8 p.m.

Moviebus, Rogers Park, Brighton, 8:30 p.m.

Multimedia, Bromley-Heath, Jamaica Plain, 8:30 p.m.

Schaefer Music Festival, Ike and Tina Turner, Voices of East Harlem, Harvard Stadium, 8 p.m.

Stage, music

"HAIR" — Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, today at 2 and tonight at 8:30. Popular "tribal rock" musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Gait MacDermot, and directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS" — Charles Playhouse, through Sept. 6, tonight at 8:30. Hit musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA — Summerthing, Smith Field, Hyde Park, at 8. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting. Verdi, Triumphal March from "Aida"; Dvorak, "New World" Symphony; The Star-Spangled Banner; Anderson, Irish Suite; Rodgers, "Sound of Music" medley; Sousa, The Stars and Stripes Forever.

Boston Globe July 16, 1970

Summerthing Schedule

Today's schedule for Summerthing, Boston's Neighborhood Festival, is as follows:

- Craftsmobile, Training Field, Charlestown, 9 a.m.-noon.
- Craftsmobile, Blackwood Street, Parker Hill, 9 a.m.-noon.
- Senior Citizen Beauty Workshop, leaving Little City Hall to Dale Academy Boston, Charlestown, 9:30 a.m.
- Craftsmobile, Norwell and Athewold streets, Dorchester, 9 a.m.
- People and Players Theatre, Readville Playground, Readville street, Hyde Park, 10 a.m.
- Theatremobile, Coleman and Quincy streets, Dorchester, 10 a.m.
- Earthmobile, Baxter and W. 8th streets, South Boston, 10 a.m.-1 p.m.
- Summerthing Hair-Do's for the elderly, Parker Hill-Fenway: to Boylston street, Dale Hairdressing School, 10 a.m. and 11:30 a.m.
- Drama Workshop, Stage I, Walker Playground, Mattapan, 10:45 a.m.
- Craftsmobile, Behind 26 Montpelier st., Columbia Point, 11:30 a.m.
- Theatremobile, Funny Little Theatre, Behind 156 Montpelier st., Columbia Point, 11:30 a.m.
- Boston Pops, City Hall Plaza, 11:45 a.m.
- Street Corner Ensemble, Polk and Bunkerhill streets, Charlestown, 11 a.m.
- Musicians' Union Band Concert, Boston Common, noon-2 p.m.
- Craftsmobile, Leo Austin Jr. Square, Dorchester, 1 p.m.
- Theatremobile, St. Leo's Church, Dorchester, 2 p.m.
- Craftsmobile No. 1, Lyman School, Paris street, East Boston, 2-5 p.m.
- Craftsmobile No. 2, 10 Lamartine st., Jamaica Plain-Bromley Heath, 2-5 p.m.
- Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, Jamaica Plain, 2 p.m.
- People and Players Theatre, North Square, North End, 2 p.m.
- Drama Workshop, Stage I, Cooper Community Center, Roxbury, 2:45 p.m.
- Theatremobile, Wentworth Parking Lot, Fenway, 3:30 p.m.
- Street Corner Ensemble, South Boston, 4 p.m.
- Feria Italiana, North End, North Square, 7-10 p.m.
- Wrestling Matches, MDC Rink, Charlestown, 8 p.m.
- Boston Pops, Rogers Park, Allston, 8 p.m.
- Brooklyn Bridge, MDC Shell, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.
- Rock Concert, Athletic Field, Columbia Point, 8 p.m.
- Movie, Prado, North End, 8 p.m.
- Mark Harvey Jazz Concert, Leo Austin Jr. Square, Bowdoin avenue, Dorchester, 8 p.m.
- Moviebus, Beechland Project, West Roxbury, 8:30 p.m.
- Rock Concert, Ceylon Park, Roxbury, 8:30 p.m.

Stage, music

"HAIR"—Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, tonight at 8:30. Peace, love and tolerance, to the tune of "tribal rock." Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, and directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—Charles Playhouse, through Sept. 6, tonight at 8:30. Hit musical based the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

"THE PROPOSITION" — 241 Hampshire Street, Inman Sq., Cambridge

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA — Summerthing. At 11:45 a.m., at Government Center, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Handel-Harty, Water Music; Brown-Langendoen, Bostonia Suite; Copland, Hoedown; Richard Rodgers Waltzes; Bernstein, "West Side Story" medley; The Star-Spangled Banner. At 8 p.m. at Rogers Park, Brighton, Dickson conducting Elgar, Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1; Rossini, "William Tell" Overture; Hummel E flat major Trumpet Concerto (James Sauber); The Star-Spangled Banner; Tchaikovsky, Marche Slave; Strauss, Tales of the Vienna Woods; Leigh, "Man of La Mancha" tonight at 8 and 10.

Herald Traveler
July 15, 1970

Summerthing Today

9-12 noon—Craftsmobile No. 1, South Boston: Old Colony Hse. Prol. Parkins Sch. Yrd.

9-12 noon—Craftsmobile No. 2, West Roxbury-Roslindale: Archdale Prol.

9 a.m.—Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Walsh Plyd.

9 a.m.—Theatremobile-Suzi Linn and her Puppets, Columbia Point: Dever Sch.

10-1 p.m.—Earthmobile, South Boston: between Backster & W. 8th.

11:30 a.m.—Theatremobile—Funny Little Theatre, Allston-Brighton: St. Anthony's Hilton St.

12-2 p.m.—Musician's Union Band Concert, Boston: The Commons.

1 p.m.—Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Tenean Beach.

1 p.m.—Dress-Up Parade, Beacon Hill-Back Bay: Meeting at Charlestown & Beacon Str. Corner.

2-5 p.m.—Craftsmobile No. 1, Orchard Park: Cluny Crt.

2-5 p.m.—Craftsmobile No. 2, Roxbury: Trotter Sch Yrd.

2 p.m.—Theatremobile—Suzi Linn and Her Puppets, Mattapan: Almont Plyd.

2:30 p.m — People and Player's Theatre, Roxbury: Montana St. Theatre.

2:30 p.m.—Youth Unlimited, Dorchester: Walker Plyd. Norfolk & Woodrow Ave.

3:30 p.m.—Theatremobile—Funny Little Theatre, South End: 8th Str. Plyd.

4:30 p.m.—People and Player's Theatre, Charlestown: Molten.

7-10 p.m.—Feria Italiana, North End: North Sq.

7:30 p.m.—Mark Harvey Jazz Rock Concert, East Boston: American Legion Field.

7:30 p.m.—Square Dance, West Roxbury-Roslindale:

8 p.m.—Boston Pops, Hyde Park: Smith Field.

8 p.m.—Rock Concert (Eagle), Mattapan: Almont Plyd.

8 p.m.—Rock-Soul Concert (Sinclavrs). South End: Castle Sq.

8 p.m.—African Wilderness Slide Show Frederick Tudor, Parker Hill-Fenway: Bld. 19 Main.

8:30 p.m.—Moviebus, Allston-Brighton: Rogers Prk.

8:30 p.m.—Multimedia, Jamaica Plain-Bromley-Heath: Lot off Bickford.

8 p.m.—Schaefer Music Festival: Ike and Tina Turner, Voices of East Harlem, Harvard Stadium.

Theater Tonight

"HAIR"—The rock musical about things contemporary written by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by Janis Sherman at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonight at 8:30. Matinee at 2.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—The long running off-Broadway musical based on Brel's music and lyrics, directed by Eric Blau at the Charles Playhouse. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Smith Field, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.

R. Rice Nutting, organ, in works of de Grigny, Simonds and Alain; Park St. Church, 12:10 p.m.

In and About Boston Today

DRAMA

LOEB DRAMA CENTER, 64, Brattle St. Cambridge—8:30 p.m., performance of Samuel Beckett's "Waiting for Godot."

FASHION

SHERATON BOSTON—noon to 2 p.m. fashion show at the pool.

MEETING

SUMMER READING CLUB—10 a.m. South Boston Branch Library.

CONFERENCE

AMERICAN SOCIETY OF CIVIL ENGINEERS — national meeting at Statler Hilton.

CHILDREN

JORDAN MARSH—3 Ring Animated Circus, 7th floor of Boston store. Open regular store hours and admission is free.

MEMORIAL PARK, READING—11 a.m. and 2 p.m. free performance by Boston Children's Theater Stagemobile.

MUSIC

ARLINGTON STREET CHURCH—8 p.m. benefit violin concert by 16-year-olds Robin Yuan and Rose Ann Markow.

HARVARD STADIUM—8 p.m. Voices of East Harlem.

PARK STREET CHURCH—12:10 p.m. free organ concert by R. Rice Nutting.

SMITH FIELD, HYDE PARK—8 p.m. free performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Send items for daily listing—one week in advance—to "In And About Boston", Boston Herald Traveler, Boston, 02106.

School Offers to Aid Esplanade Concerts

A Back Bay school's educational radio station yesterday offered to take its facility off the air during future Esplanade concerts if the sound system defects cannot be corrected in time.

The next scheduled concert with Arthur Fiedler conducting is Friday at 8:30 p.m. The famed conductor complained Monday at the opening concert that the music sound system was interfered with by the nearby radio signal.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUL - 1970

New England Newsclip

CONDUCTED TOUR

Two years ago, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra first ventured off the Esplanade, an otherwise warm reception in Franklin Park was spoiled by rock throwing, a hazard as much to precious instruments and pride as physical safety. Understandably, Symphony musicians were less than enthusiastic about the prospect of more such concerts.

This season, the Orchestra, in an effort again to become better friends with the larger community (and to venture vice versa), has joined Summerthing. To be sure, once a year for two weeks the Orchestra plays free on the Charles River banks, a civic gesture initiated by Arthur Fiedler in 1929. But while the Esplanade is convenient for Beacon Hill and Back Bay residents, it is a cumbersome trip even by car from Charlestown or Brighton, for example—a point brought home to Symphony Hall representative David Rockefeller when Summerthing's director drove him to areas of the city lying far from the picturesque bend in the river. So with support from Summerthing, four free Boston Symphony concerts will be given this year in other neighborhoods: Bunker Hill in Charlestown, Hyde Park, Government Center, and Brighton. The programs will be classical, although the conductor, Harry Ellis Dickson, allows that an Irish melody might be heard in Charlestown.

Record American
July 15, 1970

Soundmen Fix System For Concert

The MDC and a sound expert assured Esplanade concert lovers—and Maestro Arthur Fiedler—yesterday the static clunkers that spoiled Monday night's program will be cleared up in time for Friday's performance.

The radio station at a nearby college was the prime suspect in the discordancy that plagued one of four amplifiers.

Milton Cook, MDC coordinator of concerts on the Charles, said "everything will be straightened out by Friday."

Tony Silvestri, sound engineer in charge of the amplifying system, guaranteed elimination of the interference.

Cook said only one of the battery of amplifiers had been affected by picking up the squeals and squawks.

"Mr. Pops" said the result was "certainly lousy."

Cook promised no further trouble adding, "great musicians deserve a great sound system."

ESPLANADE CONCERTS
Tonight at 8:00
Smith Field, Hyde Park
Harry Ellis Dickson Conducting
PROGRAM

Polonaise, from "Eugen Onegin" —Tchaikovsky

Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Op. 95 "From the New World" —Dvorak
I. Adagio; Allegro molto
II. Largo
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace
IV. Allegro con fuoco

The Star-Spangled Banner

From the "Irish Suite" —Anderson

Selection from "South Pacific" —Rodgers

The Stars and Stripes Forever —Sousa

Boston Globe July 17, 1970

THOUGHTFUL FACES—Some of the many people who sat quietly listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance yesterday at City Hall are transfixed by the music. (Joseph Dennehy photo)

AGELESS MUSIC of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enjoyed by several generations at City Hall yesterday. (Photo by Joseph Dennehy)

Herald Traveler
July 15, 1970

Summerthing Today

9-12 noon—Craftsmobile No. 1, South Boston: Old Colony Hse. Prol. Parkins Sch. Yrd

9-12 noon—Craftsmobile No. 2, West Roxbury-Roslindale: Archdale Prol.

9 a.m.—Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Walsh Plyd.

9 a.m.—Theatremobile-Suzi Linn and her Puppets, Columbia Point: Dever Sch.

10-1 p.m.—Earthmobile, South Boston: between Backster & W. 8th.

11:30 a.m.—Theatremobile—Funny Little Theatre, Allston-Brighton: St. Anthony's Hilton St.

12-2 p.m.—Musician's Union Band Concert, Boston: The Commons.

1 p.m.—Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Tenean Beach.

1 p.m.—Dress-up Parade, Beacon Hill-Back Bay: Meeting at Charlestown & Beacon Str. Corner.

2-5 p.m.—Craftsmobile No. 1, Orchard Park: Cluny Crt:

2-5 p.m.—Craftsmobile No. 2, Roxbury: Trotter Sch Yrd.

2 p.m.—Theatremobile—Suzi Linn and Her Puppets, Mattapan: Almont Plyd.

2:30 p.m — People and Player's Theatre, Roxbury: Montana St. Theatre.

2:20 p.m.—Youth Unlimited, Dorchester: Walker Plyd. Norfolk & Woodrow Ave.

3:30 p.m.—Theatremobile—Funny Little Theatre, South End: 8th Str. Plyd.

6:30 p.m.—People and Player's Theatre, Charlestown: Molten.

7-10 p.m.—Feria Italiana, North End: North Sq.

7:30 p.m.—Mark Harvey Jazz Rock Concert, East Boston: American Legion Field.

7:30 p.m.—Square Dance, West Roxbury-Roslindale:

8 p.m.—Boston Pops, Hyde Park: Smith Field.

8 p.m.—Rock Concert (Eagle), Mattapan: Almont Plyd.

8 p.m.—Rock-Soul Concert (Sinclayrs), South End: Castle Sq.

8 p.m.—African Wilderness Slide Show Frederick Tudor, Parker Hill-Fenway: Bld. 19 Main.

8:30 p.m.—Moviebus, Allston-Brighton: Rogers Prk.

8:30 p.m.—Multimedia, Jamaica Plain-Bromley-Heath: Lot off Bickford.

8 p.m.—Schaefer Music Festival: Ike and Tina Turner, Voices of East Harlem, Harvard Stadium.

Theater Tonight

"HAIR"—The rock musical about things contemporary written by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by Jams Sherman at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonight at 8:30. Matinee at 2.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—The long running off-Broadway musical based on Brel's music and lyrics, directed by Eric Blau at the Charles Playhouse. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

Summerthing Symphony Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Smith Field, Hyde Park, 8 p.m.

R. Rice Nutting, organ, in works of de Grigny, Simonds and Alain; Park St. Church, 12:10 p.m.

In and About Boston Today

DRAMA

LOEB DRAMA CENTER, 64, Brattle St. Cambridge—8:30 p.m. performance of Samuel Beckett's "Waiting for Godot."

FASHION

SHERATON BOSTON—noon to 2 p.m. fashion show at the pool.

MEETING

SUMMER READING CLUB—10 a.m. South Boston Branch Library.

CONFERENCE

AMERICAN SOCIETY OF CIVIL ENGINEERS — national meeting at Statler Hilton.

CHILDREN

JORDAN MARSH—3 Ring Animated Circus, 7th floor of Boston store. Open regular store hours and admission is free.

MEMORIAL PARK, READING—11 a.m. and 2 p.m. free performance by Boston Children's Theater Stagemobile.

MUSIC

ARLINGTON STREET CHURCH—8 p.m. benefit violin concert by 16-year-olds Robin Yuan and Rose Ann Markow.

HARVARD STADIUM—8 p.m. Voices of East Harlem.

PARK STREET CHURCH — 12:10 p.m. free organ concert by R. Rice Nutting.

SMITH FIELD, HYDE PARK—8 p.m. free performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Send items for daily listing—one week in advance—to "In And About Boston", Boston Herald Traveler, Boston, 02106.

School Offers to Aid Esplanade Concerts

A Back Bay school's educational radio station yesterday offered to take its facility off the air during future Esplanade concerts if the sound system defects cannot be corrected in time.

The next scheduled concert with Arthur Fiedler conducting is Friday at 8:30 p.m. The famed conductor complained Monday at the opening concert that the music sound system was interfered with by the nearby radio signal.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUL — 1970

New England Newsclip

CONDUCTED TOUR

Two years ago, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra first ventured off the Esplanade, an otherwise warm reception in Franklin Park was spoiled by rock throwing, a hazard as much to precious instruments and pride as physical safety. Understandably, Symphony musicians were less than enthusiastic about the prospect of more such concerts.

This season, the Orchestra, in an effort again to become better friends with the larger community (and to venture vice versa), has joined Summerthing. To be sure, once a year for two weeks the Orchestra plays free on the Charles River banks, a civic gesture initiated by Arthur Fiedler in 1929. But while the Esplanade is convenient for Beacon Hill and Back Bay residents, it is a cumbersome trip even by car from Charlestown or Brighton, for example—a point brought home to Symphony Hall representative David Rockefeller when Summerthing's director drove him to areas of the city lying far from the picturesque bend in the river. So with support from Summerthing, four free Boston Symphony concerts will be given this year in other neighborhoods: Bunker Hill in Charlestown, Hyde Park, Government Center, and Brighton. The programs will be classical, although the conductor, Harry Ellis Dickson, allows that an Irish melody might be heard in Charlestown.

Record American
July 15, 1970

Soundmen Fix System For Concert

The MDC and a sound expert assured Esplanade concert lovers—and Maestro Arthur Fiedler—yesterday the static clinkers that spoiled Monday night's program will be cleared up in time for Friday's performance.

The radio station at a nearby college was the prime suspect in the discordancy that plagued one of four amplifiers.

Milton Cook, MDC coordinator of concerts on the Charles, said "everything will be straightened out by Friday."

Tony Silvestri, sound engineer in charge of the amplifying system, guaranteed elimination of the interference.

Cook said only one of the battery of amplifiers had been affected by picking up the squeals and squawks.

"Mr. Pops" said the result was "certainly lousy."

Cook promised no further trouble adding, "great musicians deserve a great sound system."

ESPLANADE CONCERTS
Tonight at 8:00
Smith Field, Hyde Park
Harry Ellis Dickson Conducting
PROGRAM
Polonaise, from "Eugen Onegin" —Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 95 "From the New World" —Dvorak
I. Adagio; Allegro molto
II. Largo
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace
IV. Allegro con fuoco
The Star-Spangled Banner
From the "Irish Suite" —Anderson
Selection from "South Pacific" —Rodgers
The Stars and Stripes Forever —Sousa

Boston Globe July 17, 1970

THOUGHTFUL FACES—Some of the many people who sat quietly listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance yesterday at City Hall are transfixed by the music. (Joseph Dennehy photo)

AGELESS MUSIC of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enjoyed by several generations at City Hall yesterday. (Photo by Joseph Dennehy)

172

Herald Traveler

July 16, 1970

Theater Tonight

"HAIR" — The rock musical about things contemporary, written by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by James Sharman at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonight 8:30.

"JACQUES REL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS" — The long running off-Broadway musical based on rel's music and lyrics, directed by Erik Blau at the Charles Playhouse. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA SUMMERTHING CONCERTS. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; City Hall Plaza, 11:45 a.m., and Rodgers Pk., Brighton, 8 p.m.

In and About Boston Today

ART

MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS' 465 Huntington Ave.—10 a.m. to 5 p.m. members' preview of paintings by Andrew Wyeth; 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. lecture on Wyeth; by Carole Taynton; 1:30 p.m. talk by Joan Esch on "Monuments in Miniature: Small Objects from the Middle Ages and Renaissance."

MUSIC

CITY HALL PLAZA—11:45 a.m. free concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

GARDNER MUSEUM, 280 The Fenway—3 p.m. free concert of music by Bach, Mozart and Brahms.

HATCH MEMORIAL SHELL — 7:30 p.m. Cambridge Opera Performance.

RODGERS PARK, BRIGHTON—8 p.m. free concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHILDREN

HANSCOM FIELD, BEDFORD — 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. free performance by the Boston Children's Theater "Stagemobile."

JORDAN MARSH—Ring Animated Circus in Boston Store 7th floor. Open regular store hours and admission is free.

DRAMA

AGASSIZ THEATER, Off Brattle street, Cambridge — 8:30 p.m. performance of Seneca's "Oedipus" by the Harvard Producing Organization.

LOEB DRAMA CENTER, 64 Brattle St., Cambridge—8:30 p.m. performance of Henrik Ibsen's "An Enemy of the People."

PROPOSITION—8 p.m. and 10 p.m. at 241 Hampshire St., Inman Square, Cambridge.

DISCUSSION

BOSTON CENTER FOR ADULT EDUCATION, 5 Commonwealth Ave. 8:30 p.m. free panel on drug centers and programs of assistance to drug addicts.

Send items for daily listing—one week in advance to "In And About Boston," Boston Herald Traveler, Boston, 02106.

Summerthing Today

9-Noon—Craftsmobile No. 1, Charlestown: Training Field, Adams & Winthrop.

9-Noon—Craftsmobile No. 2, Parker Hill-Fenway: Blackwood Street.

9:30 a.m. — Senior Citizen Beauty Workshop, Charlestown: Leaving Little City Hall to Dale Academy, Boston.

9 a.m. — Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Norwell and Athewolde Streets.

10 a.m. — People and Players Theater, Hyde Park: Readville Playground, Readville Street.

10 a.m. — Theatermobile: Suzi Linn and Her Puppets, Dorchester: Coleman and Quincy Streets.

10-1 p.m. — Earthmobile, South Boston: Between Baxter St. and W. 8th. St.

10-11:30 a.m. — Summerthing Hair-Do's for the Elderly, Parker Hill-Fenway: to Boylston St., Dale Hairdressing School.

10:45 a.m. — Drama Workshop, Stage 1 (pieces for children), Mattapan: Walker Playground.

11:30 a.m. Craftsmobile, Columbia Point: Behind 26 Montpelier Street.

11:30 a.m. Theatermobile: Funny Little Theater, Columbia Point: Behind 156 Montpelier St.

11:45 a.m. — Boston Pops, Boston: City Hall Plaza.

11 a.m. — Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, Charlestown: Polk and Bunkerhill St., front of Mayflower Super Market.

Noon-2 p.m. — Musicians' Union Band Concert, Boston: The Common.

1 p.m. — Craftsmobile, Dorchester: Leo Austin Jr. Square.

2 p.m. — Theatermobile: Suzi Linn and Her Puppets, Dorchester: St. Leo's Church.

2-5 p.m. — Craftsmobile No. 1, East Boston: Lyman School, Paris Street.

2-5 p.m. — Craftsmobile No. 2, Jamaica Plain-Bromley Heath: 10 Lamartine St.

2 p.m. — Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, Jamaica Plain.

2 p.m. — People and Player's Theater, North End: North Square.

2:45 p.m. — Drama Workshop, Stage 1 (pieces for children), Roxbury: Cooper Community Center.

3:30 p.m. — Theatermobile: Funny Little Theater, Parker Hill-Fenway: Wentworth Parking Lot.

4 p.m. — Summerthing Street Corner Ensemble, South Boston.

7-10 p.m. Feria Italiana, North End: North Square.

8 p.m. — Wrestling Match, Charlestown: MDC Rink.

8 p.m. — Boston Pops, Allston-Brighton: Rogers Park.

8 p.m. — Brooklyn Bridge, Hyde Park: MDC Shell.

8 p.m. — Rock Concert (Sinclayrs), Columbia Point: Athletic Field.

8 p.m. — Movie, North End: Prado.

8 p.m. — Mark Harvey Jazz Rock Concert, Dorchester: Leo Austin Jr. Sq., Bowdoin Ave.

8:30 p.m. Moviebus, West Roxbury-Roslindale: Beechland Project.

8:30 p.m. Rock Concert, Roxbury: Ceylon Park.

8:30 p.m.— Multimedia Slide Show — Abkiu — Black Experience, South End: Lenox and Camden.

Christian Science Monitor

July 17, 1970

On the Esplanade

Friday, July 17, 8:30

Harry Ellis Dickson, conducting

All-Tchaikovsky Program

Suite from "Swan Lake"

Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, Op. 23

Soloist: Debbie Sobol

The Star-Spangled Banner

Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet No. 1, Op. 11

1812 Ouverture Solonnelle

Herald Traveler

July 17, 1970

Theater Tonight

"HAIR" — The rock musical about things contemporary, written by Gerome Regni and James Rado, music by Gail McDermott, directed by James Sharman at the Wilbur Theater for an indefinite run. Tonight at 8:30.

"JACQUES REL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS" — The long running off-Broadway musical based on Rel's music and lyrics, directed by Erik Blau at the Charles Playhouse. Tonight at 8:30.

Concerts

ESPLANADE CONCERT, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

YUJI TAKAHASHI, piano, in works of Bach and Messiaen; Tanglewood, 7 p.m.

Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting works of Haydn, Mozart and Britten; Tanglewood, 9 p.m.

Globe July 17, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR" — Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, tonight at 8:30. Popular but controversial "tribal rock" musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt McDermot, and directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS — Charles Playhouse, through Sept. 6, tonight at 8:30. Hit musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

"DESTINATION ASHES" — Music Barn, Lenox, tonight at 8:30. Black drama.

"THE PROPOSITION"—241 Hampshire Street, Inman Square, Cambridge, tonight at 8 and 10. Long-running satirical and musical revue.

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA—Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade, at 8:30. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting an all-Tchaikovsky program: "Swan Lake" Suite, Piano Concerto No. 1 (Debbie Sobol); The Star-Spangled Banner; Andante Cantabile from String Quartet No. 1, and 1812 Overture.

Record American

July 17, 1970

Music stands and chairs lie in disarray at Boston's City Hall Plaza after rain forced yesterday's noon-hour concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra indoors. Workmen knocked down the chairs and stands to prevent them from being blown about by the winds accompanying a thunderstorm.

—Record American Photo, Carroll Mvett

Christian Science Monitor

Esplanade Concerts

Saturday, July 18, 8:30
Hatch Memorial Shell

Harry Ellis Dickson conducting
All-Beethoven Program

Overture to "Fidelio"
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21
The Star-Spangled Banner
Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 73, "Emperor"

July 18, 1970

Boston Herald Traveler
July 19, 1970

Esplanade concert programs

Pops concerts begin at 8:30 p.m., unless otherwise noted, and take place at Hatch Memorial Shell, with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting.

MONDAY
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor", Nicolai; Symphony in G Major, No. 88, Haydn; The Star-Spangled Banner; Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16, Grieg; Soloist: JOHN COVELLI. Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda", Ponchielli.

TUESDAY
Symphony in G minor, K. 550, Mozart; The Star-Spangled Banner; Piano Concerto No. 1 in E minor, Op. 11, Chopin; Soloist: EUGENE INDJIC (Eugene Indjic plays the Steinway Piano); Emperor Waltzes, Strauss.

WEDNESDAY AT 10:15 A.M.
Pomp and Circumstance, March No. 1 in D Major, Elgar; From "Gayne", Khachaturian; Finale (Rondo all 'Ungherese) from the Piano Concerto in D Major, Haydn; Soloist: LAURA LIBERMAN; Andante from Symphony No. 101, "Clock Symphony", Haydn; First Movement (Allegro) from the Violin Concerto, No. 3 in G Major, K.216, Mozart; Soloist: MARJORIE KRANSBERG; The Waltzing Cat, Anderson; The Stars and Stripes Forever, Sousa; The Star-Spangled Banner.

WEDNESDAY
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro", Mozart; Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 36, Beethoven; The Star-Spangled Banner; Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat, Liszt; Soloist: MYRON ROMANUL; Dancing through the Years, arr. Hayman.

THURSDAY
Overture to "Egmont", Beethoven; Symphony No. 8 in F, Beethoven; The Star-Spangled Banner; Concerto No. 2 in D minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Wieniawski; Soloist: CHRISTOPHER KIMBER; Suite from "Gayne", Khachaturian.

FRIDAY
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofiev; Romeo and Juliet, Overture-Fantasia, Tchaikovsky; The Star-Spangled Banner; Concerto in F. for Piano and Orchestra, Gershwin; Soloist: DONNALEXANDRE FEDER; Selection from "Carousel", Rodgers.

SATURDAY
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36, Tchaikovsky; The Star-Spangled Banner; Little Fugue in G minor, Bach; Clair de lune, Debussy; Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1, Enesco; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Valerius.

Boston Herald Traveler
July 17, 1970

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by Ulrike Welsch)

HARPIST'S VIEW of Boston's Summerthing audience at City Hall performance of Boston Pops Orchestra yesterday.

Boston Globe
July 18, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR"—Wilbur Theater, indefinite run, today at 6 and 10 p.m. Hit rock musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, and directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS" — Charles Playhouse, through Sept. 6, today at 5 and 9 p.m. Popular musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

THE PROPOSITION" — 241 Hampshire Street, Inman Square, Cambridge, today at 7, 9 and 11 p.m. Long-running satirical and musical revue.

"HELLO OUT THERE" — Benton Studio for Acting, Rose Coffee House, 134 Lincoln St. Saturday nightly only, at 9. William Saroyan's play about a young man's quest for the good life.

THE SINCLAYRS — Elma Lewis Playhouse-in-the-Park. Franklin Park, Roxbury, at 8 p.m. Popular singing group from Boston

ESPLANADE ORCHESTRA—Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade, at 8:30. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting an all-Beethoven program: "Fidelio" Overture, Symphony No. 1; The Star-Spangled Banner; "Emperor" Piano Concerto (Phyllis Moss).

Christian Science Monitor
July 20, 1970

Esplanade concerts

Monday, July 20, 8:30
Hatch Memorial Shell

Harry Ellis Dickson conducting

Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
Symphony in G major, No. 88 ..... Haydn
The Star-Spangled Banner
Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 ..... Grieg
Soloist: John Covelli
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

Children's Concert On the Esplanade

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critc

CHILDREN'S CONCERT —Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct a special children's concert on Wednesday at 10:15 a.m. in Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade. The concert is free and includes works of Elgar, Khachaturian, Haydn, Molart, Sousa and Anderson.

FESTIVALS ABROAD—Violinist Roman Totenberg, who in addition to his concert work is professor of music at Boston University, will appear with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra at Israel's Festival of Music, Aug. 10-24. He will perform the Penderecki Capriccio, described as "an austere and witty work with elements of jazz."

Walter Eisenberg will conduct the orchestra, which is the first youth orchestra to have been invited to perform in the festival. The group needs money to finance the trip and those interested in helping should contact the orchestra at 855 Commonwealth Ave., Boston.

NEWS FROM PITTSBURGH—The following Pittsburgh Symphony news release may provoke interest (and envy) among Boston opera lovers: "With the aid of a grant from the Howard Heinz Endowment, the orchestra in 1967 purchased the former Penn Theatre, a lavish 40-year-old movie palace on Sixth street and Penn avenue in the heart of Pittsburgh's Golden Triangle. After testing the theatre's public facilities and acoustics and studying crowd patterns in two special pension fund concerts last season, the orchestra signed a contract . . . for a complete rehabilitation of the Penn into a Performing Arts Center which is scheduled to open in the Fall of 1971 as a permanent home for the Pittsburgh Opera and the Pittsburgh Civic Light Opera as well as the symphony itself."

Concerts

Weston Drama Workshop, Attilio Poto conducting Puccini's "Madame Butterfly"; Country School, Weston, 8:45 p.m.

Marlboro (Vt.) Music Festival, no program available; 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting works of Mozart; Lili Krauss, piano soloist; Tanglewood, 8:30 p.m.

New Hampshire Festival, Thomas Nee conducting Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte"; Inter-Lakes Aud., Meredith, N.H., 8:30 p.m.

Betty Lou Austin, mezzo; Evelyn Harris, piano, in songs of Vaughan Williams and Dvorak; Gardner Museum, 3 p.m.

Esplanade Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting; Hatch Shell, 8:30 p.m.

Berkshire Quartet in works of Blackwood, Schubert and Beethoven; Music Mountain, Falls Village, Conn., 3 p.m.

194 copies to T D Perry

H J Kraut
M Y Schofer
B. Moyer
R. Pottle
S. Solomon

50 Monument Avenue
Charlestown, Massachusetts
July 15, 1970

JUL 22 1970

Editor
Boston Globe
135 Wm. T. Morrissy Blvd.
Boston, Massachusetts

Letter to the Editor

Dear Sir:

When Mayor Kevin H. White's Summerthing Program was initiated in the summer of 1968 many of his critics had a field day taking him to task for what they believed to be a frivolous undertaking.

To the surprise and frustration of these critics the Mayors Summerthing Program has now developed into an outstanding summer of diversified events for people of all ages in the city of Boston.

Recently 5,000 people gathered at the Bunker Hill Monument and were entertained by the Boston Pops Orchestra in a two hour concert that ended with a lengthy standing ovation.

Prior to this outstanding event we in Charlestown had the pleasure of watching the Boston Ballet Company perform Peter and the Wolf for 1,000 Charlestown residents. This event was also greeted with tremendous enthusiasm.

We now look forward to being entertained by the well known Mummers Band in the near future.

Mayor White is to be commended for having the foresight and courage to establish Summerthing.

The long hot summer in Charlestown and other sections of Boston has been replaced with a summer of entertainment, education and excellence.

Sincerely yours,

John A. Whelan

JAW/bs

Boston Globe
July 22, 1970

boston P.M.

By Ron Wysocki, Globe Staff

A Brookline talent will perform tonight on the Johnny Carson show. Benji, half St. Bernard-half collie, was auditioned Monday over the telephone by Carson show people. He sings.

His mistress, Mrs. Betsey Davis of 198 Dean rd., and a family friend, Mrs. Judith Rosenberg of 104 Gardner rd., Brookline, will accompany the mournful mascot to New York City.

It seems that Benji sings to any accompaniment, including the noon whistle, ambulance and fire engine sirens.

His penchant for singing was discovered when he began to wail in tune to the musical instrument practices of the six Davis children.

Benji cocks his head, closes his eyes and gives forth.

★

Iit might be a little early, but the Massachusetts Historical Society is looking forward to its Christmas Party. Its members are going to imbibe milk punch, the ingredients of which were recited by Benjamin Franklin in a letter, dated Oct. 11, 1763, to Boston's James Bowdoin.

A sample portion was made up by Mrs. Ronald Girouard, secretary to the director, and staff members pronounced it the best milk punch they ever tasted.

Franklin's recipe was "Take six quarts of brandy and the rinds of 44 lemons pared very thin; steep the rinds in brandy for 24 hours, then strain it off. Put to it four quarts of water, four large nutmegs grated, two quarts of lemon juice, two pounds of double refined sugar.

"When the sugar is dissolved, boil three quarts of milk and put to the rest hot as you take it off the fire and stir it about. Let it stand two hours; then run it through a jelly bag till it is clear; then bottle it off."

Franklin suffered from the gout.

★

A look-but-don't-touch girl-watcher stood agape, viewing the bikini-clad foxes on Revere Beach the other day. The man, about 50, commented, "And to think that 35 years ago, on this very same beach, I was arrested for stepping off the beach onto the sidewalk for wearing a swimsuit with no top."

★

Summerthing's neighborhood Boston Pops concerts surpassed all expectations. During an intermission in the shade of the Bunker Hill Monument in Charlestown, the musician refugees from the Charles River Esplanade were surprised when the Charlestown Militia stormed the hill to present Pops conductor Harry Ellis Dickinson a pewter mug and then proceeded to fire off a salute to the orchestra members.

Out front, the evening audience, including a number of youngsters in pajamas, grew to 3000, one-quarter of Charlestown's population.

★

Retired Army Col. Robert R. Rheault, chief of all Green Beret forces in Vietnam until relieved of his command last Summer after he was accused of participating in the killing of a South Vietnamese civilian, returns to a military base tomorrow for the first time since his retirement last October. He will address the annual Non-Commissioned Officer's Dining-In of the Massachusetts Air National Guard's 102d Tactical Fighter Wing at Otis Air Force Base on Cape Cod.

The charges against Rheault were dropped after it was disclosed that the alleged victim was working as a double agent.

★

QUICK NOTES: Former Atty. Gen. Edward J. McCormack Jr., looking well-tanned, hale and hearty, dined at The Charles on Chestnut st. the other night with longtime friends, James and Ida Lyons of Quincy. Entrepreneurs of The Charles, the brothers Mirisola, Tom and Pete, grew up with McCormack in South Boston. McCormack has been recovering at his Cape Cod home from recent surgery . . . A local distributing outfit is advertising "Impeach Nixon" bumper stickers at two for $1 with a sales pitch of "Get 'em while HE lasts.

Boston stockbroker Thomas P. O'Neill 3d, son of the congressman, reports that shareholders in Massachusetts have doubled in the past decade and now number 1,214,000 . . . Some 100 members of the Old Charlestown Schoolboys' Assn. were guests of Bill Veeck at Suffolk Downs' closing day. Wylie Van Wart, vice president of the group, made the arrangements.

Tonight, Carson to host Brookline's singing dog

copies to T D Perry
H J Kraut
M Y Schafer
B. Moyer
R. Pettle
S. Solomon

50 Monument Avenue
Charlestown, Massachusetts
July 15, 1970

JUL 22 1970

Editor
Boston Globe
135 Wm. T. Morrissy Blvd.
Boston, Massachusetts

Letter to the Editor

Dear Sir:

When Mayor Kevin H. White's Summerthing Program was initiated in the summer of 1968 many of his critics had a field day taking him to task for what they believed to be a frivolous undertaking.

To the surprise and frustration of these critics the Mayors Summerthing Program has now developed into an outstanding summer of diversified events for people of all ages in the city of Boston.

Recently 5,000 people gathered at the Bunker Hill Monument and were entertained by the Boston Pops Orchestra in a two hour concert that ended with a lengthy standing ovation.

Prior to this outstanding event we in Charlestown had the pleasure of watching the Boston Ballet Company perform Peter and the Wolf for 1,000 Charlestown residents. This event was also greeted with tremendous enthusiasm.

We now look forward to being entertained by the well known Mummers Band in the near future.

Mayor White is to be commended for having the foresight and courage to establish Summerthing.

The long hot summer in Charlestown and other sections of Boston has been replaced with a summer of entertainment, education and excellence.

Sincerely yours,

John A. Whelan

JAW/bs

Boston Globe
July 22, 1970

boston P.M.

By Ron Wysocki, Globe Staff

A Brookline talent will perform tonight on the Johnny Carson show. Benji, half St. Bernard-half collie, was auditioned Monday over the telephone by Carson show people. He sings.

His mistress, Mrs. Betsey Davis of 198 Dean rd., and a family friend, Mrs. Judith Rosenberg of 104 Gardner rd., Brookline, will accompany the mournful mascot to New York City.

It seems that Benji sings to any accompaniment, including the noon whistle, ambulance and fire engine sirens.

His penchant for singing was discovered when he began to wail in tune to the musical instrument practices of the six Davis children.

Benji cocks his head, closes his eyes and gives forth.

★

It might be a little early, but the Massachusetts Historical Society is looking forward to its Christmas Party. Its members are going to imbibe milk punch, the ingredients of which were recited by Benjamin Franklin in a letter, dated Oct. 11, 1763, to Boston's James Bowdoin.

A sample portion was made up by Mrs. Ronald Girouard, secretary to the director, and staff members pronounced it the best milk punch they ever tasted.

Franklin's recipe was "Take six quarts of brandy and the rinds of 44 lemons pared very thin; steep the rinds in brandy for 24 hours, then strain it off. Put to it four quarts of water, four large nutmegs grated, two quarts of lemon juice, two pounds of double refined sugar.

"When the sugar is dissolved, boil three quarts of milk and put to the rest hot as you take it off the fire and stir it about. Let it stand two hours; then run it through a jelly bag till it is clear; then bottle it off."

Franklin suffered from the gout.

★

A look-but-don't-touch girl-watcher stood agape, viewing the bikini-clad foxes on Revere Beach the other day. The man, about 50, commented, "And to think that 35 years ago, on this very same beach, I was arrested for stepping off the beach onto the sidewalk for wearing a swimsuit with no top."

★

Summerthing's neighborhood Boston Pops concerts surpassed all expectations. During an intermission in the shade of the Bunker Hill Monument in Charlestown, the musician refugees from the Charles River Esplanade were surprised when the Charlestown Militia stormed the hill to present Pops conductor Harry Ellis Dickinson a pewter mug and then proceeded to fire off a salute to the orchestra members.

Out front, the evening audience, including a number of youngsters in pajamas, grew to 3000, one-quarter of Charlestown's population.

★

Retired Army Col. Robert R. Rheault, chief of all Green Beret forces in Vietnam until relieved of his command last Summer after he was accused of participating in the killing of a South Vietnamese civilian, returns to a military base tomorrow for the first time since his retirement last October. He will address the annual Non-Commissioned Officer's Dining-In of the Massachusetts Air National Guard's 102d Tactical Fighter Wing at Otis Air Force Base on Cape Cod.

The charges against Rheault were dropped after it was disclosed that the alleged victim was working as a double agent.

★

QUICK NOTES: Former Atty. Gen. Edward J. McCormack Jr., looking well-tanned, hale and hearty, dined at The Charles on Chestnut st. the other night with longtime friends, James and Ida Lyons of Quincy. Entrepreneurs of The Charles, the brothers Mirisola, Tom and Pete, grew up with McCormack in South Boston. McCormack has been recovering at his Cape Cod home from recent surgery . . . A local distributing outfit is advertising "Impeach Nixon" bumper stickers at two for $1 with a sales pitch of "Get 'em while HE lasts.

Boston stockbroker Thomas P. O'Neill 3d, son of the congressman, reports that shareholders in Massachusetts have doubled in the past decade and now number 1,214,000 . . . Some 100 members of the Old Charlestown Schoolboys' Assn. were guests of Bill Veeck at Suffolk Downs' closing day. Wylie Van Wart, vice president of the group, made the arrangements.

Tonight, Carson to host Brookline's singing dog

Christian Science Monitor
July 24, 1970

On the Esplanade
Friday, July 24, 8:30
Harry Ellis Dickson conducting
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 ..... Prokofiev
Romeo and Juliet, Overture-Fantasia ..... Tchaikovsky
The Star-Spangled Banner
Concerto in F major for Piano and Orchestra ..... Gershwin
Soloist: Donn-Alexandre Feder
Selections from "Carousel" ..... Rodgers

N.H. Sunday News
Manchester, N.H.
July 26, 1970

Group Goes To Boston For Concert

Students and friends of the Gerasi Music Studio attended the Esplanade concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hatch Memorial Shell, Boston.

Following the program, the group took a sight-seeing trip on the Charles River.

Attending were: Gail Archambeault, Kathlyne Tracy, Suzanne Gregor, Cynthia De Vore, Gary Merrill, George Chabot, Kathleen Socha, David Andruchuk, Mark Andruchuk, Michael O'Brien, Kelly O'Brien, Debra Kartsen, Susan Kartsen, Christine Frisella, Marc Daigle, Betsy Wood, Lynn Wood, James Wood, Joseph Martineau, Diane Mitchell, Edwina Boufford, Donna Pineault, Lisa Shea, Barbara Lynch, Athena Demetriou, Dolores Dawson, Debra O'Keefe, Debra Boucher, Chris Merrill, Cynthia O'Brien, Guy Chabot, Marc Auger, Patricia Socha, Susan Socha, Judith Socha, Mrs. Roger Desmarais, Lorraine Desmarais, Charles Desmarais, Andre Desmarais, Mrs. Harvey Cooper and Russell Cooper, all of Manchester.

Also, Cathi-Mari Crosier of Merrimack; Victor Gagnon and Louis Gagnon of Hooksett; Rebecca Webber of Auburn, Maine, Denise Edwards of Northfield, Mass.; and Jean Hungerford of E. Chatham, Conn.

Providing transportation were Ernest Chabot, Mrs. Paul O'Brien, Mrs. John Andruchuk, Mrs. Edward Socha, Mrs. Glenford Merrill, Mrs. R. L. Sloan, Mrs. Robert DeVore and Mr. and Mrs. George Gerasi, all of Manchester, and Mrs. Philip Crosier of Merrimack.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerasi also attended a concert by the Center Arts Orchestra at Dartmouth College.

News, Milford, Mass.
July 27, 1970

Milford's Title I students listen to the Boston Pops.

Milford Title I Students Hear Pops, See Red Sox Win

Student's participating in Milford's Title I Summer Program journeyed to Boston and enjoyed two very popular "products of the city", the Esplanade Concert and the Boston Red Sox.

The Esplanade Concerts held at the Hatch Shell on Storrow Memorial Drive are sponsored by the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The special morning concert for children was conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson, who for many years had two careers in music. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a violinist in 1938, but had also been active as a conductor before then. His conducting career flourished since at the Pops, the Esplanade and with the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, the series he founded in 1959. Eleven year old Marjorie Kransberg was violin soloist for the morning program.

Following the concert the students were bussed across to Fenway Park where they sat in the granstand and were served hot dogs and cokes. Some of the students were attending a Major League Baseball Game for the first time and the Red Sox obliged with a resounding 7 to 4 victory over the California Angels.

Boston Globe
July 24, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR"—Wilbur Theater at 8:30. Hit rock musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, directed by James Sharmon.

ACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—CharlesPlayhouse at 8:30. Popular musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

"THE PROPOSITION"—241 Hampshire Inman sq., Cambridge, at 8 and 10. Long-running satirical and musical revue.

ESPLANADE CONCERTS — Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade at 8:30. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting. Prokofiev, "Classical" Symphony; Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet"; The Star-Spangled Banner; Gershwin, Piano Concerto in F (Donn-Alexandre Feder); Rodgers, "Carousel" medley. Free.

DANCES AT THE WAREHOUSE—470 Parker st at 8:30. New

Boston Globe
July 25, 1970

Stage, music

"HAIR"—Wilbur Theater at 6 and 10 p.m. Popular "tribal rock" musical dedicated to peace, love and tolerance. Written by James Rado and Gerome Ragni, with music by Galt MacDermot, directed by James Sharmon.

"JACQUES BREL IS ALIVE AND WELL AND LIVING IN PARIS"—Charles Playhouse at 5 and 9 p.m. Hit musical based on the life of singer-composer Jacques Brel, directed by Eric Blau.

"THE PROPOSITION"—241 Hampshire st., Inman sq., Cambridge, at 7, 9 and 11. Long-running satirical and musical revue.

ESPLANADE CONCERTS — Hatch Shell, Charles River Esplanade, at 8:30. Harry Ellis Dickson conducting the final program of the season: Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; The Star-Spangled Banner; Bach, Little Fugue in G minor; Debussy, Clair de lune; Enesco, Romanian Rhapsody No. 1; Valerius, Prayer of Thanksgiving. Free.

DANCES AT THE WAREHOUSE—470 Parker st. at 8:30. New modern works by Toby Armour.

Boston Globe
July 23, 1970

Boston kids have three field days

TRIPLE HEADER FOR KIDS—Officer Paul Semonetti, at left, seems somewhat bedeviled as he helps kids untangle lines during Park Dept. fishing derby at Jamaica Pond. Meanwhile, some of Boston's Boy Scouts enjoy an old fashioned wheel barrow race in another event at Suffolk Downs. A third event was an Esplanade Concert, shown below. Photos by Ted Dully, Paul Connell and Joseph Dennehy).

AT THE ESPLANADE CONCERT — Marjorie Kransberg demonstrates her violin mastery for Harry Ellis Dickson, who conducted the 10:15 a.m. special concert for the children at the Hatch Memorial Shell.

CLAP-YOUR-HANDS — Youngsters attending the special Esplanade concert join in dance on hearing the Symphony, directed by Harry Ellis Dickson, play works from Elgar, Haydn, Mozart, Souza and Anderson.

196

Christian Science Monitor July 25, 1970

By Peter W. Main, photo staff

Children's concert

A special children's concert at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Boston's Esplanade this week included some sophisticated youthful performers and a host of attentive listeners. The Symphony, directed by Harry Ellis Dickson, played works from Elgar, Haydn, Mozart, Souza, and Anderson. One small boy separated himself a bit from the crowd in front of the Hatch Shell to lis all by himself. Some other children enjoyed snacks along with the music.

Citizen Item (Allston-Brighton)

July 30, 1970

Bos. Symph

BOSTON POPS CONCERT, a Summerthing feature, drew a record audience at Rogers Park in Brighton. Under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson (right center) the orchestra members, in summer white jackets, opened with "Pomp and Cirrumstance," then went into "Overture to William Tell." The musical story part of the Overture was given a realistic touch when the skies opened up with a thunder storm and heavy rain. The concert was sweet while it lasted. (Photo by Fred Vytal)

Herald Traveler August 2, 1970

Herald Traveler's Readers Write

MDC's Chief Park Engineer Sets Record Straight on Hatch Shell and Storrow Drive

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

The magazine section of the Sunday Herald Traveler of June 12, 1970, featuring Summer Fun and the Esplanade story, was timely and informative though not quite accurate.

McLaren Harris, former music critic for the Boston Herald Traveler, in his article, "The Esplanade Concerts", sounded a few sour notes. He stated that "the problems of the Esplanade concerts are essentially the problems of the Hatch Shell, and chiefly among those is Storrow Drive—when the highway was proposed, Chief Engineer Benjamin Fink stated that its presence would make 'no appreciable difference' to conditions there. This explains why Mr. Fink was a Highway Engineer and not a musician or an acoustician and probably not even a listener." Mr. Harris should have checked the score more closely before sounding off.

Mr. Harris's reference to me as a highway engineer was completely out of tune. I am a park engineer and not a highway engineer. A park engineer is as different from a highway engineer as a philharmonic symphony orchestra is from a rock band. As the chief park engineer I probably had as much to do with the development of the Esplanade, music shells and Storrow Drive as anyone.

Let it be known that the location of Storrow Drive was not selected by engineers but by legislative mandate over the objections of the engineers.

Also, that the music shell, which is pictured on Page 25, was the first music shell ever designed or built in the United States and was designed by me and my associates with Arthur Fiedler, the originator, over our shoulders. And as for "probably not even a listener," I would say that in early days I sat in the front row with a push button in my hand to turn the lights on the conductor after he had completed his conducting and while he was taking his bow. Also, I met the girl who became my wife at an Esplanade concert.

After the completion of the Fiedler Bridge, commemorating the 25th Anniversary of the Esplanade Concerts, I received a very warm letter from Arthur Fiedler with the following notation on it: "The bridge is just too wonderful for words. Thanks from way back."

Originally, the outbound traffic on Storrow Drive was cut off during the concerts. As traffic grew heavier pressure from the driving public forced the opening of the roadway.

On Page 10 of the magazine article there appears a photograph of a very beautiful bridge crossing the lagoon on the Esplanade. This bridge is probably the most photographed bridge on the Charles River or in Boston. May I remind Mr. Harris that this bridge was designed by Mr. Fink, "Highway Engineer." I regard the Charles River Basin as the finest basin in the world. I am very proud of all the work that I was able to do in developing this basin. I never was in favor of the present location of Storrow Drive and the record shows that.

I would not have answered his article if this had not been the second time that the statement was made.

BENJAMIN W. FINK
Director of Park Engineering and Chief Park Engineer
M.D.C.

Boston

Herald Traveler

July 27, 1970

Give the Credit To the Mayor

Bos. Symphony

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

Seeking shelter at City Hall, during a shower, I was pleasantly surprised to find the Boston Pops Orchestra playing a concert for Summerthing. Working in hastily set up quarters, the orchestra played its usual fine performance. Being an avid Summerthing fan and one who attends many of its performances, I think the people of the city owe the mayor a debt of gratitude for this program.

However, I noted several weeks ago in the Boston Herald Traveler that the Boston City Council was lauded because it had approved a $300,000 appropriation for Summerthing. Why should the council get credit for a program conceived by Mayor White, when the truth of the matter is several councillors have consistently voted against it and this year the council cut $100,000 from the mayor's proposed budget. Let's give the credit where the credit belongs.

CAROL M. HANOVER

Boston

Esplanade Concert Draws Full House

Record - American
July 14, 1970

The Hatch Memorial Shell stands out against the Charles River as the Esplanade Concerts swing into another season of entertainment. ~~Pop's Arthur~~ Fiedler ~~con~~ducted compositions by Chopin and Wagner for opening night. The orchestra returns to the Esplanade July 17-18 and 20-25 after Summerthing engagements.

—Record American Photo
Leo Renahan

Gabor Rona
Dec 14, 1970

V771
USE 70 MANILA
REFILL
SAMUEL WARD · BOSTON

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 124

BSO
Pops

1970 - 1971

BOSTON SYMPHONY
PRESS COVERAGE
1970-1971 SEASON

Page

Performance announcements and reviews..... 1
Symphony Hall Concerts

Concerts in other cities 23

Chamber Players 31

Radio and TV announcements. 35

Recordings 37

Publicity about BSO and Personnel. 42

Including Conductors, Friends of BSO, Fund raising, musicians and Society columns

Esplanade Series 85

William Steinberg will conduct opening concert of Boston Symphony's 90th anniversary season

Symphony in 90th season

William Steinberg opens the 90th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony this Friday at 2 p.m. with a program which begins with Holst's "The Planets," followed by Partos' symphonic elegy "Paths," with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. Concluding the program, which will be repeated Saturday at 8:30 p.m., is Beethoven's Symphony No: 7.

The first of six Boston Symphony open rehearsals takes place this Thursday at 7:30 p.m., when Steinberg will conduct the program scheduled for the following afternoon. Ticket sales from the open rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's pension fund.

A brochure listing programs, conductors, soloists and ticket prices is available by mail, telephone or in person from Symphony Hall, 266-1492.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

SEP 20 1970 New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Associate Conductor

first violins
Joseph Silverstein
concertmaster
Charles Munch chair
Alfred Krips
Max Hobart
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

second violins
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Ronald Knudsen
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Ayrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
John Korman
Christopher Kimber
Spencer Larrison
Ikuko Mizuno
Cecylia Arzewski
Marylou Speaker

violas
Burton Fine
Charles S. Dana chair
Reuben Green
Eugene Lehner
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Bernard Kadinoff
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Joseph Pietropaolo
Robert Barnes
Hironaka Sugie*

cellos
Jules Eskin
Philip R. Allen chair
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Stephen Geber
Robert Ripley
Luis Leguia
Carol Procter
Jerome Patterson
Ronald Feldman
William Stokking
Joel Moerschel

basses
Henry Portnoi
William Rhein
Joseph Hearne
Bela Wurtzler
Leslie Martin
John Salkowski
John Barwicki
Robert Olson
Lawrence Wolfe

flutes
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
Walter Piston chair
James Pappoutsakis
Paul Fried

piccolo
Lois Schaefer

oboes
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Wayne Rapier

english horn
Laurence Thorstenberg

clarinets
Harold Wright
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
E♭ clarinet

bass clarinet
Felix Viscuglia

bassoons
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

contra bassoon
Richard Plaster

horns
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
David Ohanian
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Ralph Pottle

trumpets
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
André Come
Gerard Goguen

trombones
William Gibson
Ronald Barron
Kauko Kahila

tuba
Chester Schmitz

timpani
Everett Firth

percussion
Charles Smith
Arthur Press
assistant timpanist
Thomas Gauger
Frank Epstein

harps
Bernard Zighera
Ann Hobson

librarians
Victor Alpert
William Shisler

stage manager
Alfred Robison

personnel manager William Moyer

*member of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra participating in a one season exchange with Yizhak Schotten.

B.S.O. opens 90th season this week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season this week, with William Steinberg conducting the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts. Holst's "The Planets," Partos' "Paths," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 will be performed at 2 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Saturday in Symphony Hall.

This will be Steinberg's second year as music director for the BSO.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

SEP 21 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 20 1970 New England

Boston Symphony Opens 19th Year

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday - Saturday concerts, September 26 at 2 p.m. and Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six open rehearsals takes place September 24 at 7:30 p.m., William Steinberg conducts the orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon.

Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Boston Symphony Season Opens Friday, Sept. 25

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Sept. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m. The program begins with Holst's "The Planets," followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday, Sept. 24 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon. Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

SEP 10 1970 New England

50TH SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season September 25 and for the 13th consecutive year all Friday and Saturday concerts will be broadcast by WGBH radio live from Symphony Hall.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

SEP 18 1970 New England

TIMES ARGUS
BARRE, VERMONT
(E) 12,246

SEP 19 1970 New England

Symphony Director to Open Friday-Saturday Series

The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th Anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts Friday at 2 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday at 7:30 p. m., where Director Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon. Income from ticket sales from these informal rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Ticket price for the series of six is $15. An individual concert is $3. Seats are unreserved.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

FRIDAY – SATURDAY 1
TUESDAY A 1
THURSDAY A 1

1970-1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON

William Steinberg will conduct opening concert of Boston Symphony's 90th anniversary season

Symphony in 90th season

William Steinberg opens the 90th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony this Friday at 2 p.m. with a program which begins with Holst's "The Planets," followed by Partos' symphonic elegy "Paths," with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. Concluding the program, which will be repeated Saturday at 8:30 p.m., is Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

The first of six Boston Symphony open rehearsals takes place this Thursday at 7:30 p.m., when Steinberg will conduct the program scheduled for the following afternoon. Ticket sales from the open rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's pension fund.

A brochure listing programs, conductors, soloists and ticket prices is available by mail, telephone or in person from Symphony Hall, 266-1492.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

SEP 20 1970 New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Associate Conductor

first violins
Joseph Silverstein
concertmaster
Charles Munch chair
Alfred Krips
Max Hobart
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

second violins
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Ronald Knudsen
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Ayrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
John Korman
Christopher Kimber
Spencer Larrison
Ikuko Mizuno
Cecylia Arzewski
Marylou Speaker

violas
Burton Fine
Charles S. Dana chair
Reuben Green
Eugene Lehner
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Bernard Kadinoff
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Joseph Pietropaolo
Robert Barnes
Hironaka Sugie*

cellos
Jules Eskin
Philip R. Allen chair
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Stephen Geber
Robert Ripley
Luis Leguia
Carol Procter
Jerome Patterson
Ronald Feldman
William Stokking
Joel Moerschel

basses
Henry Portnoi
William Rhein
Joseph Hearne
Bela Wurtzler
Leslie Martin
John Salkowski
John Barwicki
Robert Olson
Lawrence Wolfe

flutes
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
Walter Piston chair
James Pappoutsakis
Paul Fried

piccolo
Lois Schaefer

oboes
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Wayne Rapier

english horn
Laurence Thorstenberg

clarinets
Harold Wright
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
Eb clarinet

bass clarinet
Felix Viscuglia

bassoons
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

contra bassoon
Richard Plaster

horns
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
David Ohanian
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Ralph Pottle

trumpets
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
André Come
Gerard Goguen

trombones
William Gibson
Ronald Barron
Kauko Kahila

tuba
Chester Schmitz

timpani
Everett Firth

percussion
Charles Smith
Arthur Press
assistant timpanist
Thomas Gauger
Frank Epstein

harps
Bernard Zighera
Ann Hobson

librarians
Victor Alpert
William Shisler

stage manager
Alfred Robison

personnel manager William Moyer

*member of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra participating in a one season exchange with Yizhak Schotten.

B.S.O. opens 90th season this week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season this week, with William Steinberg conducting the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts. Holst's "The Planets," Partos' "Paths," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 will be performed at 2 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Saturday in Symphony Hall.

This will be Steinberg's second year as music director for the BSO.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

SEP 21 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 20 1970 New England

Boston Symphony Opens 19th Year

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday - Saturday concerts, September 26 at 2 p.m. and Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six open rehearsals takes place September 24 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon.

Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

SEP 10 1970 New England

90TH SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season September 25 and for the 13th consecutive year all Friday and Saturday concerts will be broadcast by WGBH radio live from Symphony Hall.

Boston Symphony Season Opens Friday, Sept. 25

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Sept. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m. The program begins with Holst's "The Planets," followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday, Sept. 24 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon. Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

TIMES ARGUS
BARRE, VERMONT
(E) 12,246

SEP 19 1970 New England

Symphony Director to Open Friday-Saturday Series

The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th Anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts Friday at 2 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Paths," symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday at 7:30 p. m., where Director Steinberg conducts the Orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon. Income from ticket sales from these informal rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Ticket price for the series of six is $15. An individual concert is $3. Seats are unreserved.

2.

THE MUSIC DIRECTOR

WILLIAM STEINBERG was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the Opera and of the famous Museum-concerts. There he conducted many contemporary operas for the first time, one of which was Berg's Wozzeck; he also directed the world premières of Weill's Mahagonny, Schoenberg's Von Heute auf Morgen and George Antheil's Transatlantic. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. He later did similar work for the Jewish community in Berlin. He left Germany in 1936. He was co-founder with Bronislav Huberman of the Palestine Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic), becoming its first conductor after the inaugural concert, which was directed in December 1936 by Arturo Toscanini. Mr Steinberg came to the United States in 1938, at Toscanini's invitation, to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Between 1958 and 1960 Mr Steinberg traveled regularly between Pittsburgh and London, while he served as music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In the 1964-1965 season he appeared as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. The Orchestra in Pittsburgh has become under his direction one of the foremost in the country. In 1964 he and the orchestra made a three-month tour of Europe and the Near East under the auspices of the State Department's office of Cultural Presentations, a journey covering 25,000 miles in fourteen countries and including 50 concerts.

Later in 1964 Mr Steinberg became principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and directed concerts for twelve weeks during several winter seasons. In the summer of 1965 he conducted the Orchestra during the first week of its free concerts in the parks of New York City. The performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony in Central Park, which opened the series, attracted an audience of more than 75,000. Mr Steinberg has also had extensive engagements in Europe, and during the summer of 1967 he conducted many of the concerts given during its tour of the United States by the Israel Philharmonic, the orchestra with which he had been so closely associated thirty years earlier. He has directed many recordings for the Command and RCA labels. Mr Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's major orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SHOPPER
KEENE, N. H.
WEEKLY 20,700
SEP 23 1970
New England

Symphony To Open 90th Season

The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the Nintieth Anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, Sept. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's The Planets followed by Partos' Paths, symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday evening, Sept. 24 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon.

Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the orchestra's pension fund. Ticket price for the series of six is $15. An individual concert is $3. Seats are unreserved.

Going to "The Planets"

by Harry Neville

William Steinberg has chosen to conduct Gustav Holst's "The Planets" this Friday as the opening work of the Boston Symphony season. In doing so Steinberg will be reviving the most popular work of a once popular composer—a man who, though unfamiliar to most of today's concert-goers, once enjoyed the kind of acclaim that is given to few composers during their lifetime.

In his native England Holst (1874 - 1934) received something bordering on adulation from a public that had come to love "The Planets" from its numerous performances at London Proms concerts during the 1920's. The critical profession did him the favor of establishing his reputation as a "controversial" composer, although it is difficult nowadays to understand what would have provoked controversy in Holst's music. The composer was the recipient, too, of national and international honors, including one from Harvard University, where for six months during 1932 he held the post of lecturer in composition.

During his stay at Harvard Holst conducted three concerts of his own works with the Boston Symphony, and the event proved to be one of the overwhelming experiences of his life. "The band treated me royally," he wrote afterwards to his daughter, Imogen. "At two of the rehearsals they insisted on staying half an hour extra and at every possible occasion they cheered me . . . The only fault of the orchestra was that they were over anxious. On Friday's concert there were half a dozen extraordinary slips in the Planets: in the Perfect Fool ballet the harpist missed a line and the water music sounded quite modern: while in the St. Paul's Suite I broke a collar stud." He added, however, that Saturday's concert was "really good."

He wrote too of a Harvard concert given in his honor, at which Archibald Davison conducted and the Harvard Glee Club sang some of his choral works. "Those youngsters sang some of my things by heart.

Denise Le Brun is a member of the cast of "Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris," the musical at the Charles Theater. Her rendition of "Ay, Marike," among others, is a thrilling experience in the theater.

One can't have a higher compliment than that! And the first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wanted to return his fee!!" Holst must have had extraordinary personal magnetism indeed. Not even Stravinsky would have had musicians clamoring to rehearse overtime or to return their fees.

All this fame disappeared almost as quickly as it had arisen, and by the 1940's Holst had pretty much become an interesting but not very provocative footnote in musical history. The slightly increased attention he has received of late has been due in part to the record industry's need to present new material, but it is mainly the result of untiring devotion and work by the composer's daughter, Imogen Holst, who in addition to conducting and editing his work has written two books on the subject of her father and his music.

No one has written more fairly and dispassionately about Holst's music, and in considering this composer's final position one can do no better than to cite her account of his reaction to a piece of chamber music by Schubert: "As he listened to Schubert's Quintet he realized what he had lost, not only in his music but in his life. He could cling to his austerity. He could fill his days with kindness and good humor. He could write music that was neither commonplace, unmeaning, nor tame . . . But he missed the warmth of the Schubert Quintet. At the moment, it seemed as if this warmth were the only thing worth having."

"The Planets," Holst's only major work that is played with any regularity, was written at about the midpoint of the composer's career. It is a transitional work which, despite some weaknesses, contains moments of great beauty and imagination. One of these occurs at the end of the final movement, "Neptune," when a chorus of women's voices repeats a chordal sequence ever more faintly until the listener is not quite sure when the work has ended. British critic Charles Reid may have captured the feeling of many listeners when he wrote the following about this passage:

"In relation to the suite as a whole, this wordless vocalization takes up little time and room. Yet . . . it colors in retrospect the score as a whole. One may go further. It is a symbol of Holst's entire mind, talent, and output. It points to a central value; to something rarefied and lonely, with hints of forbidding bleakness beyond . . . Holst was a visionary who seemed subject to sways and pulls unknown to most mortals."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
SEP 20 1970
New England

BSO tickets

Individual tickets for subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra go on sale today at the Symphony Hall Box Office located in the Massachusetts Avenue lobby.

Special student tickets at $3 are available 10 minutes before concert time with presentation of valid ID cards.

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475
SEP 24 1970
New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 25 1970
New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 26 1970
New England

BSO reviewed Monday

Music critic Michael Steinberg is in Washington attending meetings of the National Endowment for the Arts music advisory panel, of which he is a member. He will cover the opening program of the Boston Symphony season at Saturday night's performance, and his review will appear in all editions of Monday's Globe.

Steinburg Opens 90th Season

BOSTON, MASS. - The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the Nintieth Anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, September 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, September 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Baths", symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

Boston Symphony opens season Sept. 25-26

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th Anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday and Saturday concerts at 2 p.m. Friday, Sept. 25 and 8:30 p.m. Saturday, Sept. 26. The program begins with Holst's The Planets followed by Partos' Paths, symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

UNION
HAMPTON, N. H.
WEEKLY 4639
SEP 23 1970
New England

90TH SEASON

The Boston Symphony's Music Director William Steinberg opens the 90th anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940
SEP 24 1970
New England

Michael Tilson Thomas To Conduct Symphony Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second Friday/Saturday apir of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday, October 2 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, October 3, at 8:30 p.m.

Paul Zukofsky is violin soloist. The program opens with Bach's Suite No. 4, followed by Piston's Symphony no. 2.

After intermission, Mr. Zukofsky is soloist in William Schuman's violin concerto. The program concludes with Ravel's La valso.

MERRIMAC VALLEY
ADVERTISER
TEWKSBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 20,000
SEP 23 1970
New England

2.

THE MUSIC DIRECTOR

WILLIAM STEINBERG was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the Opera and of the famous Museum-concerts. There he conducted many contemporary operas for the first time, one of which was Berg's Wozzeck; he also directed the world premières of Weill's Mahagonny, Schoenberg's Von Heute auf Morgen and George Antheil's Transatlantic. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. He later did similar work for the Jewish community in Berlin. He left Germany in 1936. He was co-founder with Bronislav Huberman of the Palestine Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic), becoming its first conductor after the inaugural concert, which was directed in December 1936 by Arturo Toscanini. Mr Steinberg came to the United States in 1938, at Toscanini's invitation, to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Between 1958 and 1960 Mr Steinberg traveled regularly between Pittsburgh and London, while he served as music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In the 1964-1965 season he appeared as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. The Orchestra in Pittsburgh has become under his direction one of the foremost in the country. In 1964 he and the orchestra made a three-month tour of Europe and the Near East under the auspices of the State Department's office of Cultural Presentations, a journey covering 25,000 miles in fourteen countries and including 50 concerts.

Later in 1964 Mr Steinberg became principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and directed concerts for twelve weeks during several winter seasons. In the summer of 1965 he conducted the Orchestra during the first week of its free concerts in the parks of New York City. The performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony in Central Park, which opened the series, attracted an audience of more than 75,000. Mr Steinberg has also had extensive engagements in Europe, and during the summer of 1967 he conducted many of the concerts given during its tour of the United States by the Israel Philharmonic, the orchestra with which he had been so closely associated thirty years earlier. He has directed many recordings for the Command and RCA labels. Mr Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's major orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

SHOPPER
KEENE, N. H.
WEEKLY 20,700

SEP 23 1970 New England

Symphony To Open 90th Season

The Boston Symphony's music director, William Steinberg, opens the Nintieth Anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, Sept. 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Sept. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's The Planets followed by Partos' Paths, symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

The first of six Open Rehearsals takes place Thursday evening, Sept. 24 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the orchestra in the program scheduled for the next afternoon.

Income from ticket sales from these informal and informative rehearsals benefit the orchestra's pension fund. Ticket price for the series of six is $15. An individual concert is $3. Seats are unreserved.

Going to "The Planets"

by Harry Neville

William Steinberg has chosen to conduct Gustav Holst's "The Planets" this Friday as the opening work of the Boston Symphony season. In doing so Steinberg will be reviving the most popular work of a once popular composer—a man who, though unfamiliar to most of today's concert-goers, once enjoyed the kind of acclaim that is given to few composers during their lifetime.

In his native England Holst (1874 - 1934) received something bordering on adulation from a public that had come to love "The Planets" from its numerous performances at London Proms concerts during the 1920's. The critical profession did him the favor of establishing his reputation as a "controversial" composer, although it is difficult nowadays to understand what would have provoked controversy in Holst's music. The composer was the recipient, too, of national and international honors, including one from Harvard University, where for six months during 1932 he held the post of lecturer in composition.

During his stay at Harvard Holst conducted three concerts of his own works with the Boston Symphony, and the event proved to be one of the overwhelming experiences of his life. "The band treated me royally," he wrote afterwards to his daughter, Imogen. "At two of the rehearsals they insisted on staying half an hour extra and at every possible occasion they cheered me . . . The only fault of the orchestra was that they were over anxious. On Friday's concert there were half a dozen extraordinary slips in the Planets: in the Perfect Fool ballet the harpist missed a line and the water music sounded quite modern: while in the St. Paul's Suite I broke a collar stud." He added, however, that Saturday's concert was "really good."

He wrote too of a Harvard concert given in his honor, at which Archibald Davison conducted and the Harvard Glee Club sang some of his choral works. "Those youngsters sang some of my things by heart.

Denise Le Brun is a member of the cast of "Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris," the musical at the Charles Theater. Her rendition of "Ay, Marike," among others, is a thrilling experience in the theater.

One can't have a higher compliment than that! And the first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wanted to return his fee!!" Holst must have had extraordinary personal magnetism indeed. Not even Stravinsky would have had musicians clamoring to rehearse overtime or to return their fees.

All this fame disappeared almost as quickly as it had arisen, and by the 1940's Holst had pretty much become an interesting but not very provocative footnote in musical history. The slightly increased attention he has received of late has been due in part to the record industry's need to present new material, but it is mainly the result of untiring devotion and work by the composer's daughter, Imogen Holst, who in addition to conducting and editing his work has written two books on the subject of her father and his music.

No one has written more fairly and dispassionately about Holst's music, and in considering this composer's final position one can do no better than to cite her account of his reaction to a piece of chamber music by Schubert: "As he listened to Schubert's Quintet he realized what he had lost, not only in his music but in his life. He could cling to his austerity. He could fill his days with kindness and good humor. He could write music that was neither commonplace, unmeaning, nor tame . . . But he missed the warmth of the Schubert Quintet. At the moment, it seemed as if this warmth were the only thing worth having."

"The Planets," Holst's only major work that is played with any regularity, was written at about the midpoint of the composer's career. It is a transitional work which, despite some weaknesses, contains moments of great beauty and imagination. One of these occurs at the end of the final movement, "Neptune," when a chorus of women's voices repeats a chordal sequence ever more faintly until the listener is not quite sure when the work has ended. British critic Charles Reid may have captured the feeling of many listeners when he wrote the following about this passage:

"In relation to the suite as a whole, this wordless vocalization takes up little time and room. Yet . . . it colors in retrospect the score as a whole. One may go further. It is a symbol of Holst's entire mind, talent, and output. It points to a central value; to something rarefied and lonely, with hints of forbidding bleakness beyond . . . Holst was a visionary who seemed subject to sways and pulls unknown to most mortals."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 20 1970 New England

BSO tickets

Individual tickets for subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra go on sale today at the Symphony Hall Box Office located in the Massachusetts Avenue lobby.

Special student tickets at $3 are available 10 minutes before concert time with presentation of valid ID cards.

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475

SEP 24 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,877

SEP 25 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) [illegible] (E) 194,7[illegible]
(S) [illegible]

BSO reviewed Monday

Music critic Michael Steinberg is in Washington attending meetings of the National Endowment for the Arts music advisory panel, of which he is a member. He will cover the opening program of the Boston Symphony season at Saturday night's performance, and his review will appear in all editions of Monday's Globe.

Steinburg Opens 90th Season

BOSTON, MASS. - The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the Nintieth Anniversary season of the Orchestra with the first pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday afternoon, September 25 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, September 26 at 8:30 p.m.

The program begins with Holst's "The Planets" followed by Partos' "Baths", symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

Boston Symphony opens season Sept. 25-26

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony's Music Director, William Steinberg, opens the 90th Anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday and Saturday concerts at 2 p.m. Friday, Sept. 25 and 8:30 p.m. Saturday, Sept. 26. The program begins with Holst's The Planets followed by Partos' Paths, symphonic elegy, with the New England Conservatory Women's Chorus. The program concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

UNION
HAMPTON, N. H.
WEEKLY 4639

SEP 23 1970 New England

90TH SEASON

The Boston Symphony's Music Director William Steinberg opens the 90th anniversary season of the orchestra with the first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940

SEP 24 1970 New England

Michael Tilson Thomas To Conduct Symphony Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the second Friday/Saturday apir of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday, October 2 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, October 3, at 8:30 p.m.

Paul Zukofsky is violin soloist. The program opens with Bach's Suite No. 4, followed by Piston's Symphony no. 2.

After intermission, Mr. Zukofsky is soloist in William Schuman's violin concerto. The program concludes with Ravel's La valso.

MERRIMAC VALLEY
ADVERTISER
TEWKSBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 20,000

SEP 23 1970 New England

Symphony

Holst's 'The Planets' Opens 90th Season

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert was the first of the orchestra's 90th anniversary season and it also marked Music Director William Steinberg's first appearance on the Symphony Hall podium since his illness of last season. But despite its festive possibilities the occasion was mercifully devoid of pomp and ceremony, and the Friday afternoon patrons, after rising to greet Maestro Steinberg, treated the event with very much the same calmly polite behavior as they display on any other Friday afternoon of the season.

Musically, however, there aren't a great many past Friday afternoons that would compare with this one, for Steinberg was in top form and produced readings that were eloquent, persuasive and altogether remarkable for their energy, drive and excitement. Technically the BSO playing was good without being all that one might wish in matters of attack and phrasing. The players did seem to respond with unusual attentiveness to Steinberg's direction, and one easily got the impression that after the unavoidable chaos of last year this was a kind of new beginning for the orchestra.

THE PROGRAM opened with Gustav Holst's "The Planet," a work made difficult not only by its length, mammoth scoring and frequently dense textures, but also by a certain ponderous, lumbering quality about some of the composer's rhythmic ideas. Holst obviously intended each of the seven sections to be a fairly specific mood portrait, and his musical conception of these moods has just enough naivete to require of the performer a suspension of disbelief, as literary critics are fond of saying.

Steinberg paid the music the tribute of taking it with complete seriousness, and the result was a performance at times stunning in its impact. The opening section, "Mars, the Bringer of War," was not only martial but a quite vivid depiction of terrors of war, and while "Mercury, the Winged Messenger" was perhaps a trifle cautious and unmercurial, Steinberg's excellent rhythm made possible such details as a really telling presentation of the sudden cross-rhythmic outbursts.

The concluding "Neptune, the Mystic" featured the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus singing a difficult but rewarding part very well indeed, with the final fading-away done to perfection.

The program notes explained that "Paths," a symphonic elegy by Oedoen Partos, was commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife. Though "Paths" is scored for a very large orchestra, the full force of the ensemble is used sparingly and the music is for the most part gentle and restrained, as befits an elegy. Occasionally the composer's use of aleatory techniques struck this listener as a dutiful and unnecessary gesture toward contemporaneousness.

About Steinberg's account of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony this writer will only say that it was a most exciting performance, one that should be heard by anyone who likes Beethoven played in a taut, lean and incisive fashion.

Symphony begins 90th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg conducting, began its 90th anniversary season with Symphony Hall concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program: Holst's "The Planets," the first performances in America of "Paths," a symphonic elegy by Oedoen Partos, and the Beethoven 7th Symphony.

"Paths" is the first of a series of commissions by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation established by the conductor in memory of his wife. The commissions go to Israeli composers, and the pieces have their first performances in Israel, "Paths" having been first played at the Ein Gev Festival last April.

Partos, 63, this week, is of Hungarian birth and in 1938 became principal violist of the then two-year-old Palestine Orchestra, of which Steinberg was co-founder (with Bronislaw Huberman) and the first conductor. Partos left the orchestra in 1956 and is now director of the Israel Music Academy in Tel Aviv.

From a single hearing of "Paths," in what appeared to be a clear performance, I carried away above all the impression of a highly concentrated piece. It takes about 15 minutes, and is a single movement, though one very much sectionalized. Its component sections are short, vividly characterized, and greatly, even drastically, contrasted. It is dissonant music whose gestures are often abrupt and almost always terse rather than expansive. From this nervous, rather aggressive energy, there is passing relief only in a couple of solos, one for bass and another for flute, both more like recitative than song. There are also some moments of what I took to be a sort of controlled improvisation, with the players repeating patterns or figures at will, their effect essentially being one of frozen, extremely tense fermatas.

The scoring is assured, and through its tightly packed sonorities, it, too, contributes to that sense of concentration and density that "Paths" projects so strongly. "Paths" represents a remarkable departure from Partos's earlier rhetorical manner. Though neither moved nor excited by it, I found "Paths" a ripe and responsible music, a piece that rewards the attention it commands. Certainly, it makes an auspicious beginning to the Steinberg commissions, and I hope that its performance here can be followed up by one of the second works in the series, the interesting Double Concerto (violin and cello) by Josef Tal.

Because it is so uneven, "The Planets" is a bewildering composition. Holst, too much neglected, could write music that plumbs and stirs deeply: I hear that, for example, in the "Hymn of Jesus," even more in the opera "Savitri" and that marvelous song "Betelgeuse." I hear it, too in some of "The Planets," in Mars, with its emphasis on the stupidity of war (interestingly, Mars, the first written of the movements, was the only one completed before the outbreak of the 1914 war); in Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; in Neptune, the Mystic. And then I really do not know how to deal with a work that in the same breath, as it were, proposes the banalities of Jupiter, which is bad pseudo-Elgar, or the unimaginative commonplaces of Mercury or of Uranus the Magician.

The performance was effective when heaviness and a certain rude energy were most appropriate to it, and best of all in the really superb battering through Mars. Elsewhere, it lacked something in lightness and mystery, while wanting a great deal in orchestral refinement.

As at the Pittsburgh Symphony's opening concert the week before, Steinberg conducted the Beethoven 7th with a magnificent maturity and vitality. The Boston orchestra has a more sumptuous sound than the Pittsburgh (to say nothing of a better hall), neither could get the first 16th-note scale in the Introduction together, and Pittsburgh's rhythm is better. In particular, the Boston woodwinds still need to be convinced about the trochees in the Scherzo, which they learned to misplay under Leinsdorf and whose first notes they still tend to shortchange. Intonation was a bit gritty all evening, and in general, if one were to apply a very tough standard to the orchestra that played in Symphony Hall Saturday evening, one might say that it is good, or even very good, but a Boston Symphony it's not.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 28 1970 New England

'Planets' opens BSO's 90th

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

By Louis Snyder

Summer was supposed to have departed early last week, but it returned on Friday afternoon, just in time for the opening of the Boston Symphony's 90th season, with the result that Tanglewood temperatures prevailed in Symphony Hall. Fortunately music director William Steinberg, returning with renewed vitality and incisiveness, had planned a program which, for the most part, was filled with elements of spaciousness and scope, so that the occasion offered little opportunity for languor. Each of the three numbers had its share of sonic bursts, with the result that there was no time for dozing.

Gustav Holst's "The Planets," last played by the BSO in 1946, and hardly a repertory piece anywhere else in this country at least, opened the program. It proved to be an interesting choice for many reasons — a reintroduction to a composer who has all but disappeared from concert programs, a subject (or subjects) much in mind these days in astrological and spatial contexts, and considering the period of composition (1914-17), a rather amazing score in its use of experimental devices. The orchestra played it beautifully — none of the solo passages wilted — and the offstage women's voices of the New England Conservatory chorus were really airborne in the ethereal fading moments which end the work.

"Paths," a one-movement "symphonic elegy" by the Israeli composer, Oedoen Partos, and the first piece to be commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, had its first American performance. "Meant to symbolize the paths of development of a musical idea or the paths of a human life," in the words of the composer, the work is strongly structured if not easily unraveled in one hearing. There are some intriguing passages for percussion and for strings, if indeed the "dramatic sadness" which Mr. Partos attributes to his score is not readily apparent.

There was a rousing performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to conclude the program—men in the orchestra (and in the audience) had come back coatless after intermission; ladies remained as they were. Mr. Steinberg's reading of this tremendous work was spacious and breezy, and the musicians were swept along with him to grand effect. It was nice to be reminded again of the BSO's superb separate choirs, of its topflight soloists, and its unique ensemble effort when everything is just right. It was that at the end of Friday's concert, and the audience let conductor and orchestra know it.

The program will be repeated tomorrow and Thursday evenings at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 27 1970 New England

3.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon September 25 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 26 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening September 29 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening October 1 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HOLST — The planets op. 32
Mars, the bringer of war
Venus, the bringer of peace
Mercury, the winged messenger
Jupiter, the bringer of jollity
Saturn, the bringer of old age
Uranus, the magician
Neptune, the mystic

WOMEN OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon director

intermission

PARTOS — 'Paths', symphonic elegy
first performance in America

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A op. 92*
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

B S Opener

It was surprising to see that William Steinberg had programmed Gustav Holst's The Planets on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concert last weekend. The Planets doesn't seem to turn up as often as it used to, partly because it must have sounded much more sophisticated a few year ago than it does today. It is a strangely derivative piece as well — I hear all sorts of influences, the Debussy of Sirenes in the wordless women's chorus of the Neptune section, the Sorceror's Apprentice in the Uranus movement. (Adrian Boult insists that Holst had not heard or seen the Dukas score when he wrote The Planets.) To ears familiar with Debussy and Stravinsky, The Planets does not wear very well.

But this music is great fun, and is something of an orchestral display piece as well. Steinberg and the BSO made exciting work of it, too. Though some of the ensemble was a little off, and intonation was a recurrent problem, not surprising for a season opener. Things will improve. Special praise is due to first horn James Stagliano for his solo in the wonderful, delicately scored Venus music — woodwinds and harp over pedal point in the bass. The horn solo, a high sustained passage, must give horn players nightmares.

I was less happy with Steinberg's reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. This is, certainly, the kind of repertory Steinberg knows best, but, for my taste, it was not a big enough performance. Tempi in all four movements were brisk, too brisk to allow for much freedom of expression. There was also some of the same rhythmic imprecision which occasionally surfaced in the Holst. Steinberg's Seventh did have vitality, but at the expense of breadth and careful working out of detail.

Best played was a new piece, Paths, by Israeli Odeon Partos. On one hearing it was obvious that Paths is a work of careful craftsmanship, though marred by a few typical post-serial cliches. (Interestingly, Partos rejected serial technique until about ten years ago, when he was already in his fifties.) Whether it is a work capable of gaining a place of affection in the hearts of most listeners is less clear.

—L. P. KATZENSTEIN

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

OCT 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Symphony

Holst's 'The Planets' Opens 90th Season

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 293,557
OCT 2 1970
New England Newsclip

Yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert was the first of the orchestra's 90th anniversary season and it also marked Music Director William Steinberg's first appearance on the Symphony Hall podium since his illness of last season. But despite its festive possibilities the occasion was mercifully devoid of pomp and ceremony, and the Friday afternoon patrons, after rising to greet Maestro Steinberg, treated the event with very much the same calmly polite behavior as they display on any other Friday afternoon of the season.

Musically, however, there aren't a great many past Friday afternoons that would compare with this one, for Steinberg was in top form and produced readings that were eloquent, persuasive and altogether remarkable for their energy, drive and excitement. Technically the BSO playing was good without being all that one might wish in matters of attack and phrasing. The players did seem to respond with unusual attentiveness to Steinberg's direction, and one easily got the impression that after the unavoidable chaos of last year this was a kind of new beginning for the orchestra.

THE PROGRAM opened with Gustav Holst's "The Planet," a work made difficult not only by its length, mammoth scoring and frequently dense textures, but also by a certain ponderous, lumbering quality about some of the composer's rhythmic ideas. Holst obviously intended each of the seven sections to be a fairly specific mood portrait, and his musical conception of these moods has just enough naivete to require of the performer a suspension of disbelief, as literary critics are fond of saying.

Steinberg paid the music the tribute of taking it with complete seriousness, and the result was a performance at times stunning in its impact. The opening section, "Mars, the Bringer of War," was not only martial but a quite vivid depiction of terrors of war, and while "Mercury, the Winged Messenger" was perhaps a trifle cautious and unmercurial, Steinberg's excellent rhythm made possible such details as a really telling presentation of the sudden cross-rhythmic outbursts.

The concluding "Neptune, the Mystic" featured the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus singing a difficult but rewarding part very well indeed, with the final fading-away done to perfection.

The program notes explained that "Paths," a symphonic elegy by Oedoen Partos, was commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife. Though "Paths" is scored for a very large orchestra, the full force of the ensemble is used sparingly and the music is for the most part gentle and restrained, as befits an elegy. Occasionally the composer's use of aleatory techniques struck this listener as a dutiful and unnecessary gesture toward contemporaneousness.

About Steinberg's account of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony this writer will only say that it was a most exciting performance, one that should be heard by anyone who likes Beethoven played in a taut, lean and incisive fashion.

Symphony begins 90th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg conducting, began its 90th anniversary season with Symphony Hall concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program: Holst's "The Planets," the first performances in America of "Paths," a symphonic elegy by Oedoen Partos, and the Beethoven 7th Symphony.

"Paths" is the first of a series of commissions by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation established by the conductor in memory of his wife. The commissions go to Israeli composers, and the pieces have their first performances in Israel, "Paths" having been first played at the Ein Gev Festival last April.

Partos, 63, this week, is of Hungarian birth and in 1938 became principal violist of the then two-year-old Palestine Orchestra, of which Steinberg was cofounder (with Bronislaw Huberman) and the first conductor. Partos left the orchestra in 1956 and is now director of the Israel Music Academy in Tel Aviv.

From a single hearing of "Paths," in what appeared to be a clear performance, I carried away above all the impression of a highly concentrated piece. It takes about 15 minutes, and is a single movement, though one very much sectionalized. Its component sections are short, vividly characterized, and greatly, even drastically, contrasted. It is dissonant music whose gestures are often abrupt and almost always terse rather than expansive. From this nervous, rather aggressive energy, there is passing relief only in a couple of solos, one for bass and another for flute, both more like recitative than song. There are also some moments of what I took to be a sort of controlled improvisation, with the players repeating patterns or figures at will, their effect essentially being one of frozen, extremely tense fermatas.

The scoring is assured, and through its tightly packed sonorities, it, too, contributes to that sense of concentration and density that "Paths" projects so strongly. "Paths" represents a remarkable departure from Partos's earlier rhetorical manner. Though neither moved nor excited by it, I found "Paths" a ripe and responsible music, a piece that rewards the attention it commands. Certainly, it makes an auspicious beginning to the Steinberg commissions, and I hope that its performance here can be followed up by one of the second works in the series, the interesting Double Concerto (violin and cello) by Josef Tal.

Because it is so uneven, "The Planets" is a bewildering composition. Holst, too much neglected, could write music that plumbs and stirs deeply: I hear that, for example, in the "Hymn of Jesus," even more in the opera "Savitri" and that marvelous song "Betelgeuse." I hear it, too in some of "The Planets," in Mars, with its emphasis on the stupidity of war (interestingly, Mars, the first written of the movements, was the only one completed before the outbreak of the 1914 war); in Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; in Neptune, the Mystic. And then I really do not know how to deal with a work that in the same breath, as it were, proposes the banalities of Jupiter, which is bad pseudo-Elgar, or the unimaginative commonplaces of Mercury or of Uranus the Magician.

The performance was effective when heaviness and a certain rude energy were most appropriate to it, and best of all in the really superb battering through Mars. Elsewhere, it lacked something in lightness and mystery, while wanting a great deal in orchestral refinement.

As at the Pittsburgh Symphony's opening concert the week before, Steinberg conducted the Beethoven 7th with a magnificent maturity and vitality. The Boston orchestra has a more sumptuous sound than the Pittsburgh (to say nothing of a better hall), neither could get the first 16th-note scale in the Introduction together, and Pittsburgh's rhythm is better. In particular, the Boston woodwinds still need to be convinced about the trochees in the Scherzo, which they learned to misplay under Leinsdorf and whose first notes they still tend to shortchange. Intonation was a bit gritty all evening, and in general, if one were to apply a very tough standard to the orchestra that played in Symphony Hall Saturday evening, one might say that it is good, or even very good, but a Boston Symphony it's not.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 28 1970 New England

'Planets' opens BSO's 90th

By Louis Snyder

Summer was supposed to have departed early last week, but it returned on Friday afternoon, just in time for the opening of the Boston Symphony's 90th season, with the result that Tanglewood temperatures prevailed in Symphony Hall. Fortunately music director William Steinberg, returning with renewed vitality and incisiveness, had planned a program which, for the most part, was filled with elements of spaciousness and scope, so that the occasion offered little opportunity for languor. Each of the three numbers had its share of sonic bursts, with the result that there was no time for dozing.

Gustav Holst's "The Planets," last played by the BSO in 1946, and hardly a repertory piece anywhere else in this country at least, opened the program. It proved to be an interesting choice for many reasons — a reintroduction to a composer who has all but disappeared from concert programs, a subject (or subjects) much in mind these days in astrological and spatial contexts, and considering the period of composition (1914-17), a rather amazing score in its use of experimental devices. The orchestra played it beautifully — none of the solo passages wilted — and the offstage women's voices of the New England Conservatory chorus were really airborne in the ethereal fading moments which end the work.

"Paths," a one-movement "symphonic elegy" by the Israeli composer, Oedoen Partos, and the first piece to be commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, had its first American performance. "Meant to symbolize the paths of development of a musical idea or the paths of a human life," in the words of the composer, the work is strongly structured if not easily unraveled in one hearing. There are some intriguing passages for percussion and for strings, if indeed the "dramatic sadness" which Mr. Partos attributes to his score is not readily apparent.

There was a rousing performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to conclude the program—men in the orchestra (and in the audience) had come back coatless after intermission; ladies remained as they were. Mr. Steinberg's reading of this tremendous work was spacious and breezy, and the musicians were swept along with him to grand effect. It was nice to be reminded again of the BSO's superb separate choirs, of its topflight soloists, and its unique ensemble effort when everything is just right. It was that at the end of Friday's concert, and the audience let conductor and orchestra know it.

The program will be repeated tomorrow and Thursday evenings at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS
(M) 2
SEP 2 1970 New England

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon September 25 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 26 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening September 29 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening October 1 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HOLST — The planets op. 32
Mars, the bringer of war
Venus, the bringer of peace
Mercury, the winged messenger
Jupiter, the bringer of jollity
Saturn, the bringer of old age
Uranus, the magician
Neptune, the mystic

WOMEN OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon director

intermission

PARTOS — 'Paths', symphonic elegy
first performance in America

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A op. 92*
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

B S Opener

It was surprising to see that William Steinberg had programmed Gustav Holst's The Planets on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concert last weekend. The Planets doesn't seem to turn up as often as it used to, partly because it must have sounded much more sophisticated a few year ago than it does today. It is a strangely derivative piece as well — I hear all sorts of influences, the Debussy of Sirenes in the wordless women's chorus of the Neptune section, the Sorceror's Apprentice in the Uranus movement. (Adrian Boult insists that Holst had not heard or seen the Dukas score when he wrote The Planets.) To ears familiar with Debussy and Stravinsky, The Planets does not wear very well.

But this music is great fun, and is something of an orchestral display piece as well. Steinberg and the BSO made exciting work of it, too. Though some of the ensemble was a little off, and intonation was a recurrent problem, not surprising for a season opener. Things will improve. Special praise is due to first horn James Stagliano for his solo in the wonderful, delicately scored Venus music — woodwinds and harp over pedal point in the bass. The horn solo, a high sustained passage, must give horn players nightmares.

I was less happy with Steinberg's reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. This is, certainly, the kind of repertory Steinberg knows best, but for my taste, it was not a big enough performance. Tempi in all four movements were brisk, too brisk to allow for much freedom of expression. There was also some of the same rhythmic imprecision which occasionally surfaced in the Holst. Steinberg's Seventh did have vitality, but at the expense of breadth and careful working out of detail.

Best played was a new piece, Paths, by Israeli Odeon Partos. On one hearing it was obvious that Paths is a work of careful craftsmanship, though marred by a few typical post-serial cliches. (Interestingly, Partos rejected serial technique until about ten years ago, when he was already in his fifties.) Whether it is a work capable of gaining a place of affection in the hearts of most listeners is less clear.

—L. P. KATZENSTEIN

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500
OCT 6 1970 New England Newsclip

4.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 1 1970

William Steinberg

OPENS BSO's NINETIETH SEASON

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg chose to open the ninetieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last weekend with two moderns and a Beethoven: Holst's "The Planets" (1918), Partos "Paths" (1946) and the Beethoven "Seventh." The three disparate composers had something in common: uncommon imagination, formal originality and extraordinary audacity. And all three—the Englishman with an European family background, the Hungarian-become-Palestinian, the German revolutionary—speak (contribute to) an international language, use innovative and eclectic techniques to convey an humanistic experience. Private motivation shapes into public statement carried alive by the movement of extraordinary sound.

Steinberg is authoritative, sparing in movement—asking for—and getting—the essential of each work as well as the detail realization in tonal balance. As long as he is physically capable he must be cherished, as were Toscanini and Huberman, with whom he initiated the Palestine Symphony. Partos is an extension of the same source—Paths was commissioned by the foundation William Steinberg set up in memory of his wife and Partos now operates as a professor at Tel Aviv University.

All great music is, first, an active physical fact and second a mystical experience of being beyond the limited words and categories of logic. All arts, of course, aspire to the condition of music, undercutting the verbalizations for action-emotion—idea and offering 'life beyond life' (which Milton expected even for literature). Holst's involvement with astrology—"The Planets" a tangent to it—may be thought the result of educational lack. At too early an age he had to make a living, but gained in musical experience by one-night stands with the trombone. But the most sophisticated, scientifically educated understanding of nature is still illusion, though as workable as Ptolemaic astronomp before Copernicus, tronomy before Freud and music before Schoenberg.

The values result from a composer's private progress in an immediate world of experience, always unique, somewhat structured by his ideas nad the pressures of necessity. But when the musical form takes over and establishes a new experience to expand the 'normal,' the ideas brewed into impulse take a back seat. Instead of Holst's list o fthe planets, we might better look at the subtitles—war, peace, intelligence communicating, jollity (fro mthe ground up), old age, the 'magic' of life, final mystical question.

Never having met Mr. Steinberg, I couldn't swear to his mind, but I could hear uncanny realization of instrumental patterns that certainly created war, peace and the other fundamentals. How do you like "Jupiter" as the 'bringer of jollity,' and the emergence of a great folkish tune, melted-in, that spreads all trivial hoopla into general joy. (This is Holst's Jupiter—no astrological system). When the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus concluded off stage (like Debussy Sirens) and faded off into silence—and forever-now-what?—well, back to earth for intermission after a 'trip'—a controlled trip with no sickness. Like Vaughan Williams, who bowed to Holt's genius, the composer spanned the whole stretch between 'folk' and 'impressionist'—in the same world as Korsakoff, Debussy and Strauss—but his own man. The definition of musical image was sensitively sounded. And what a ballet the score could inspire!

The symphonic elegy by Partos was even more an exploitation of orchestral sound, much of it composed of chance sounds—shimmering textures of confused strings and winds—but all controlled within an unique pattern, wherein the dark harmonies of lower strings predominated over flicks of melody above.

And now Beethoven's Seventh. Steinberg tested it against two works of orchestral virtuosity—and it came off still something more. The introduction seems naive—chords, rising stacatto scales, a little melodic bit of sentiment—the choirs of strings, woodwinds, brass operate discretely—but the ingredients grow into a rhythm that never abates. Most of the "Seventh" could well be part of the Sixth—pastoral drama of the dance-of-life. The "Andante," however, ranges the whole terrain of thoughtful feeling with its variations and contrasting sections of flowing melody. Characteristic of Steinberg's musicianship was his tempo for the movement—really andante, not the adagio of posturing conductors, and the freeing of complex experience, instead of making a killing with momentary effect. And yet each details of phrasing had its expressive emphasis. I don't know how you get this except with an orchestra willing and capable, and a conductor of imaginative experience.

Will the ladies with the little hats and the tycoons who expect, of course, the best, and the general admission young, lurking for a thrill, realize that with Steinberg and his younger collaborators, we have something rich and rare?

Thomas leads Symphony in Piston, Schuman program

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Something is muddled in the program notes for the Boston Symphony concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Walter Piston's 2nd Symphony and William Schumann's Violin Concerto were about to be recorded by the orchestra, that information being followed by this sentence: In commemoration of their 30th anniversary, Broadcast Music Incorporated are sponsoring a project, in co-operation with Deutsche Grammophon, to record works which have won Pulitzer Prizes." Fine, except that neither work is a Pulitzer winner. The Piston got a New York Music Critics Circle award in 1945 and his later 3rd and 7th symphonies won Pulitzers; Schuman, too, was a Pulitzer winner, in fact the first one ever, but that was for his "Cantata, "A Free Song," in 1943.

I don't quite see how to put the pieces of all that together, but I am grateful for whatever chain of ideas got Piston's Symphony No. 2, not heard here since Munch conducted it in 1955, onto a Boston Symphony program. The 2nd, completed 1943, is a three-movement symphony, quick-slow-quick. Precise and contained, it comes from a point in his life when his music began to open up, to move more lyrically in longer, softer lines, to admit, quite simply, more personal warmth. The first two movements particularly are music of sensibility, and in the way that sensibility is articulated by way of a surface unfailingly cool and unruffled, in the elegant mastery of his writing, in his delightful inventiveness in matters of form (though always within the framework of very conservative assumptions), Piston comes across as something like a mid-20th century Mendelssohn.

The first movement is enjoyable for those very qualities, and the interesting and suggestive transformations of material in the recapitulation and particularly in the pensive coda give great pleasure. The Adagio, with its gentle undulating melodies and delicate textures, has, as I hear it, some kinship of spirit with the Andante of Brahms' 3d Symphony: it is gentle music, eloquent, and touching, astoudingly so. There is a bouncy finale which does not speak in a personal sort of way and for that difference loses something in interest: well carried off, it is fun and it certainly works on its own terms. The performance was beautiful, the playing in the Adagio of Harold Wright, the new solo clarinetist, particularly so and the 76-year-old composer was greeted with a standing ovation by orchestra and audience when Michael Thomas brought him to the stage.

Schuman's twice-revised Violin Concerto — its three versions date from 1947, 1956, and 1959 — is an accomplished piece of writing, and it is most interesting in things to do with solo-tutti contrasts in questions both of gesture and of texture. The form is well controlled, with lots of variety of pace packed into the two movements. The material itself has something ungainly and muscle-bound about it, and there is in Schuman's aggressive rhetoric something that reminds me of official architecture that is too big and too clean like Speer's Berlin Chancellery, the Foro Italico in Rome, or, for that matter, Lincoln Center where Mr. Schuman was boss for some years. There is slow and quiet music in the concerto, too, just as even such buildings have johns and potted plants, but I must say that on Friday I found myself cringing from whatever it was the piece was trying to tell me, and more, I think, because of manner than content. The work got a cooly efficient performance with Paul Zukofsky as soloist, and Mr. Schuman was there to share in its friendly reception.

The concert began and ended with brilliant dance music in D, Bach's 4th Suite, which is festive and the real thing, and Ravel's "La Valse," which is dream and a strangely mixed message of horror and something between fascination and love. Thomas conducted both with great verve and the Bach, as well, with a knowing and acute feeling for style and language; the orchestra's playing was alert and often brilliant.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 3 1970 New England

THE SOLOIST

PAUL ZUKOFSKY, formerly a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and more recently a member of the faculty, was born in Brooklyn in 1943. He started studying the violin as a very small boy, and when he was eight made his first public appearance, with the New Haven Symphony. Entering the Juilliard School at the early age of fourteen, he was soon giving important recitals, including three in Carnegie Hall. For the past few years Paul Zukofsky has specialized in contemporary literature and has recorded concertos of Sessions and Penderecki and made several other recordings on the CRI, Folkways, Nonesuch and Vanguard labels. He has taught at Swarthmore College and at the New England Conservatory of Music, and made radio and television appearances in this country and abroad. Paul Zukofsky made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August of this year, when he was soloist in the performance at Tanglewood of Szymanowski's Violin concerto no. 1.

Zukofsky Symphony soloist

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas leads the Boston Symphony this Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in a program which features Paul Zukofsky as soloist in William Schuman's Violin Concerto.

Other works to be heard are Bach's Suite No. 4, Piston's Symphony No. 2 and Ravel's "La Valse." The Piston and Schuman works, scheduled to be recorded on Deutsche Grammophon, are being given in conjunction with Broadcast Music, Inc. on the occasion of its thirtieth anniversary.

William Steinberg will repeat the season's opening program of works by Holst, Partos and Beethoven this Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 27 1970 New Engl

NINETIETH SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 2 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 3 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday October 20
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH	Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
	Ouverture
	Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
	Gavotte
	Menuet 1 – menuet 2
	Réjouissance (Rejoicing)
PISTON	Symphony no. 2 (1943)
	Moderato
	Adagio
	Allegro
intermission
SCHUMAN	Violin concerto
	Allegro risoluto – molto tranquillo – tempo primo – cadenza – agitato fervente
	Introduzione (adagio, quasi cadenza) – presto leggiero – allegretto – adagietto – poco a poco accelerando al allegro vivo
	PAUL ZUKOFSKY
RAVEL	La valse*

BACH SUITE

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the second Friday/Saturday pair of concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30, in a program to include Bach's Suite No. 4.

ROCKLAND STANDARD
ROCKLAND, MASS.
WKLY. COMB. CIRC. 2,350

OCT 1 1970

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

OCT 1 1970

TIMES
HOLBROOK, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

OCT 1 1970

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,410

OCT 1 1970

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475

OCT 1 1970

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

OCT 2 1970

Symphony Season Opens with Variety

By Diane Foster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

"The Planets" by Holst, "Paths" by Partos, and Symphony No. 7 in A by Beethoven opened the ninetieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with William Steinberg conducting. The program offered interest and variety with the familiar, the not-so-familiar, and the entirely new; and Tuesday evening's concert at Symphony Hall offered good performances.

Gustav Holst is an early 20th Century composer who should appear more frequently in the concert repertoire. Like Beethoven, he exploits the dynamic, harmonic, emotional, and color ranges. Unlike Beethoven, he was influenced by English folk song, as demonstrated in the planet "Jupiter," and by hindu mysticism, as evidenced in "Neptune."

"The Planets" is a cycle of tone poems suggested by astrological significance rather than by horoscopes or mythical deities. Mars, the bringer of war, opens the cycle with a repetitive, aggressive rhythm that is built to a potent climax.

Spirited Interpretation

Although the strings were not uniformly precise, the excitement and spirit in this movement set the pace for the entire performance of the composition. In contrast to the huge chords that conclude Mars, Venus, the bringer of peace, is introduced by a soft solo horn. The subsequent entrance of the flutes could have been gentler and softer in this rendition to provide better balance with the horn and to further accentuate the contrasting nature of the movement.

Mr. Steinberg's interpretation captured the fluttery, scherzo-like Mercury, the jolly Jupiter, the solemn Saturn, and the uproarious Uranus in their programmatic mood portraits. Most effective, however, was the mysterious Neptune. Its hushed, morendo ending, ethereally sung by the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus, floated into the air as if mystically, still resounding. This ambigious sound disappearance was especially effective in the performance as an extreme contrast to the more definite and less piano endings of the preceding gentle movements.

Trying a New Path

"Paths," a symphonic elegy, was the first piece to be commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife. This was its first performance in America.

Oedoen Partos says of his composition, "the name 'Paths' is meant to symbolize the paths of development of a musical idea or the paths of a human life . . . the sound content develops after a complex plan with many permutations: the different sections of the orchestra, strings, woodwinds, brass, and percussion instruments are used independently and in different combinations in each part of the work . . ."

A one movement symphony, "Paths" is dissonant and markedly sectional. It progresses from a clear and simple flute solo, for example, to a prolonged and thus accentuated blend of sounds, such as sliding strings in combination with other dark and varied orchestral sonorities. It is intellectually and emotionally interesting; yet at first hearing seemed to be emotionally unabsorbing, despite a current of apprehension, urgency, and occasional excitement. The performance was lucid and cohesive.

But Not Good Enough

Innovative in that it was the first symphony to begin with a pizzicato chord, the Seventh Symphony is immense in its proportions. The sustained, enveloping, and full orchestral tone in the long introduction yielded to a graceful, whimsical first movement. The rather fast tempo of the second movement emphasized the continuing motion of the symphony but minimized the inherent solemnity and fervor of the movement. In the third movement, the differentiation between the staccato Scherzo and the legato Trio was well projected, as was the alternation between fortissimo and piano. The finale, typical of the "unbuttoned" Beethoven, was spirited but not truly unleashed until the actual closing chords. As a whole, the performance of the symphony was good, but good is not quite good enough for Beethoven — nor should it be for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

4.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 1 1970

William Steinberg

OPENS BSO's NINETIETH SEASON

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg chose to open the ninetieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last weekend with two moderns and a Beethoven: Holst's "The Planets" (1918), Partos "Paths" (1946) and the Beethoven "Seventh." The three disparate composers had something in common: uncommon imagination, formal originality and extraordinary audacity. And all three—the Englishman with an European family background, the Hungarian-become-Palestinian, the German revolutionary—speak (contribute to) an international language, use innovative and eclectic techniques to convey an humanistic experience. Private motivation shapes into public statement carried alive by the movement of extraordinary sound.

Steinberg is authoritative, sparing in movement—asking for—and getting—the essential of each work as well as the detail realization in tonal balance. As long as he is physically capable he must be cherished, as were Toscanini and Huberman, with whom he initiated the Palestine Symphony. Partos is an extension of the same source—Paths was commissioned by the foundation William Steinberg set up in memory of his wife and Partos now operates as a professor at Tel Aviv University.

All great music is, first, an active physical fact and second a mystical experience of being beyond the limited words and categories of logic. All arts, of course, aspire to the condition of music, undercutting the verbalizations for action-emotion —idea and offering 'life beyond life' (which Milton expected even for literature). Holst's involvement with astrology—"The Planets" a tangent to it—may be thought the result of educational lack. At too early an age he had to make a living, but gained in musical experience by one-night stands with the trombone. But the most sophisticated, scientifically educated understanding of nature is still illusion, though as workable as Ptolemaic astronomp before Copernicus, tronomy before Freud and music before Schoenberg.

The values result from a composer's private progress in an immediate world of experience, always unique, somewhat structured by his ideas and the pressures of necessity. But when the musical form takes over and establishes a new experience to expand the 'normal,' the ideas brewed into impulse take a back seat. Instead of Holst's list o fthe planets, we might better look at the subtitles—war, peace, intelligence communicating, jollity (fro mthe ground up), old age, the 'magic' of life, final mystical question.

Never having met Mr. Steinberg, I couldn't swear to his mind, but I could hear uncanny realization of instrumental patterns that certainly created war, peace and the other fundamentals. How do you like "Jupiter" as the 'bringer of jollity,' and the emergence of a great folkish tune, melted-in, that spreacs all trivial hoopla into general joy. (This is Holst's Jupiter—no astrological system). When the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus concluded off stage (like Debussy Sirens) and faded off into silence—and forever-now-what?—well, back to earth for intermission after a 'trip'—a controlled trip with no sickness. Like Vaughan Williams, who bowed to Holt's genius, the composer spanned the whole stretch between 'folk' and 'impressionist'—in the same world as Korsakoff, Debussy and Strauss—but his own man. The definition of musical image was sensitively sounded. And what a ballet the score could inspire!

The symphonic elegy by Partos was even more an exploitation of orchestral sound, much of it composed of chance sounds—shimmering textures of confused strings and winds —but all controlled within an unique pattern, wherein the dark harmonies of lower strings predominated over flicks of melody above.

And now Beethoven's Seventh. Steinberg tested it against two works of orchestral virtuosity—and it came off still something more. The introduction seems naive — chords, rising stacatto scales, a little melodic bit of sentiment—the choirs of strings, woodwinds, brass operate discretely—but the ingredients grow into a rhythm that never abates. Most of the "Seventh" could well be part of the Sixth—pastoral drama of the dance-of-life. The "Andante," however, ranges the whole terrain of thoughtful feeling with its variations and contrasting sections of flowing melody. Characteristic of Steinberg's musicianship was his tempo for the movement—really andante, not the adagio of posturing conductors, and the freeing of complex experience, instead of making a killing with momentary effect. And yet each details of phrasing had its expressive emphasis. I don't know how you get this except with an orchestra willing and capable, and a conductor of imaginative experience.

Will the ladies with the little hats and the tycoons who expect, of course, the best, and the general admission young, lurking for a thrill, realize that with Steinberg and his younger collaborators, we have something rich and rare?

Thomas leads Symphony in Piston, Schuman program

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Something is muddled in the program notes for the Boston Symphony concert which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Walter Piston's 2nd Symphony and William Schumann's Violin Concerto were about to be recorded by the orchestra, that information being followed by this sentence: In commemoration of their 30th anniversary, Broadcast Music Incorporated are sponsoring a project, in co-operation with Deutsche Grammophon, to record works which have won Pulitzer Prizes." Fine, except that neither work is a Pulitzer winner. The Piston got a New York Music Critics Circle award in 1945 and his later 3rd and 7th symphonies won Pulitzers; Schuman, too, was a Pulitzer winner, in fact the first one ever, but that was for his "Cantata, "A Free Song," in 1943.

I don't quite see how to put the pieces of all that together, but I am grateful for whatever chain of ideas got Piston's Symphony No. 2, not heard here since Munch conducted it in 1955, onto a Boston Symphony program. The 2nd, completed 1943, is a three-movement symphony, quick-slow-quick. Precise and contained, it comes from a point in his life when his music began to open up, to move more lyrically in longer, softer lines, to admit, quite simply, more personal warmth. The first two movements particularly are music of sensibility, and in the way that sensibility is articulated by way of a surface unfailingly cool and unruffled, in the elegant mastery of his writing, in his delightful inventiveness in matters of form (though always within the framework of very conservative assumptions), Piston comes across as something like a mid-20th century Mendelssohn.

The first movement is enjoyable for those very qualities, and the interesting and suggestive transformations of material in the recapitulation and particularly in the pensive coda give great pleasure. The Adagio, with its gentle undulating melodies and delicate textures, has, as I hear it, some kinship of spirit with the Andante of Brahms' 3d Symphony: it is gentle music, eloquent, and touching, astoudingly so. There is a bouncy finale which does not speak in a personal sort of way and for that difference loses something in interest: well carried off, it is fun and it certainly works on its own terms. The performance was beautiful, the playing in the Adagio of Harold Wright, the new solo clarinetist, particularly so and the 76-year-old composer was greeted with a standing ovation by orchestra and audience when Michael Thomas brought him to the stage.

Schuman's twice-revised Violin Concerto — its three versions date from 1947, 1956, and 1959 — is an accomplished piece of writing, and it is most interesting in things to do with solo-tutti contrasts in questions both of gesture and of texture. The form is well controlled, with lots of variety of pace packed into the two movements. The material itself has something ungainly and muscle-bound about it, and there is in Schuman's aggressive rhetoric something that reminds me of official architecture that is too big and too clean like Speer's Berlin Chancellery, the Foro Italico in Rome, or, for that matter, Lincoln Center where Mr. Schuman was boss for some years. There is slow and quiet music in the concerto, too, just as even such buildings have johns and potted plants, but I must say that on Friday I found myself cringing from whatever it was the piece was trying to tell me, and more, I think, because of manner than content. The work got a cooly efficient performance with Paul Zukofsky as soloist, and Mr. Schuman was there to share in its friendly reception.

The concert began and ended with brilliant dance music in D, Bach's 4th Suite, which is festive and the real thing, and Ravel's "La Valse," which is dream and a strangely mixed message of horror and something between fascination and love. Thomas conducted both with great verve and the Bach, as well, with a knowing and acute feeling for style and language; the orchestra's playing was alert and often brilliant.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 3 1970 New England

THE SOLOIST

PAUL ZUKOFSKY, formerly a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and more recently a member of the faculty, was born in Brooklyn in 1943. He started studying the violin as a very small boy, and when he was eight made his first public appearance, with the New Haven Symphony. Entering the Juilliard School at the early age of fourteen, he was soon giving important recitals, including three in Carnegie Hall. For the past few years Paul Zukofsky has specialized in contemporary literature and has recorded concertos of Sessions and Penderecki and made several other recordings on the CRI, Folkways, Nonesuch and Vanguard labels. He has taught at Swarthmore College and at the New England Conservatory of Music, and made radio and television appearances in this country and abroad. Paul Zukofsky made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August of this year, when he was soloist in the performance at Tanglewood of Szymanowski's Violin concerto no. 1.

NINETIETH SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 2 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 3 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday October 20
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH	Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
	Ouverture
	Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
	Gavotte
	Menuet 1 – menuet 2
	Réjouissance (Rejoicing)
PISTON	Symphony no. 2 (1943)
	Moderato
	Adagio
	Allegro
intermission
SCHUMAN	Violin concerto
	Allegro risoluto – molto tranquillo – tempo primo – cadenza – agitato fervente
	Introduzione (adagio, quasi cadenza) – presto leggiero – allegretto – adagietto – poco a poco accelerando al allegro vivo
	PAUL ZUKOFSKY
RAVEL	La valse*

Zukofsky Symphony soloist

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas leads the Boston Symphony this Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in a program which features Paul Zukofsky as soloist in William Schuman's Violin Concerto.

Other works to be heard are Bach's Suite No. 4, Piston's Symphony No. 2 and Ravel's "La Valse." The Piston and Schuman works, scheduled to be recorded on Deutsche Grammophon, are being given in conjunction with Broadcast Music, Inc. on the occasion of its thirtieth anniversary.

William Steinberg will repeat the season's opening program of works by Holst, Partos and Beethoven this Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 27 1970 New Engl

BACH SUITE

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the second Friday/Saturday pair of concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30, in a program to include Bach's Suite No. 4.

ROCKLAND STANDARD
ROCKLAND, MASS.
WKLY. COMB. CIRC. 2,350

OCT 1 1970

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

OCT 1 1970

TIMES
HOLBROOK, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

OCT 1 1970

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,410

OCT 1 1970

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475

OCT 1 1970

Symphony Season Opens with Variety

By Diane Foster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

OCT 2 1970

"The Planets" by Holst, "Paths" by Partos, and Symphony No. 7 in A by Beethoven opened the ninetieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with William Steinberg conducting. The program offered interest and variety with the familiar, the not-so-familiar, and the entirely new; and Tuesday evening's concert at Symphony Hall offered good performances

Gustav Holst is an early 20th Century composer who should appear more frequently in the concert repertoire. Like Beethoven, he exploits the dynamic, harmonic, emotional, and color ranges. Unlike Beethoven, he was influenced by English folk song, as demonstrated in the planet "Jupiter," and by hindu mysticism, as evidenced in "Neptune."

"The Planets" is a cycle of tone poems suggested by astrological significance rather than by horoscopes or mythical deities. Mars, the bringer of war, opens the cycle with a repetitive, aggressive rhythm that is built to a potent climax.

Spirited Interpretation

Although the strings were not uniformly precise, the excitement and spirit in this movement set the pace for the entire performance of the composition. In contrast to the huge chords that conclude Mars, Venus, the bringer of peace, is introduced by a soft solo horn. The subsequent entrance of the flutes could have been gentler and softer in this rendition to provide better balance with the horn and to further accentuate the contrasting nature of the movement.

Mr. Steinberg's interpretation captured the fluttery, scherzo-like Mercury, the jolly Jupiter, the solemn Saturn, and the uproarious Uranus in their programmatic mood portraits. Most effective, however, was the mysterious Neptune. Its hushed, morendo ending, ethereally sung by the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus, floated into the air as if mystically, still resounding. This ambigious sound disappearance was especially effective in the performance as an extreme contrast to the more definite and less piano endings of the preceding gentle movements.

Trying a New Path

"Paths," a symphonic elegy, was the first piece to be commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife. This was its first performance in America.

Oedoen Partos says of his composition, "the name 'Paths' is meant to symbolize the paths of development of a musical idea or the paths of a human life . . . the sound content develops after a complex plan with many permutations: the different sections of the orchestra, strings, woodwinds, brass, and percussion instruments are used independently and in different combinations in each part of the work . . ."

A one movement symphony, "Paths" is dissonant and markedly sectional. It progresses from a clear and simple flute solo, for example, to a prolonged and thus accentuated blend of sounds, such as sliding strings in combination with other dark and varied orchestral sonorities. It is intellectually and emotionally interesting; yet at first hearing seemed to be emotionally unabsorbing, despite a current of apprehension, urgency, and occasional excitement. The performance was lucid and cohesive.

But Not Good Enough

Innovative in that it was the first symphony to begin with a pizzicato chord, the Seventh Symphony is immense in its proportions. The sustained, enveloping, and full orchestral tone in the long introduction yielded to a graceful, whimsical first movement. The rather fast tempo of the second movement emphasized the continuing motion of the symphony but minimized the inherent solemnity and fervor of the movement. In the third movement, the differentiation between the staccato Scherzo and the legato Trio was well projected, as was the alternation between fortissimo and piano. The finale, typical of the "unbuttoned" Beethoven, was spirited but not truly unleashed until the actual closing chords. As a whole, the performance of the symphony was good, but good is not quite good enough for Beethoven — nor should it be for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE ASSOCIATE CONDUCTOR

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, who is the grandson of Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky, founders of the Yiddish Theatre in the United States, was born in Hollywood in 1944. Between the ages of fourteen and seventeen he studied piano with John Crown and Muriel Kerr, harpsichord with Alice Ehlers. He enrolled in the University of Southern California with advanced standing in 1962, and studied with Ingolf Dahl and John Crown. He was awarded the Alumni Prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years Michael Tilson Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center. At the Monday Evening concerts he was conductor and piano soloist during this time in performances, many of them premières, by contemporary composers, including Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He has been pianist in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. During the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and Ojai Festival the following year, Michael Tilson Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez. He was Conductor of the Ojai Festival in the summers of 1968 and 1969.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during 1968, he conducted the première of Silverman's Elephant steps, and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. During the 1968-1969 season he conducted youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Philharmonia. He returned to Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 as a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center, where he conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and was much involved in the musical preparation of the Center's production of Berg's Wozzeck. Appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-1970 season, he replaced William Steinberg at the concerts in New York during the fall when Mr Steinberg became ill. Subsequently he conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of this year. Last May he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During the summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. Michael Tilson Thomas is also the pianist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Among Deutsche Grammophon's initial release of albums by the Boston Symphony is Mr Thomas' first recording with the Orchestra, Three places in New England by Charles Ives, and Sun-treader by Carl Ruggles. He also plays the piano for an album of chamber music by Debussy, the first record made for Deutsche Grammophon by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

12 ▲ Monday, October 5, 1970

Thomas, Piston, Schuman

Leading the music in a spirit of inquiry

By Louis Snyder

Over the weekend, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted his first Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall as the orchestra's associate conductor, although he had officiated in his new position with the BSO at Tanglewood last summer. Almost a year ago, as assistant conductor, he directed the orchestra for the first time, and emerged from the status of an unknown quantity at his debut with the kind of auspicious potential that proved invaluable later in the season, when circumstances placed almost the full burden of the BSO schedule on his youthful shoulders.

This season's second program bore the Thomas stamp, not only for its choice of Bach, Walter Piston, William Schuman, and Ravel as the composers represented, but for the energy and musical inquiry applied to the recreation of their works. Mr. Thomas is obviously dedicated to the thoughtful purveying of music, although not as a maestro of long experience goes about it, since his method of approach does not suggest that he believes he already knows it all. The fact that he successfully enlists the BSO's musicians as dedicated partners in each enterprise adds a new zest to his performances, particularly of less familiar music, which sometimes lacks a welcome dimension of adventure and excitement in other hands.

The Piston Second Symphony, and the Schuman Violin Concerto, in a third and final version being played for the first time at these weekend concerts, benefited from the BSO-Thomas collaboration. Both works are skillfully designed, and now, 26 and 20 years respectively since their premieres, are more easily assimilable than some by practiced audiences. The Adagio (second movement) of the Symphony was particularly ingratiating, and the contributions of winds and brass singled out for applause along with conductor and composer — the latter being accorded the audience's own traditional BSO (Boston Standing Ovation).

The Schuman Concerto, which had Paul Zukofsky as its capable if occasionally submerged soloist, is a two-movement work that generates orchestral excitement, permits some highly complicated solo passages to be heard and some others to disappear in heavy instrumental texture, and in general happily stirs ear and pulse. Mr. Zukofsky, playing from the score, seemed to have a less sturdy tone than this work demands—in a large hall, at any rate—but since a recording is in prospect for these performers of both this and the Piston, live listeners' loss may be discophiles' gain. Mr. Schuman was the second composer to share bows and applause on Friday afternoon.

The two American pieces were bracketed by Bach's hearty Suite No. 4 in D, and Ravel's "La Valse," executed by Mr. Thomas and the orchestra as invitations to several kinds of dance, all smooth and rhythmic and swinging.

Symphony

Thomas Directs Piston, Schuman

By HARRY NEVILLE

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a program which included major works by two major American composers, Walter Piston and William Schuman.

By virtue of age and the esteem in which they are held, both men, and especially Piston, qualify for that dubious but well intended title "dean of American composers." Both composers were also overdue for some kind of substantial representation on BSO programs, and it was nice to have it in the form of such attractive works at Piston's Second Symphony and Schuman's Violin Concerto.

THE FORMER WORK, dating from 1943, is a tightly organized composition in three movements. The writing is characterized throughout by an easy, graceful flow of ideas and by absolutely impeccable craftsmanship.

The craftsmanship of the Schuman conerto, which was performed in its third (1959) version, is impressive too. With its complex rhythms and the dizzying angularity of much of the melodic writing, the concerto inhabits an altogether different world than Piston's symphony. And yet it exerts a similar appeal, one that is based on grace and good breeding, so to speak.

Thomas gave incisive, well balanced, propulsive readings of both works and proved himself a sensitive accompanist in the Schuman, which featured Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Zukofsky's stage manner is so detached and cool that it becomes almost engaging, and his aplomb makes his quite remarkable technique and musicianship seem ever more remarkable.

About the only thing one could wish for in his performance was a warmer, richer tone in the more lyrical passages. The same forces are recording both works, which is someting to look forward to.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 3 1970 N
Eng

WHRB review 10/5

There was a time when the Boston Symphony would perform Walter Piston's new works as a matter of course. That time is long past, however, and on Saturday night's program the Piston Second Symphony, along with William Schuman's Violin Concerto, figured as a rare novelty.

The Symphony, which dates from 1943, is quite a good piece. Piston spins out a number of very lovely, well-orchestrated themes which by themselves make the piece worth hearing. The boisterous finale is less effective--because even at its best moments the Symphony is kind of static and certainly not going towards such an affirmative end. Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas managed to respect both Piston's classical temperament and the influence of Mahler in the development of musical ideas.

Schuman's Violin Concerto is roughly contemporary with the Piston. The composer describes it as a romantic piece with frequently changing moods, tempi, and dynamics. Actually it is sort of prosy. Each of the many sections seems to point out an emotional state without actually involving the listener. For most of the Concerto the solo violin dominates the orchestra. Paul Zukofsky's clear, crisp tone was ideal, and his performance in this difficult part would in general be hard to improve upon. Tilson thomas' handling of the orchestra was exciting and sensitive to the composer's abrupt changes of mood. Still the piece did not offer that much.

In addition to the two modern American works, the program included Bach's Fourth Orchestral Suite and La Valse by Ravel. Tilson Thomas' Bach is always on the analytical side--a little too much attention to clarity of line and to contrasts in

F

The Ravel piece of m that Tilso everything
Harold Wri up to the
In le ability es was one mo
For W

THE JEWIS
At Tho

The its brilli
than cap regards is not a the orche
Suite had the rarely a performance—always rhythm, always verve—but no pushing of tempos. In fact, the only real allegros came in the fast middle of the Overture and the final Rejoicing. The Bourees had time to bounce, the Gavotte and Minuets time for a smiling dignity. Even the slow but sharply dotted rhythm of the beginning and end of the Overture had the lilt of dance—a royal progress. Rejoicing was a scherzo, before anybody invented the name.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 (of 1943) made a fine sequel to Bach. Both composers wrote on demand, had thorough command of contemporary language, carved their conceptions into definitive shape without losing impulsive inspiration, and both sound well. Bach's Baroque oppositions of strings and winds made blocks of contrasting color, and offers a more evolutionary development and is a textbook of instrumental resource.

From the time Koussevitsky said "You write, I play", Piston practically grew up with the Symphony, learning from it while he wrote for it. This second symphony in revival surprizes some by its warm humanity as well as its excitement. But the composer says he wants both head and heart in anybody's music—and heart includes the subrational impulse that throws up the forms. In this instance, Piston justifies the three movement sequence of the eighteenth century, the third being an abandoned dash that relieves the lovely introspection of the Adagio and yet makes a resounding finale.

Forgive my challenging my able friend, Klaus Roy, who wrote the program notes (taken from his article in Stereo) the Second is not a simple piece,—it is full of surprising complexities, though deceivingly "natural" — like Mozart. There are among other felicities, many passages of vital counterpoint making inner weaving of stress and color. The fine clarinet in the Adagio, beautifully played, does not long sing without other voices. And the counterpoint throughout is rhythmical as well as composer lived nearby, stood on his doorstep and asked if her musical daughter could watch him compose. Mr. Piston, always gracious, said that it might be arranged, "—only you see, madame, some days I only write one note"—pause—"and the next day I erase it." Smile and bow.

Fortunately Mr. Piston could be at this performance and bow to the applause of a standing audience. He has never been a joiner of fashionable clubs and bows as an individual of genius. This fine performance of a fine work must have seemed a bonus too long withheld.

For twelve years William Schuman diddled with his violin concerto. The third form of it was played with Paul Zukofsky on the violin (first time in Boston). Zukofsky (27) and Thomas (26) saw eye to eye, and Schuman had managed the unequal forces of a single violin and full orchestra with discretion so that the solo was never engulfed. Zukofsky played this belated version of 19th century exhibitionism with superb and musical command, and Schuman threw into the open spaces his usual big orchestral effects. Qui bono?

fine. It is a shame that sonata (or any chamber music) programs have not the public eclat of symphonic ones.

A perfect wind-up: Thomas leading Ravel's "La Valse." This homage to Johann Strauss, as of 1920, survived all the rejection for ballet by Diaghilev and the tortured interpretation's of war-gloomy commentators. Thomas played the score as an infectious fantasy—the swooning swing of old Vienna emerging from shadowy mist, and then rioting through an evolution of mood-change—color and counterpoint that never lost the old lilt and flung into a climax to asert nostalgic joy, no matter what lurked beyond the hall.

Next weekend, Steinberg with Reger and Bruckner.

THE ASSOCIATE CONDUCTOR

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, who is the grandson of Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky, founders of the Yiddish Theatre in the United States, was born in Hollywood in 1944. Between the ages of fourteen and seventeen he studied piano with John Crown and Muriel Kerr, harpsichord with Alice Ehlers. He enrolled in the University of Southern California with advanced standing in 1962, and studied with Ingolf Dahl and John Crown. He was awarded the Alumni Prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years Michael Tilson Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center. At the Monday Evening concerts he was conductor and piano soloist during this time in performances, many of them premières, by contemporary composers, including Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He has been pianist in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. During the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and Ojai Festival the following year, Michael Tilson Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez. He was Conductor of the Ojai Festival in the summers of 1968 and 1969.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during 1968, he conducted the première of Silverman's Elephant steps, and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. During the 1968-1969 season he conducted youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Philharmonia. He returned to Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 as a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center, where he conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and was much involved in the musical preparation of the Center's production of Berg's Wozzeck. Appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-1970 season, he replaced William Steinberg at the concerts in New York during the fall when Mr Steinberg became ill. Subsequently he conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of this year. Last May he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During the summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. Michael Tilson Thomas is also the pianist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Among Deutsche Grammophon's initial release of albums by the Boston Symphony is Mr Thomas' first recording with the Orchestra, Three places in New England by Charles Ives, and Sun-treader by Carl Ruggles. He also plays the piano for an album of chamber music by Debussy, the first record made for Deutsche Grammophon by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

12 ▲ Monday, October 5, 1970

Thomas, Piston, Schuman

Leading the music in a spirit of inquiry

By Louis Snyder

Over the weekend, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted his first Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall as the orchestra's associate conductor, although he had officiated in his new position with the BSO at Tanglewood last summer. Almost a year ago, as assistant conductor, he directed the orchestra for the first time, and emerged from the status of an unknown quantity at his debut with the kind of auspicious potential that proved invaluable later in the season, when circumstances placed almost the full burden of the BSO schedule on his youthful shoulders.

This season's second program bore the Thomas stamp, not only for its choice of Bach, Walter Piston, William Schuman, and Ravel as the composers represented, but for the energy and musical inquiry applied to the recreation of their works. Mr. Thomas is obviously dedicated to the thoughtful purveying of music, although not as a maestro of long experience goes about it, since his method of approach does not suggest that he believes he already knows it all. The fact that he successfully enlists the BSO's musicians as dedicated partners in each enterprise adds a new zest to his performances, particularly of less familiar music, which sometimes lacks a welcome dimension of adventure and excitement in other hands.

The Piston Second Symphony, and the Schuman Violin Concerto, in a third and final version being played for the first time at these weekend concerts, benefited from the BSO-Thomas collaboration. Both works are skillfully designed, and now, 26 and 20 years respectively since their premieres, are more easily assimilable than some by practiced audiences. The Adagio (second movement) of the Symphony was particularly ingratiating, and the contributions of winds and brass singled out for applause along with conductor and composer — the latter being accorded the audience's own traditional BSO (Boston Standing Ovation).

The Schuman Concerto, which had Paul Zukofsky as its capable if occasionally submerged soloist, is a two-movement work that generates orchestral excitement, permits some highly complicated solo passages to be heard and some others to disappear in heavy instrumental texture, and in general happily stirs ear and pulse. Mr. Zukofsky, playing from the score, seemed to have a less sturdy tone than this work demands—in a large hall, at any rate—but since a recording is in prospect for these performers of both this and the Piston, live listeners' loss may be discophiles' gain. Mr. Schuman was the second composer to share bows and applause on Friday afternoon.

The two American pieces were bracketed by Bach's hearty Suite No. 4 in D, and Ravel's "La Valse," executed by Mr. Thomas and the orchestra as invitations to several kinds of dance, all smooth and rhythmic and swinging.

Symphony

Thomas Directs Piston, Schuman

By HARRY NEVILLE

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a program which included major works by two major American composers, Walter Piston and William Schuman.

By virtue of age and the esteem in which they are held, both men, and especially Piston, qualify for that dubious but well intended title "dean of American composers." Both composers were also overdue for some kind of substantial representation on BSO programs, and it was nice to have it in the form of such attractive works at Piston's Second Symphony and Schuman's Violin Concerto.

THE FORMER WORK, dating from 1943, is a tightly organized composition in three movements. The writing is characterized throughout by an easy, graceful flow of ideas and by absolutely impeccable craftsmanship.

The craftsmanship of the Schuman conerto, which was performed in its third (1959) version, is impressive too. With its complex rhythms and the dizzying angularity of much of the melodic writing, the concerto inhabits an altogether different world than Piston's symphony. And yet it exerts a similar appeal, one that is based on grace and good breeding, so to speak.

Thomas gave incisive, well balanced, propulsive readings of both works and proved himself a sensitive accompanist in the Schuman, which featured Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Zukofsky's stage manner is so detached and cool that it becomes almost engaging, and his aplomb makes his quite remarkable technique and musicianship seem ever more remarkable.

About the only thing one could wish for in his performance was a warmer, richer tone in the more lyrical passages. The same forces are recording both works, which is someting to look forward to.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 3 1970 N
Eng

WHRB review 10/5

There was a time when the Boston Symphony would perform Walter Piston's new works as a matter of course. That time is long past, however, and on Saturday night's program the Piston Second Symphony, along with William Schuman's Violin Concerto, figured as a rare novelty.

The Symphony, which dates from 1943, is quite a good piece. Piston spins out a number of very lovely, well-orchestrated themes which by themselves make the piece worth hearing. The boisterous finale is less effective--because even at its best moments the Symphony is kind of static and certainly not going towards such an affirmative end. Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas managed to respect both Piston's classical temperament and the influence of Mahler in the development of musical ideas.

Schuman's Violin Concerto is roughly contemporary with the Piston. The composer describes it as a romantic piece with frequently changing moods, tempi, and dynamics. Actually it is sort of prosy. Each of the many sections seems to point out an emotional state without actually involving the listener. For most of the Concerto the solo violin dominates the orchestra. Paul Zukofsky's clear, crisp tone was ideal, and his performance in this difficult part would in general be hard to improve upon. Tilson thomas' handling of the orchestra was exciting and sensitive to the composer's abrupt changes of mood. Still the piece did not offer that much.

In addition to the two modern American works, the program included Bach's Fourth Orchestral Suite and La Valse by Ravel. Tilson Thomas' Bach is always on the analytical side--a little too much attention to clarity of line and to contrasts in orchestrat

Tempos we independen
The Ravel piece of m that Tilso everything
Harold Wri
up to the
In le ability es was one mo
For W

THE JEWIS
At Tho

The
its brilli
than cap regards is not a
the orche
Suite had the rarely a performance—always rhythm, always verve—but no pushing of tempos. In fact, the only real allegros came in the fast middle of the Overture and the final Rejoicing. The Bourees had time to bounce, the Gavotte and Minuets time for a smiling dignity. Even the slow but sharply dotted rhythm of the beginning and end of the Overture had the lilt of dance —a royal progress. Rejoicing was a scherzo, before anybody invented the name.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 (of 1943) made a fine sequel to Bach. Both composers wrote on demand, had thorough command of contemporary language, carved their conceptions into definitive shape without losing impulsive inspiration, and both sound well. Bach's Baroque oppositions of strings and winds made blocks of contrasting color, and offers a more evolutionary development and is a textbook of instrumental resource.

From the time Koussevitsky said "You write, I play", Piston practically grew up with the Symphony, learning from it while he wrote for it. This second symphony in revival surprizes some by its warm humanity as well as its excitement. But the composer says he wants both head and heart in anybody's music—and heart includes the subrational impulse that throws up the forms. In this instance, Piston justifies the three movement sequence of the eighteenth century, the third being an abandoned dash that relieves the lovely introspection of the Adagio and yet makes a resounding finale.

Forgive my challenging my able friend, Klaus Roy, who wrote the program notes (taken from his article in Stereo) the Second is not a simple piece,—it is full of surprising complexities, though deceivingly "natural" — like Mozart. There are among other felicities, many passages of vital counterpoint making inner weaving of stress and color. The fine clarinet in the Adagio, beautifully played, does not long sing without other voices. And the counterpoint throughout is rhythmical as well as composer lived nearby, stood on his doorstep and asked if her musical daughter could watch him compose. Mr. Piston, always gracious, said that it might be arranged, "—only you see, madame, some days I only write one note"—pause—"and the next day I erase it." Smile and bow.

Fortunately Mr. Piston could be at this performance and bow to the applause of a standing audience. He has never been a joiner of fashionable clubs and bows as an individual of genius. This fine performance of a fine work must have seemed a bonus too long withheld.

For twelve years William Schuman diddled with his violin concerto. The third form of it was played with Paul Zukofsky on the violin (first time in Boston). Zukofsky (27) and Thomas (26) saw eye to eye, and Schuman had managed the unequal forces of a single violin and full orchestra with discretion so that the solo was never engulfed. Zukofsky played this belated version of 19th century exhibitionism with superb and musical command, and Schuman threw into the open spaces his usual big orchestral effects. Qui bono?

erficial
a great ics, has nce for com-ut com-tinative
. Hear can, in is very fine. It is a shame that sonata (or any chamber music) programs have not the public eclat of symphonic ones.

A perfect wind-up: Thomas leading Ravel's "La Valse." This homage to Johann Strauss, as of 1920, survived all the rejection for ballet by Diaghilev and the tortured interpretation's of war-gloomy commentators. Thomas played the score as an infectious fantasy—the swooning swing of old Vienna emerging from shadowy mist, and then rioting through an evolution of mood-change—color and counterpoint that never lost the old lilt and flung into a climax to asert nostalgic joy, no matter what lurked beyond the hall.

Next weekend, Steinberg with Reger and Bruckner.

THE ASSOCIATE CONDUCTOR

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS, who is the grandson of Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky, founders of the Yiddish Theatre in the United States, was born in Hollywood in 1944. Between the ages of fourteen and seventeen he studied piano with John Crown and Muriel Kerr, harpsichord with Alice Ehlers. He enrolled in the University of Southern California with advanced standing in 1962, and studied with Ingolf Dahl and John Crown. He was awarded the Alumni Prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years Michael Tilson Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center. At the Monday Evening concerts he was conductor and piano soloist during this time in performances, many of them premières, by contemporary composers, including Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He has been pianist in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. During the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and Ojai Festival the following year, Michael Tilson Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez. He was Conductor of the Ojai Festival in the summers of 1968 and 1969.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during 1968, he conducted the première of Silverman's Elephant steps, and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. During the 1968-1969 season he conducted youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Philharmonia. He returned to Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 as a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center, where he conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and was much involved in the musical preparation of the Center's production of Berg's Wozzeck. Appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-1970 season, he replaced William Steinberg at the concerts in New York during the fall when Mr Steinberg became ill. Subsequently he conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of this year. Last May he made his London debut in concerts with the London Symphony. During the summer he conducted at the Ravinia Festival and at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, as well as at Tanglewood. Michael Tilson Thomas is also the pianist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Among Deutsche Grammophon's initial release of albums by the Boston Symphony is Mr Thomas' first recording with the Orchestra, Three places in New England by Charles Ives, and Sun-treader by Carl Ruggles. He also plays the piano for an album of chamber music by Debussy, the first record made for Deutsche Grammophon by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

12 ▲ Monday, October 5, 1970

Thomas, Piston, Schuman

Leading the music in a spirit of inquiry

By Louis Snyder

Over the weekend, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted his first Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall as the orchestra's associate conductor, although he had officiated in his new position with the BSO at Tanglewood last summer. Almost a year ago, as assistant conductor, he directed the orchestra for the first time, and emerged from the status of an unknown quantity at his debut with the kind of auspicious potential that proved invaluable later in the season, when circumstances placed almost the full burden of the BSO schedule on his youthful shoulders.

This season's second program bore the Thomas stamp, not only for its choice of Bach, Walter Piston, William Schuman, and Ravel as the composers represented, but for the energy and musical inquiry applied to the recreation of their works. Mr. Thomas is obviously dedicated to the thoughtful purveying of music, although not as a maestro of long experience goes about it, since his method of approach does not suggest that he believes he already knows it all. The fact that he successfully enlists the BSO's musicians as dedicated partners in each enterprise adds a new zest to his performances, particularly of less familiar music, which sometimes lacks a welcome dimension of adventure and excitement in other hands.

The Piston Second Symphony, and the Schuman Violin Concerto, in a third and final version being played for the first time at these weekend concerts, benefited from the BSO-Thomas collaboration. Both works are skillfully designed, and now, 26 and 20 years respectively since their premieres, are more easily assimilable than some by practiced audiences. The Adagio (second movement) of the Symphony was, particularly ingratiating, and the contributions of winds and brass singled out for applause along with conductor and composer — the latter being accorded the audience's own traditional BSO (Boston Standing Ovation).

The Schuman Concerto, which had Paul Zukofsky as its capable if occasionally submerged soloist, is a two-movement work that generates orchestral excitement, permits some highly complicated solo passages to be heard and some others to disappear in heavy instrumental texture, and in general happily stirs ear and pulse. Mr. Zukofsky, playing from the score, seemed to have a less sturdy tone than this work demands—in a large hall, at any rate—but since a recording is in prospect for these performers of both this and the Piston, live listeners' loss may be discophiles' gain. Mr. Schuman was the second composer to share bows and applause on Friday afternoon.

The two American pieces were bracketed by Bach's hearty Suite No. 4 in D, and Ravel's "La Valse," executed by Mr. Thomas and the orchestra as invitations to several kinds of dance, all smooth and rhythmic and swinging.

Symphony

Thomas Directs Piston, Schuman

By HARRY NEVILLE

Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in a program which included major works by two major American composers, Walter Piston and William Schuman.

By virtue of age and the esteem in which they are held, both men, and especially Piston, qualify for that dubious but well intended title "dean of American composers." Both composers were also overdue for some kind of substantial representation on BSO programs, and it was nice to have it in the form of such attractive works at Piston's Second Symphony and Schuman's Violin Concerto.

THE FORMER WORK, dating from 1943, is a tightly organized composition in three movements. The writing is characterized throughout by an easy, graceful flow of ideas and by absolutely impeccable craftsmanship.

The craftsmanship of the Schuman conerto, which was performed in its third (1959) version, is impressive too. With its complex rhythms and the dizzying angularity of much of the melodic writing, the concerto inhabits an altogether different world than Piston's symphony. And yet it exerts a similar appeal, one that is based on grace and good breeding, so to speak.

Thomas gave incisive, well balanced, propulsive readings of both works and proved himself a sensitive accompanist in the Schuman, which featured Paul Zukofsky as soloist. Zukofsky's stage manner is so detached and cool that it becomes almost engaging, and his aplomb makes his quite remarkable technique and musicianship seem ever more remarkable.

About the only thing one could wish for in his performance was a warmer, richer tone in the more lyrical passages. The same forces are recording both works, which is someting to look forward to.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 3 1970 N Eng

orchestration--but that was not objectionable Saturday night. Tempos were chosen so well that each dance movement had independent life, and that is no small accomplishment. The Ravel is a standard orchestral showpiece and a very savage piece of music as well. It only requires an instinct for timing that Tilson Thomas definitely has. Also, in the Ravel as in everything else on the program, new principal clarinetist Harold Wright showed that the BSO finally has a solo clarinet up to the standard of its other winds.

In less than a year Tilson Thomas has by accident and ability established a reputation in Boston. Saturday's concert was one more bit of evidence in his favor.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1970

At BSO Concert

Thomas Conducts, Zukofsky Solos

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The ninetieth season of the Boston Symphony continues its brilliant start. Michael Tilson Thomas proved again more than capable with a wide spread of repertoire. One no longer regards him an assistant-conductor but as a co-. The test is not a matter of age, credits or foreign fame, it is the way the orchestra sounds in its projection of musical ideas.

Suite No. 4 by J. B. Bach had the "strength and grace" rarely achieved in symphony performance—always rhythm, always verve—but no pushing of tempos. In fact, the only real allegros came in the fast middle of the Overture and the final Rejoicing. The Bourees had time to bounce, the Gavotte and Minuets time for a smiling dignity. Even the slow but sharply dotted rhythm of the beginning and end of the Overture had the lilt of dance—a royal progress. Rejoicing was a scherzo, before anybody invented the name.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 (of 1943) made a fine sequel to Bach. Both composers wrote on demand, had thorough command of contemporary language, carved their conceptions into definitive shape without losing impulsive inspiration, and both sound well. Bach's Baroque oppositions of strings and winds made blocks of contrasting color, and each idea, with all its variety of detail, is a single consistent experience. Piston, of course, offers a more evolutionary development and is a textbook of instrumental resource.

From the time Koussevitsky said "You write, I play", Piston practically grew up with the Symphony, learning from it while he wrote for it. This second symphony in revival surprizes some by its warm humanity as well as its excitement. But the composer says he wants both head and heart in anybody's music—and heart includes the subrational impulse that throws up the forms. In this instance, Piston justifies the three movement sequence of the eighteenth century, the third being an abandoned dash that relieves the lovely introspection of the Adagio and yet makes a resounding finale.

Forgive my challenging my able friend, Klaus Roy, who wrote the program notes (taken from his article in Stereo) the Second is not a simple piece,—it is full of surprising complexities, though deceivingly "natural" — like Mozart. There are among other felicities, many passages of vital counterpoint making inner weaving of stress and color. The fine clarinet in the Adagio, beautifully played, does not long sing without other voices. And the counterpoint throughout is rhythmical as well as melodic, making a texture that catches the listener into the process.

One other Roy correction: Piston's story about his care in putting down notes was not a conversation with a student but a bit of neighborly confrontation in Belmont. An eager mother, having heard that a composer lived nearby, stood on his doorstep and asked if her musical daughter could watch him compose. Mr. Piston, always gracious, said that it might be arranged, "—only you see, madame, some days I only write one note"—pause—"and the next day I erase it." Smile and bow.

Fortunately Mr. Piston could be at this performance and bow to the applause of a standing audience. He has never been a joiner of fashionable clubs and bows as an individual of genius. This fine performance of a fine work must have seemed a bonus too long withheld.

For twelve years William Schuman diddled with his violin concerto. The third form of it was played with Paul Zukofsky on the violin (first time in Boston). Zukofsky (27) and Thomas (26) saw eye to eye, and Schuman had managed the unequal forces of a single violin and full orchestra with discretion so that the solo was never engulfed. Zukofsky played this belated version of 19th century exhibitionism with superb and musical command, and Schuman threw into the open spaces his usual big orchestral effects. Qui bono? All plausible but superficial what-next. Schuman is a great success in musical politics, has some kind of intelligence for musical matters and compositional possibilities but composes beyond his imaginative grasp. Well, so do many. Hear Zukofsky, when you can, in substantial sonatas; he is very fine. It is a shame that sonata (or any chamber music) programs have not the public eclat of symphonic ones.

A perfect wind-up: Thomas leading Ravel's "La Valse." This homage to Johann Strauss, as of 1920, survived all the rejection for ballet by Diaghilev and the tortured interpretation's of war-gloomy commentators. Thomas played the score as an infectious fantasy—the swooning swing of old Vienna emerging from shadowy mist, and then rioting through an evolution of mood-change—color and counterpoint that never lost the old lilt and flung into a climax to asert nostalgic joy, no matter what lurked beyond the hall.

Next weekend, Steinberg with Reger and Bruckner.

4.

Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody brilliant, but not last night

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

There is occasionally on one or other of the shorter Boston Symphony subscription series a composition or a soloist not included in the main Friday-Saturday series; thus, for example, Tuesday evening's concert, which was conducted by William Steinberg, had Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist in the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff (so spelled always by himself, but Rachmaninov to the swinging transliterators in Symphony Hall).

The Rhapsody, written in 1934, is the astounding and brilliant exception to the feebleness of the music Rakhmaninoff (in case you like the Grove's Dictionary spelling) composed after the first world war.

It is as though the very boldness of once again confronting a theme so often varied by others — once, by Brahms, to make a real masterpiece — has stimulated and delighted him. Everything, from the stoke of wit that has him begin with a skeletal, precompositional variation which then turns out to be the path into the theme itself, everything in this taut, singularly unrhapsodic Rhapsody is fanciful, to the point, and worked out with imposing virtuosity and precision.

Even the excursion into the full-moon-and-empty-arms vein, which Rachmaninoff knew his audience expected, works because the tune itself is elegant as well as richly laden with sentiment, and because it proceeds organically from the assumptions of the piece rather than being a clot that impedes its discourse. More, I think than any other of Rachmaninoff's large works, the Rhapsody gives a sense of the sharpness and cultivation of one of the best musical minds of its period.

The Rhapsody is also a piece about the joy of brilliant performance, of giving such performances and of hearing them, Rachmaninoff's own bravura and uniquely dramatic incisiveness as a pianist, the disciplined splendor of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski, these are very much part of the music. It is in that area that Tuesday's performance fell down, and badly.

The intelligence, taste, and particularly the sense of formal coherence, in Lettvin's playing and Steinberg's conducting were estimable qualities and ones for which to be grateful. At the same time, though, intonation was bad, both within the orchestra and between orchestra and piano, attacks were too ragged too often, and there was the orchestra's inability or unwillingness to play pianissimo.

Lettvin is a really well-equipped pianist with respect both to musicianship and technique, but his playing Tuesday conveyed no sense of fun. It was all very sober, and the piece neither wants that nor really responds to it.

The remainder of the program consisted of music repeated from previous concerts, four of Holst's "Planets" and the Beethoven 7th Symphony.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 7 1970

NINETIETH SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 6 1970 at 7.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HOLST — Suite from 'The planets' op. 32
Mars, the bringer of war
Venus, the bringer of peace
Mercury, the winged messenger
Jupiter, the bringer of jollity

RACHMANINOV — Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43
THEODORE LETTVIN

intermission

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A op. 92*
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

THE SOLOIST

THEODORE LETTVIN, who appeared most recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1967 Berkshire Festival, is Professor of music at the New England Conservatory. Born in Chicago, he began musical studies as a small child, and at the age of twelve made his orchestral debut as soloist with the Chicago Symphony. He continued his education at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, studying there with Mieczylaw Horszowski and Rudolf Serkin. After service in the US Navy during world war two he resumed his career, winning important awards, and appearing with many of the major orchestras in the United States, among them the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, the Baltimore Symphony, the New Orleans Symphony, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Atlanta Symphony. He appeared as soloist at the inaugural New York Philharmonic Promenade concerts in 1964, and later played the American première of Bartók's Scherzo for piano and orchestra with the same orchestra, directed by William Steinberg. He has performed for television audiences on 'The voice of Firestone', 'The Chicago theatre of the air' and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has also made recital tours in all parts of the United States and Europe.

Earl J. Dias Review

Boston Symphony program well-balanced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series began last night, in Symphony Hall, and marked the welcome return to the podium of William Steinberg, who happily seems recovered from his illness of last season. For this nicely-balanced and, for the most part, well-played concert, Mr. Steinberg chose Gustav Holst's "The Planets," Rachmaninoff's "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," with Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist, and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A Major."

Astrological rather than astronomical in viewpoint, Holst's "The Planets" is a seven-movement suite, although last night the orchestra performed only four of the sections — those devoted, respectively, to Mars, Venus, Mercury, and Jupiter. What has always impressed me about the late British composer's music is its directness and economy of expression.

A highly competent craftsman, Holst knows what effects he wants and how to attain them. In "The Planets," his orchestration is expert and varied. "Mars" is appropriately martial and barbaric, "Venus" is serene and exquisite in effect, "Mercury" is as light-footed in rhythm and style as the swift god with whom it is concerned, and "Jupiter" is bright, jolly, and virile.

Paradoxically, although there is something peculiarly inaccessible and cold about this music, it is immediately enjoyable. Mr. Steinberg kept the mood and style of the work well in hand in a commendably integrated performance.

The Rachmaninoff "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," in which, incidentally, he utilizes the same theme as Brahms does in his "Variations, Opus 35," is, in many respects, the composer's best work for piano and orchestra.

Soloist Lettvin, a most rewarding keyboard performer, was in good form as were Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra. There was good balance between Lettvin's piano and the Boston ensemble, excellent playing both in the rapid variations and in the melodious ones, and, on the whole, some pleasurable music-making.

As for the Beethoven "Seventh," there is not much new to be said about it. Obviously, Mr. Steinberg knows and loves the work; his conducting is lucidly-phrased, clear-cut, beautifully shaded. Perhaps the most romantic of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Seventh" has the deathless charm of all motion that is spontaneous and perfectly released. In fact, an exuberant spirit pervades the music (only one or two brief sections are at all somber) so that it becomes one of the most complete expressions of whole-souled enjoyment of life to be found in the concert-hall repertoire. This exuberance, this contagious gaiety — with its occasional evoking, in brief contrast, of an elegiacal and mournful beauty — was well conveyed by Mr. Steinberg and his musicians.

The second concert of the series will be performed on Oct. 27, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
OCT 7 1970

Opposed composers

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

In weekend concerts before the orchestra's visits, beginning tomorrow, to New York's Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls, William Steinberg led the Boston Symphony in works by Max Reger and Anton Bruckner, the former now seldom performed, the latter undergoing an impressive renaissance. The fact that Bruckner in the 19th century, and Reger in the late 19th and early 20th, suffered militant opposition to their music, not only from critics but from musicians, seems curious today only because of the substitution of other names and other factions in the struggle to be heard. The interesting question, then as now, remains why?

Last played by the BSO in 1940, Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" takes a familiar Mozart theme, from the Piano Sonata in A (K. 331), and in eight well-ordered variations shows us what a sturdy craftsman he was, and considering the time in which he wrote, what an innovator. It was for this—the way that he did it, not what he did—that his contemporaries found him out of line; today's audiences are too hardened by much more radical flights of composition to be worried by the Reger method of hitching chords together, modulating "by a series of jerks."

What is missing, probably because of the formalized variations structure, is a clue in music to the composer's personality. A hint of pedantry, a small palette of odd colors, a very declarative method of exposition (aided by Mr. Steinberg on this occasion) don't, however, reveal a point of true contact today with a man who, program notes tell us, was "singularly blunt and outspoken" and "physically unprepossessing" (no longer minuses), but was a highly regarded teacher and conductor. Perhaps in his large and little-explored compositional output, there is a congenial clue still to be uncovered.

Overdue recognition

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E, his first milestone in overdue recognition (particularly in Vienna, city of his strongest rebuffs), coincidentally was championed by two former BSO musical directors—Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the premiere in 1884 at Leipzig, and Karl Muck, who led the first Austrian performance at Graz, before the Vienna Philharmonic introduced it in 1886. Since Vienna's resistance had been based primarily on the war between anti- and pro-Wagnerians (Bruckner belonged to the second category), his works never fell into a natural pattern of acceptance for export purposes. If we had all grown up with Bruckner's symphonies, would we now like them more or less? Would they seem to us to go to the depth of romantic verity, or arouse an emotion similar to encountering a piece of handsome if overstuffed Biedermeier? No thanks to partisanship in Vienna's 19th-century musical world, it will still take a while to find out.

Mr. Steinberg's loving care was expended on both works, and the orchestra seemed intent on giving him what he wanted. There was particular audience enthusiasm for the Bruckner and its interpreters at the end of Saturday's concert.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
OCT 13 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 9 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 10 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

REGER — Variations and fugue on a theme by Mozart op. 132

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 7 in E (1883)
Allegro moderato
Adagio: sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: sehr schnell – trio: etwas langsamer
Finale: bewegt, doch nicht schnell

Steinberg returns to Boston Symphony podium

William Steinberg, who seems in good form and no longer plagued by the illness which felled him early last season and kept him inactive, conducted the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series last week. The program was a beguiling one and included Gustav Holst's suite, "The Planets," Rachmaninoff's "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," with pianist Theodore Lettvin as soloist, and, in honor of the composer's 200th anniversary, Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A. Major."

Certainly, I have little to add to the millions of words that have been written about the Beethoven "Seventh," its spontaneity, its exuberance, its occasional passages of somber beauty, the remarkable inventiveness displayed by Beethoven in developing its themes. Both Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra were in fine fettle; the result was a clear-cut, carefully phrased, generally perceptive performance that afforded me much pleasure. As for the Rachmaninoff "Variations," about this work, too, I find myself with nothing novel to say. It has always impressed me as Rachmaninoff's best work for piano and orchestra, and nothing in the Boston performance — the first-rate work of Lettvin at the keyboard and the equally effective accompaniment by the orchestra — made me change my mind.

Particularly welcome was the opportunity to hear Holst's "The Planets," which I had not heard played for more than a decade. Holst, an Englishman who in his time (1874-1934) won much fame as teacher, conductor, and composer (his choral works are still immensely popular), is a well-grounded musician. In "The Planets" (The Boston concert offered only four of the original seven movements of the work), he displays the directness of expression that I have always admired in his music. Moreover, his orchestration is distinctive and highly serviceable; he knows precisely what he wants to accomplish — whether it is the martial and barbaric spirit of "Mars," the gentle and exquisite beauty of "Venus," the light-footed rhythms of "Mercury," or the virile jollity of "Jupiter" — and he succeeds with

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
OCT 11 1970 N Eng

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475
OCT 8 1970

TIMES
HOLBROOK, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
OCT 8 1970

ROCKLAND STANDARD
ROCKLAND, MASS.
WKLY. COMB. CIRC. 2,350
OCT 8 1970 New England

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,410
OCT 8 1970 New England Newsclip

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500
OCT 8 1970 New England Newsclip

FIRST TELECAST

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra telecast of the season will take place on Channels 2 and 44 tomorrow at 9 p.m. with pianist Theodore Lettvin as soloist.

THIRD PAIR

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the third pair of Friday/Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. The orchestra will play Reger's "Variations and fuge on a theme by Mozart" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody brilliant, but not last night

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

There is occasionally on one or other of the shorter Boston Symphony subscription series a composition or a soloist not included in the main Friday-Saturday series; thus, for example, Tuesday evening's concert, which was conducted by William Steinberg, had Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist in the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff (so spelled always by himself, but Rachmaninov to the swinging transliterators in Symphony Hall).

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 7 1970

The Rhapsody, written in 1934, is the astounding and brilliant exception to the feebleness of the music Rakhmaninoff (in case you like the Grove's Dictionary spelling) composed after the first world war.

It is as though the very boldness of once again confronting a theme so often varied by others — once, by Brahms, to make a real masterpiece — has stimulated and delighted him. Everything, from the stoke of wit that has him begin with a skeletal, precompositional variation which then turns out to be the path into the theme itself, everything in this taut, singularly unrhapsodic Rhapsody is fanciful, to the point, and worked out with imposing virtuosity and precision.

Even the excursion into the full-moon-and-empty-arms vein, which Rachmaninoff knew his audience expected, works because the tune itself is elegant as well as richly laden with sentiment, and because it proceeds organically from the assumptions of the piece rather than being a clot that impedes its discourse. More, I think than any other of Rachmaninoff's large works, the Rhapsody gives a sense of the sharpness and cultivation of one of the best musical minds of its period.

The Rhapsody is also a piece about the joy of brilliant performance, of giving such performances and of hearing them, Rachmaninoff's own bravura and uniquely dramatic incisiveness as a pianist, the disciplined splendor of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski, these are very much part of the music. It is in that area that Tuesday's performance fell down, and badly.

The intelligence, taste, and particularly the sense of formal coherence, in Lettvin's playing and Steinberg's conducting were estimable qualities and ones for which to be grateful. At the same time, though, intonation was bad, both within the orchestra and between orchestra and piano, attacks were too ragged too often, and there was the orchestra's inability or unwillingness to play pianissimo.

Lettvin is a really well-equipped pianist with respect both to musicianship and technique, but his playing Tuesday conveyed no sense of fun. It was all very sober, and the piece neither wants that nor really responds to it.

The remainder of the program consisted of music repeated from previous concerts, four of Holst's "Planets" and the Beethoven 7th Symphony.

NINETIETH SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 6 1970 at 7.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HOLST — Suite from 'The planets' op. 32
Mars, the bringer of war
Venus, the bringer of peace
Mercury, the winged messenger
Jupiter, the bringer of jollity

RACHMANINOV — Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43
THEODORE LETTVIN

intermission

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A op. 92*
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

THE SOLOIST

THEODORE LETTVIN, who appeared most recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1967 Berkshire Festival, is Professor of music at the New England Conservatory. Born in Chicago, he began musical studies as a small child, and at the age of twelve made his orchestral debut as soloist with the Chicago Symphony. He continued his education at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, studying there with Mieczylaw Horszowski and Rudolf Serkin. After service in the US Navy during world war two he resumed his career, winning important awards, and appearing with many of the major orchestras in the United States, among them the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, the Baltimore Symphony, the New Orleans Symphony, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Atlanta Symphony. He appeared as soloist at the inaugural New York Philharmonic Promenade concerts in 1964, and later played the American première of Bartók's Scherzo for piano and orchestra with the same orchestra, directed by William Steinberg. He has performed for television audiences on 'The voice of Firestone', 'The Chicago theatre of the air' and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has also made recital tours in all parts of the United States and Europe.

Earl J. Dias Review

Boston Symphony program well-balanced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series began last night, in Symphony Hall, and marked the welcome return to the podium of William Steinberg, who happily seems recovered from his illness of last season. For this nicely-balanced and, for the most part, well-played concert, Mr. Steinberg chose Gustav Holst's "The Planets,'' Rachmaninoff's "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," with Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist, and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A Major."

Astrological rather than astronomical in viewpoint, Holst's "The Planets" is a seven-movement suite, although last night the orchestra performed only four of the sections — those devoted, respectively, to Mars, Venus, Mercury, and Jupiter. What has always impressed me about the late British composer's music is its directness and economy of expression.

A highly competent craftsman, Holst knows what effects he wants and how to attain them. In "The Planets," his orchestration is expert and varied. "Mars" is appropriately martial and barbaric, "Venus" is serene and exquisite in effect, "Mercury" is as light-footed in rhythm and style as the swift god with whom it is concerned, and "Jupiter" is bright, jolly, and virile.

Paradoxically, although there is something peculiarly inaccessible and cold about this music, it is immediately enjoyable. Mr. Steinberg kept the mood and style of the work well in hand in a commendably integrated performance.

The Rachmaninoff "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," in which, incidentally, he utilizes the same theme as Brahms does in his "Variations, Opus 35," is, in many respects, the composer's best work for piano and orchestra.

Soloist Lettvin, a most rewarding keyboard performer, was in good form as were Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra. There was good balance between Lettvin's piano and the Boston ensemble, excellent playing both in the rapid variations and in the melodious ones, and, on the whole, some pleasurable music-making.

As for the Beethoven "Seventh," there is not much new to be said about it. Obviously, Mr. Steinberg knows and loves the work; his conducting is lucidly-phrased, clear-cut, beautifully shaded. Perhaps the most romantic of Beethoven's symphonies, the "Seventh" has the deathless charm of all motion that is spontaneous and perfectly released. In fact, an exuberant spirit pervades the music (only one or two brief sections are at all somber) so that it becomes one of the most complete expressions of whole-souled enjoyment of life to be found in the concert-hall repertoire. This exuberance, this contagious gaiety — with its occasional evoking, in brief contrast, of an elegiacal and mournful beauty — was well conveyed by Mr. Steinberg and his musicians.

The second concert of the series will be performed on Oct. 27, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 8,500
OCT 7 1970 En

Opposed composers

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

In weekend concerts before the orchestra's visits, beginning tomorrow, to New York's Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls, William Steinberg led the Boston Symphony in works by Max Reger and Anton Bruckner, the former now seldom performed, the latter undergoing an impressive renaissance. The fact that Bruckner in the 19th century, and Reger in the late 19th and early 20th, suffered militant opposition to their music, not only from critics but from musicians, seems curious today only because of the substitution of other names and other factions in the struggle to be heard. The interesting question, then as now, remains why?

Last played by the BSO in 1940, Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" takes a familiar Mozart theme, from the Piano Sonata in A (K. 331), and in eight well-ordered variations shows us what a sturdy craftsman he was, and considering the time in which he wrote, what an innovator. It was for this—the way that he did it, not what he did—that his contemporaries found him out of line; today's audiences are too hardened by much more radical flights of composition to be worried by the Reger method of hitching chords together, modulating "by a series of jerks."

What is missing, probably because of the formalized variations structure, is a clue in music to the composer's personality. A hint of pedantry, a small palette of odd colors, a very declarative method of exposition (aided by Mr. Steinberg on this occasion) don't, however, reveal a point of true contact today with a man who, program notes tell us, was "singularly blunt and outspoken" and "physically unprepossessing" (no longer minuses), but was a highly regarded teacher and conductor. Perhaps in his large and little-explored compositional output, there is a congenial clue still to be uncovered.

Overdue recognition

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E, his first milestone in overdue recognition (particularly in Vienna, city of his strongest rebuffs), coincidentally was championed by two former BSO musical directors—Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the premiere in 1884 at Leipzig, and Karl Muck, who led the first Austrian performance at Graz, before the Vienna Philharmonic introduced it in 1886. Since Vienna's resistance had been based primarily on the war between anti- and pro-Wagnerians (Bruckner belonged to the second category), his works never fell into a natural pattern of acceptance for export purposes. If we had all grown up with Bruckner's symphonies, would we now like them more or less? Would they seem to us to go to the depth of romantic verity, or arouse an emotion similar to encountering a piece of handsome if overstuffed Biedermeier? No thanks to partisanship in Vienna's 19th-century musical world, it will still take a while to find out.

Mr. Steinberg's loving care was expended on both works, and the orchestra seemed intent on giving him what he wanted. There was particular audience enthusiasm for the Bruckner and its interpreters at the end of Saturday's concert.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
OCT 13 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 9 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 10 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

REGER — Variations and fugue on a theme by Mozart op. 132

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 7 in E (1883)
Allegro moderato
Adagio: sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: sehr schnell – trio: etwas langsamer
Finale: bewegt, doch nicht schnell

Steinberg returns to Boston Symphony podium

William Steinberg, who seems in good form and no longer plagued by the illness which felled him early last season and kept him inactive, conducted the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series last week. The program was a beguiling one and included Gustav Holst's suite, "The Planets," Rachmaninoff's "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," with pianist Theodore Lettvin as soloist, and, in honor of the composer's 200th anniversary, Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A. Major."

Certainly, I have little to add to the millions of words that have been written about the Beethoven "Seventh," its spontaneity, its exuberance, its occasional passages of somber beauty, the remarkable inventiveness displayed by Beethoven in developing its themes. Both Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra were in fine fettle; the result was a clear-cut, carefully phrased, generally perceptive performance that afforded me much pleasure. As for the Rachmaninoff "Variations," about this work, too, I find myself with nothing novel to say. It has always impressed me as Rachmaninoff's best work for piano and orchestra, and nothing in the Boston performance — the first-rate work of Lettvin at the keyboard and the equally effective accompaniment by the orchestra — made me change my mind.

Particularly welcome was the opportunity to hear Holst's "The Planets," which I had not heard played for more than a decade. Holst, an Englishman who in his time (1874-1934) won much fame as teacher, conductor, and composer (his choral works are still immensely popular), is a well-grounded musician. In "The Planets" (The Boston concert offered only four of the original seven movements of the work), he displays the directness of expression that I have always admired in his music. Moreover, his orchestration is distinctive and highly serviceable; he knows precisely what he wants to accomplish — whether it is the martial and barbaric spirit of "Mars," the gentle and exquisite beauty of "Venus," the light-footed rhythms of "Mercury," or the virile jollity of "Jupiter" — and he succeeds with

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 8,500
OCT 11 1970 N Eng

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475
OCT 8 1970

TIMES
HOLYOKE, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
OCT 8 1970

ROCKLAND STANDARD
ROCKLAND, MASS.
WKLY (OCT) CIRC. 2,350
OCT 8 1970 New England Newspaper

HERALD
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY
OCT 8 1970 New England Newspaper

MESSENGER
AVON
WEEKLY
OCT 8 1970 New England Newspaper

FIRST TELECAST

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra telecast of the season will take place on Channels 2 and 44 tomorrow at 9 p.m. with pianist Theodore Lettvin as soloist.

THIRD PAIR

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the third pair of Friday/Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. The orchestra will play Reger's "Variations and fuge on a theme by Mozart" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

Boston Symphony performs Reger's Variations

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Both are music to which Steinberg brings uncommon convictions as well as authority; the concert, then, was interesting, and as the Bruckner Symphony slowly unfolded, exciting and moving.

Reger's reputation as the author of pieces both involved and enormous scares people, but his music, when it is played well, more often than not delights them. The Mozart variations (on the theme Mozart himself varied in his A Major piano sonata) date from 1914, and they are the last major work Reger wrote for orchestra before his death two years later at only 43.

He made eight variations, topped off by a comfortable and grand fugue whose tapeworm of a subject alone takes one-third of a minute to play. The surface of all that is complex, or at least very active and richly decorated, but the procedure at the core are really astoundingly simple. For one thing, the shapes of Mozart's tune are clearly heard in most of the variations—only a couple the fourth and fifth, are in the slightest degree difficult from that point of view — and in that respect Reger's variations are at once easier to follow than most of Beethoven's or Brahms' masterpieces in the genre.

Reger's harmony is highly colored but again mainly in the details, the basic layout being uncomplicated, with a slow removal from Mozart's A Major, but never very far, and a corresponding, almost symmetrical return to the original key.

There is elegant pathos and slow variation just before the fugue, but for the most part the piece is rather playful, and the play is that of the mind fertile in the invention of detail, and one inclined by temperament toward heavily emphatic habits of speech, Reger's idea of extreme delicacy being to have at least half-a-dozen strands of activity going full tilt, though in pianissimo.

Part of the playfulness and the delight resides in Reger's orchestral virtuosity. The colors are so varied and the sonorities generated at climaxes so enormous that it is astonishing to find it all done with the most modest resources (three flutes, four horns, two trumpets, no trombones, one harp, kettle drums, and strings — except for the harp, less than a Brahms orchestra, and nowhere near Strauss's).

The performance was careful, even down to an almost exaggerated deference to Reger's eccentric notion about the phrasing of Mozart's theme; it was persuasively paced and shaped; it was lively. There was, however, the usual problem about the absence of pianissimo in the orchestra's playing for Steinberg: something is really wrong when, for example, the mezzoforte of the first note of the fugue subject, the piano in ther emainder of that measure, and the triple piano in bar five all come out more or less the same.

Of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Steinberg produced a beautiful performance, direct, clarifying, and compelling.

A postscript: The breaking up of the Reger variations with bell ringing and the grand entrance of latecomers was wrong. Some years ago, when Herbert von Karajan was here with the Berlin Philharmonic, he let it be known that there would be no seating of latecomers even between movements of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, when it would have been quite reasonably possible, and with the result that people were there at 8:30 and ready. The Boston Symphony management owes more to the composers whose music the orchestra plays, to the conductor, and to the audience in the hall, than to those persons who cannot organize themselves well enough to get to concerts on time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 12 1970 New Engl

At BSO

Steinberg Conducts Reger, Bruckner

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Romantic Revival picked up a pace with William Steinberg's masterly presentation of two latter day 19th century composers who radicalized their tradition even while they celebrated it. Both were cursed out by their own conservative Germanic critics, accepted by a few responsive conductors, and pretty much lost the stage to R. Strauss with his beguiling programs and to the French and Russian tone poets.

Chamber musicians have kept Reger in the libraries but played him mostly for fun—such fervor and swooning with ritards!—a heady trip. The Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart was composed in 1914 (the 19th century cast a long shadow) and played by the Boston Symphony in 1940. For many people it was still then modern music and now might stand as a viable follow-up for Brahm's Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Like Brahms, he takes a simply harmonized tune (from Sonata in A, K. 331) and rethinks it into such variation of melody, rhythm and inner voices that the original experience is totally changed, and only a vestige of form links the active differences. Unlike Brahms, who kept a single consistency in each variation, Reger makes each a development, even to scoring the original theme with such a play of orchestration that it is already variation (there are colorful transitions from strings to woodwinds or surprising combinations allowing for tonal counterpoint.

Steinberg kept the priorities so clear and the momentary changes of tempo so in balance that the handling of transitions never swooned away from momentum, even in cadences of dissolving harmony. However, and this must have been clearly intended, the concluding double-fugue develops its primary tune from a light dance figure to an amazing chromatic complex, shining within but no fog. And the insistent rhythm keeps absolute tempo, — mesmerizing — until the climax calls for a gradual allargando — a spread of accumulated power. (I am describing Steinberg's realization of the score, allowing Reger his musical relationship with composers from Bach on down, and it is a silly criticism that dubs such a creative consciousness eclectic if one does not also throw it at Bach or Mozart).

Now the slumbering giant, Bruckner. His Symphony No. 7 (1883) was conceived when one of his masters was still alive—The Adagio was widely accepted as a fitting funeral celebration for Wagner's death—but Beethoven could be equally credited. It was the madman of Vienna who constrained the development idea of sonata-form to express shocking evolutions of being on all levels of consciousness without losing the core idea. You can skip all 19th century symphonists to find another equal—until Bruckner. (Equal? Say, in the same league).

The shivers in the violins that underlay the uprising bold thrust of the 'cello's that initiate the Allegro theme may have been caught from Wagnerian techniques of tension but are, as so often with classic composers, an introduction to the whole state that develops.

(It always amazes me that conservative critics—Dr. Hanslick, the Brahmisian, who diminished Brahms to hurt Wagner and Bruckner, Agnew who diminishes any honest Republican to shoot down dissent to the monetary status quo, that such public mouths try to conserve only their limited parochial values, privileges and personal importance, with no imagine or care for the classic pluralities of human justice. They are ignorant men with time-serving skill for debate—and ego for a heart).

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 15 1970

You might say that Bruckner was—and still in inordinate—like Beethoven, but not with the sly sophistication of Strauss. But, also like Beethoven, his profound religious root, beyond credo, informs his dramatic statement. The Adagio is a tremendous extension of a chorale, not lessened by the expansive glow of the brass choir (so inspiring to Hindemith)—as if a distillation of Wagner's command of immediate experience so that now is also a moment of eternity. The Scherzo is joy, not merely joke, and the Finale becomes a great gathering of assertions that needs the blatant climax of chords on a single triad. How else to stop the rich contrapuntal life expanded?

Again I describe a performance that kept inordinate sound and experience in order, so that a moment of significence graced our so-mortal lives.

Steinberg was again comfor
Bruckner was piling cliche seemed to have a purpose.
imposing, and never, despi was it anything less. The had some trouble with into notes. In this sort of re that were washed over.

A year of Reger-Bruck
the BSO. For an occasiona new world.

For WHRB this is Jerr

WHRB review 10/13

On Saturday night William Steinberg brought back the nineteenth century. His program was made up of two works: Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Mozart Theme and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. The Bruckner alone is nothing unusual; the Reger, however, is not so popular as it used to be, and the two together make up a concentrated dose of heavy, turn-of-the-century German romanticism.

The nineteenth century saw Mozart as a composer whose music was too facile to have much depth. Bach was serious enough, but his counterpoint needed to be liberated by transcription. Neither opinion is prevalent today, but Reger's Mozart Variations are addressed to an audience that holds both. The piece is fascinating to hear, but very hard to get into. Mozart's theme, taken from the famous A major piano sonata, evokes a definite set of feelings because these days we have definite ideas about what Mozart was trying to do. That Reger scores the theme for solo English horn, and that subsequent variations throw the whole thing on a Wagnerian scale consequently seem grotesque. Furthermore the final fugue begins with a dry, academic theme, but ends with a lot of brass and not much counterpoint. The piece just doesn't fit with current standards of taste; and music so out of fashion, whatever its value, is hard to appreciate. Nonetheless, Steinberg did have an affinity for it, so that the performance became interesting as a picture of Reger's aesthetic.

Bruckner's Seventh is one of the more popular of the Bruckner symphonies. It does have structural problems, but, particularly in the middle movements, it is also inspired music.

tion the especially fine contribution of the new clarinetist, Harold Wright.

Music: Symphony Performs Max

By HARRY NEVILLE

For those who are unfamiliar with the music of Max Reger there is no better introduction to his work than the "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart," which formed the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

The work is a product of the composer's last years, which doesn't mean his maturity since Reger died at the relatively early age of 43. It does mean, however, that by that time Reger had had considerable conducting experience with a good orchestra — experience which he put to good use in scoring the "Variations."

REGER HAD an absolute passion for contrapuntal density, and his obsession is often apparent in this work. His scoring, however, makes the density somewhat less of a problem than in much of his earlier music. But only somewhat less.

The "Variations" still present mind-boggling problems of balance and coordination, especially when Reger sets nearly every instrument going with different countermelodies and divides the strings so as to add even more lines.

STEINBERG and the BSO ceeding section. As a the music breathed nat and one could savor f the geniality of this quite charming score.

In the matter of Steinberg again scored with Bruckner's 8 Symphony. Tempos fo symphony t ensely amon luctors, and composers easily and y too slow s, or by rds which h f the music thing sound abored.

RG'S ACC

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 10 1970 N Eng

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 8 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

18 1970

At the BSO

I attended the Boston Symphony concert Saturday night, Oct. 10, which your reviewer, Michael Steinberg, reviewed. I must say that I was astonished to read Steinberg's review. In Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, which was the major work offered, the orchestra played as the great orchestra they used to be. They have not sounded so well since last year when Guilini worked with them.

The Seventh Symphony is a major piece, it was played well, and yet Steinberg would have us think that the Reger was the major offering of the evening. If he does not like Bruckner he should say so, but give a review which tells the readers of your paper all the happenings in proper perspective.

I have found fault with this reviewer in the past, but to almost ignore William Steinberg's magnificent reading of this beautiful piece, and the orchestra's playing at a concert which received a standing ovation, from a well-informed audience was too much for me to be silent about.

LESLIE A. MILLER
Cambridge

Boston Symphony performs Reger's Variations

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Both are music to which Steinberg brings uncommon convictions as well as authority; the concert, then, was interesting, and as the Bruckner Symphony slowly unfolded, exciting and moving.

Reger's reputation as the author of pieces both involved and enormous scares people, but his music, when it is played well, more often than not, delights them. The Mozart variations (on the theme Mozart himself varied in his A Major piano sonata) date from 1914, and they are the last major work Reger wrote for orchestra before his death two years later at only 43.

He made eight variations, topped off by a comfortable and grand fugue whose tapeworm of a subject alone takes one-third of a minute to play. The surface of all that is complex, or at least very active and richly decorated, but the procedure at the core are really astoundingly simple. For one thing, the shapes of Mozart's tune are clearly heard in most of the variations—only a couple the fourth and fifth, are in the slightest degree difficult from that point of view — and in that respect Reger's variations are at once easier to follow than most of Beethoven's or Brahms' masterpieces in the genre.

Reger's harmony is highly colored but again mainly in the details, the basic layout being uncomplicated, with a slow removal from Mozart's A Major, but never very far, and a corresponding, almost symmetrical return to the original key.

There is elegant pathos and slow variation just before the fugue, but for the most part the piece is rather playful, and the play is that of the mind fertile in the invention of detail, and one inclined by temperament toward heavily emphatic habits of speech, Reger's idea of extreme delicacy being to have at least half-a-dozen strands of activity going full tilt, though in pianissimo.

Part of the playfulness and the delight resides in Reger's orchestral virtuosity. The colors are so varied and the sonorities generated at climaxes so enormous that it is astonishing to find it all done with the most modest resources (three flutes, four horns, two trumpets, no trombones, one harp, kettle drums, and strings — except for the harp, less than a Brahms orchestra, and nowhere near Strauss's).

The performance was careful, even down to an almost exaggerated deference to Reger's eccentric notion about the phrasing of Mozart's theme; it was persuasively paced and shaped; it was lively. There was, however, the usual problem about the absence of pianissimo in the orchestra's playing for Steinberg: something is really wrong when, for example, the mezzoforte of the first note of the fugue subject, the piano in ther emainder of that measure, and the triple piano in bar five all come out more or less the same.

Of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Steinberg produced a beautiful performance, direct, clarifying, and compelling.

A postscript: The breaking up of the Reger variations with bell ringing and the grand entrance of latecomers was wrong. Some years ago, when Herbert von Karajan was here with the Berlin Philharmonic, he let it be known that there would be no seating of latecomers even between movements of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, when it would have been quite reasonably possible, and with the result that people were there at 8:30 and ready. The Boston Symphony management owes more to the composers whose music the orchestra plays, to the conductor, and to the audience in the hall, than to those persons who cannot organize themselves well enough to get to concerts on time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 12 1970 New England

At BSO

Steinberg Conducts Reger, Bruckner

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Romantic Revival picked up a pace with William Steinberg's masterly presentation of two latter day 19th century composers who radicalized their tradition even while they celebrated it. Both were cursed out by their own conservative Germanic critics, accepted by a few responsive conductors, and pretty much lost the stage to R. Strauss with his beguiling programs and to the French and Russian tone poets.

Chamber musicians have kept Reger in the libraries but played him mostly for fun—such fervor and swooning with ritards!—a heady trip. The Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart was composed in 1914 (the 19th century cast a long shadow) and played by the Boston Symphony in 1940. For many people it was still then modern music and now might stand as a viable follow-up for Brahm's Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Like Brahms, he takes a simply harmonized tune (from Sonata in A, K. 331) and rethinks it into such variation of melody, rhythm and inner voices that the original experience is totally changed, and only a vestige of form links the active differences. Unlike Brahms, who kept a single consistency in each variation, Reger makes each a development, even to scoring the original theme with such a play of orchestration that it is already variation (there are colorful transitions from strings to woodwinds or surprising combinations allowing for tonal counterpoint.

Steinberg kept the priorities so clear and the momentary changes of tempo so in balance that the handling of transitions never swooned away from momentum, even in cadences of dissolving harmony. However, and this must have been clearly intended, the concluding double-fugue develops its primary tune from a light dance figure to an amazing chromatic complex, shining within but no fog. And the insistent rhythm keeps absolute tempo, — mesmerizing — until the climax calls for a gradual allargando — a spread of accumulated power. (I am describing Steinberg's realization of the score, allowing Reger his musical relationship with composers from Bach on down, and it is a silly criticism that dubs such a creative consciousness eclectic if one does not also throw it at Bach or Mozart).

Now the slumbering giant, Bruckner. His Symphony No. 7 (1883) was conceived when one of his masters was still alive—The Adagio was widely accepted as a fitting funeral celebration for Wagner's death—but Beethoven could be equally credited. It was the madman of Vienna who constrained the development idea of sonata-form to express shocking evolutions of being on all levels of consciousness without losing the core idea. You can skip all 19th century symphonists to find another equal—until Bruckner. (Equal? Say, in the same league).

The shivers in the violins that underlay the uprising bold thrust of the 'cello's that initiate the Allegro theme may have been caught from Wagnerian techniques of tension but are, as so often with classic composers, an introduction to the whole state that develops.

(It always amazes me that conservative critics—Dr. Hanslick, the Brahmisian, who diminished Brahms to hurt Wagner and Bruckner, Agnew who diminishes any honest Republican to shoot down dissent to the monetary status quo, that such public mouths try to conserve only their limited parochial values, privileges and personal importance, with no imagine or care for the classic pluralities of human justice. They are ignorant men with time-serving skill for debate—and ego for a heart).

You might say that Bruckner was—and still in inordinate—like Beethoven, but not with the sly sophistication of Strauss. But, also like Beethoven, his profound religious root, beyond credo, informs his dramatic statement. The Adagio is a tremendous extension of a chorale, not lessened by the expansive glow of the brass choir (so inspiring to Hindemith)—as if a distillation of Wagner's command of immediate experience so that now is also a moment of eternity. The Scherzo is joy, not merely joke, and the Finale becomes a great gathering of assertions that needs the blatant climax of chords on a single triad. How else to stop the rich contrapuntal life expanded?

Again I describe a performance that kept inordinate sound and experience in order, so that a moment of significence graced our so-mortal lives.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 15 1970

Steinberg was again comfortable with the piece. Even where Bruckner was piling cliches on top of one another, the result seemed to have a purpose. Steinberg set out to make the symphony imposing, and never, despite Bruckner's lyricism and slow tempi, was it anything less. The orchestra had a few problems: strings had some trouble with intonation, and the brass played a few wrong notes. In this sort of repertory, however, little things like that were washed over.

A year of Reger-Bruckner programs would probably bankrupt the BSO. For an occasional concert, however, it is a whole new world.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

Music: Symphony Performs Max Reger

By HARRY NEVILLE

For those who are unfamiliar with the music of Max Reger there is no better introduction to his work than the "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart," which formed the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

The work is a product of the composer's last years, which doesn't mean his maturity since Reger died at the relatively early age of 43. It does mean, however, that by that time Reger had had considerable conducting experience with a good orchestra — experience which he put to good use in scoring the "Variations."

REGER HAD an absolute passion for contrapuntal density, and his obsession is often apparent in this work. His scoring, however, makes the density somewhat less of a problem than in much of his earlier music. But only somewhat less.

The "Variations" still present mind-boggling problems of balance and coordination, especially when Reger sets nearly every instrument going with different countermelodies and divides the strings so as to add even more lines.

STEINBERG and the BSO [illegible] ceeding section. As a result the music breathed naturally, and one could savor fully all the geniality of this really quite charming score.

In the matter of tempos Steinberg again scored points with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Tempos for any symphony tend to [illegible]ensely among diffuctors, and there [illegible] composers whose [illegible] easily and often [illegible]y too slow or too [illegible]s, or by exag[illegible]rds which hold up [illegible]f the music and [illegible]thing sound awk[illegible]abored.

[illegible]RG'S ACCOUNT of the opening movement had great breadth of span despite a speed that was perhaps a trifle faster than what we usually get. Much of the movement was kept within a single tempo and the fluctuations that did take place were quite convincing because of the expressive intensity of the playing.

The Adagio came across with great splendor, and this listener's only reservation was to wish for a slightly faster speed with the entry of the contrasting theme. For those who are interested in the recondite matters that afford Brucknerites so much pleasure, Steinberg did use the debatable cymbals and triangle at the slow movement's climax.

THE DELICATE handling of the trio was an especial pleasure of the third movement, and the finale was beautifully integrated, without the persistent drawing-out of the main theme's cadence which flaws so many performances. The playing of the BSO was the most polished this writer has heard so far this year, and although there was much fine individual work from many quarters, the beginning of the season seems an appropriate time to mention the especially fine contribution of the new clarinetist, Harold Wright.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 10 1970 New Eng

At the BSO

I attended the Boston Symphony concert Saturday night, Oct. 10, which your reviewer, Michael Steinberg, reviewed. I must say that I was astonished to read Steinberg's review. In Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, which was the major work offered, the orchestra played as the great orchestra they used to be. They have not sounded so well since last year when Guilini worked with them.

The Seventh Symphony is a major piece, it was played well, and yet Steinberg would have us think that the Reger was the major offering of the evening. If he does not like Bruckner he should say so, but give a review which tells the readers of your paper all the happenings in proper perspective.

I have found fault with this reviewer in the past, but to almost ignore William Steinberg's magnificent reading of this beautiful piece, and the orchestra's playing at a concert which received a standing ovation, from a well-informed audience was too much for me to be silent about.

LESLIE A. MILLER
Cambridge

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 8 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

18 1970

Boston Symphony performs Reger's Variations

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Both are music to which Steinberg brings uncommon convictions as well as authority; the concert, then, was interesting, and as the Bruckner Symphony slowly unfolded, exciting and moving.

Reger's reputation as the author of pieces both involved and enormous scares people, but his music, when it is played well, more often than not delights them. The Mozart variations (on the theme Mozart himself varied in his A Major piano sonata) date from 1914, and they are the last major work Reger wrote for orchestra before his death two years later at only 43.

He made eight variations, topped off by a comfortable and grand fugue whose tapeworm of a subject alone takes one-third of a minute to play. The surface of all that is complex, or at least very active and richly decorated, but the procedure at the core are really astoundingly simple. For one thing, the shapes of Mozart's tune are clearly heard in most of the variations—only a couple the fourth and fifth, are in the slightest degree difficult from that point of view — and in that respect Reger's variations are at once easier to follow than most of Beethoven's or Brahms' masterpieces in the genre.

Reger's harmony is highly colored but again mainly in the details, the basic layout being uncomplicated, with a slow removal from Mozart's A Major, but never very far, and a corresponding, almost symmetrical return to the original key.

There is elegant pathos and slow variation just before the fugue, but for the most part the piece is rather playful, and the play is that of the mind fertile in the invention of detail, and one inclined by temperament toward heavily emphatic habits of speech, Reger's idea of extreme delicacy being to have at least half-a-dozen strands of activity going full tilt, though in pianissimo.

Part of the playfulness and the delight resides in Reger's orchestral virtuosity. The colors are so varied and the sonorities generated at climaxes so enormous that it is astonishing to find it all done with the most modest resources (three flutes, four horns, two trumpets, no trombones, one harp, kettle drums, and strings — except for the harp, less than a Brahms orchestra, and nowhere near Strauss's).

The performance was careful, even down to an almost exaggerated deference to Reger's eccentric notion about the phrasing of Mozart's theme; it was persuasively paced and shaped; it was lively. There was, however, the usual problem about the absence of pianissimo in the orchestra's playing for Steinberg: something is really wrong when, for example, the mezzoforte of the first note of the fugue subject, the piano in ther emainder of that measure, and the triple piano in bar five all come out more or less the same.

Of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Steinberg produced a beautiful performance, direct, clarifying, and compelling.

A postscript: The breaking up of the Reger variations with bell ringing and the grand entrance of latecomers was wrong. Some years ago, when Herbert von Karajan was here with the Berlin Philharmonic, he let it be known that there would be no seating of latecomers even between movements of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, when it would have been quite reasonably possible, and with the result that people were there at 8:30 and ready. The Boston Symphony management owes more to the composers whose music the orchestra plays, to the conductor, and to the audience in the hall, than to those persons who cannot organize themselves well enough to get to concerts on time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 12 1970 New Engl

At BSO

Steinberg Conducts Reger, Bruckner

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Romantic Revival picked up a pace with William Steinberg's masterly presentation of two latter day 19th century composers who radicalized their tradition even while they celebrated it. Both were cursed out by their own conservative Germanic critics, accepted by a few responsive conductors, and pretty much lost the stage to R. Strauss with his beguiling programs and to the French and Russian tone poets.

Chamber musicians have kept Reger in the libraries but played him mostly for fun—such fervor and swooning with ritards!—a heady trip. The Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart was composed in 1914 (the 19th century cast a long shadow) and played by the Boston Symphony in 1940. For many people it was still then modern music and now might stand as a viable follow-up for Brahm's Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Like Brahms, he takes a simply harmonized tune (from Sonata in A, K. 331) and rethinks it into such variation of melody, rhythm and inner voices that the original experience is totally changed, and only a vestige of form links the active differences. Unlike Brahms, who kept a single consistency in each variation, Reger makes each a development, even to scoring the original theme with such a play of orchestration that it is already variation (there are colorful transitions from strings to woodwinds or surprising combinations allowing for tonal counterpoint.

Steinberg kept the priorities so clear and the momentary changes of tempo so in balance that the handling of transitions never swooned away from momentum, even in cadences of dissolving harmony. However, and this must have been clearly intended, the concluding double-fugue develops its primary tune from a light dance figure to an amazing chromatic complex, shining within but no fog. And the insistent rhythm keeps absolute tempo, — mesmerizing — until the climax calls for a gradual allargando — a spread of accumulated power. (I am describing Steinberg's realization of the score, allowing Reger his musical relationship with composers from Bach on down, and it is a silly criticism that dubs such a creative consciousness eclectic if one does not also throw it at Bach or Mozart).

Now the slumbering giant, Bruckner. His Symphony No. 7 (1883) was conceived when one of his masters was still alive—The Adagio was widely accepted as a fitting funeral celebration for Wagner's death—but Beethoven could be equally credited. It was the madman of Vienna who constrained the development idea of sonata-form to express shocking evolutions of being on all levels of consciousness without losing the core idea. You can skip all 19th century symphonists to find another equal—until Bruckner. (Equal? Say, in the same league).

The shivers in the violins that underlay the uprising bold thrust of the 'cello's that initiate the Allegro theme may have been caught from Wagnerian techniques of tension but are, as so often with classic composers, an introduction to the whole state that develops.

(It always amazes me that conservative critics—Dr. Hanslick, the Brahmisian, who diminished Brahms to hurt Wagner and Bruckner, Agnew who diminishes any honest Republican to shoot down dissent to the monetary status quo, that such public mouths try to conserve only their limited parochial values, privileges and personal importance, with no imagine or care for the classic pluralities of human justice. They are ignorant men with time-serving skill for debate—and ego for a heart).

You might say that Bruckner was—and still in inordinate—like Beethoven, but not with the sly sophistication of Strauss. But, also like Beethoven, his profound religious root, beyond credo, informs his dramatic statement. The Adagio is a tremendous extension of a chorale, not lessened by the expansive glow of the brass choir (so inspiring to Hindemith)—as if a distillation of Wagner's command of immediate experience so that now is also a moment of eternity. The Scherzo is joy, not merely joke, and the Finale becomes a great gathering of assertions that needs the blatant climax of chords on a single triad. How else to stop the rich contrapuntal life expanded?

Again I describe a performance that kept inordinate sound and experience in order, so that a moment of significence graced our so-mortal lives.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 15 1970

Steinberg was again comfortable with the piece. Even where Bruckner was piling cliches on top of one another, the result seemed to have a purpose. Steinberg set out to make the symphony imposing, and never, despite Bruckner's lyricism and slow tempi, was it anything less. The orchestra had a few problems: strings had some trouble with intonation, and the brass played a few wrong notes. In this sort of repertory, however, little things like that were washed over.

A year of Reger-Bruckner programs would probably bankrupt the BSO. For an occasional concert, however, it is a whole new world.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

Music: Symphony Performs Max Reger

By HARRY NEVILLE

For those who are unfamiliar with the music of Max Reger there is no better introduction to his work than the "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart," which formed the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

The work is a product of the composer's last years, which doesn't mean his maturity since Reger died at the relatively early age of 43. It does mean, however, that by that time Reger had had considerable conducting experience with a good orchestra — experience which he put to good use in scoring the "Variations."

REGER HAD an absolute passion for contrapuntal density, and his obsession is often apparent in this work. His scoring, however, makes the density somewhat less of a problem than in much of his earlier music. But only somewhat less.

The "Variations" still present mind-boggling problems of balance and coordination, especially when Reger sets nearly every instrument going with different countermelodies and divides the strings so as to add even more lines.

STEINBERG and the BSO [illegible] ceeding section. As a result the music breathed naturally, and one could savor fully all the geniality of this really quite charming score.

In the matter of tempos Steinberg again scored points with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Tempos for any symphony tend to [illegible]ensely among ductors, and there composers whose easily and often [illegible]y too slow or too [illegible]s, or by exag[illegible]rds which hold up [illegible]f the music and [illegible]thing sound awk[illegible]abored.

[illegible]RG'S ACCOUNT of the opening movement had great breadth of span despite a speed that was perhaps a trifle faster than what we usually get. Much of the movement was kept within a single tempo and the fluctuations that did take place were quite convincing because of the expressive intensity of the playing.

The Adagio came across with great splendor, and this listener's only reservation was to wish for a slightly faster speed with the entry of the contrasting theme. For those who are interested in the recondite matters that afford Brucknerites so much pleasure, Steinberg did use the debatable cymbals and triangle at the slow movement's climax.

THE DELICATE handling of the trio was an especial pleasure of the third movement, and the finale was beautifully integrated, without the persistent drawing-out of the main theme's cadence which flaws so many performances. The playing of the BSO was the most polished this writer has heard so far this year, and although there was much fine individual work from many quarters, the beginning of the season seems an appropriate time to mention the especially fine contribution of the new clarinetist, Harold Wright.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 10 1970 N Eng.

At the BSO

I attended the Boston Symphony concert Saturday night, Oct. 10, which your reviewer, Michael Steinberg, reviewed. I must say that I was astonished to read Steinberg's review. In Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, which was the major work offered, the orchestra played as the great orchestra they used to be. They have not sounded so well since last year when Guilini worked with them.

The Seventh Symphony is a major piece, it was played well, and yet Steinberg would have us think that the Reger was the major offering of the evening. If he does not like Bruckner he should say so, but give a review which tells the readers of your paper all the happenings in proper perspective.

I have found fault with this reviewer in the past, but to almost ignore William Steinberg's magnificent reading of this beautiful piece, and the orchestra's playing at a concert which received a standing ovation, from a well-informed audience was too much for me to be silent about.

LESLIE A. MILLER
Cambridge

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 8 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

18 1970

Boston Symphony performs Reger's Variations

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony. Both are music to which Steinberg brings uncommon convictions as well as authority; the concert, then, was interesting, and as the Bruckner Symphony slowly unfolded, exciting and moving.

Reger's reputation as the author of pieces both involved and enormous scares people, but his music, when it is played well, more often than not delights them. The Mozart variations (on the theme Mozart himself varied in his A Major piano sonata) date from 1914, and they are the last major work Reger wrote for orchestra before his death two years later at only 43.

He made eight variations, topped off by a comfortable and grand fugue whose tapeworm of a subject alone takes one-third of a minute to play. The surface of all that is complex, or at least very active and richly decorated, but the procedure at the core are really astoundingly simple. For one thing, the shapes of Mozart's tune are clearly heard in most of the variations—only a couple the fourth and fifth, are in the slightest degree difficult from that point of view — and in that respect Reger's variations are at once easier to follow than most of Beethoven's or Brahms' masterpieces in the genre.

Reger's harmony is highly colored but again mainly in the details, the basic layout being uncomplicated, with a slow removal from Mozart's A Major, but never very far, and a corresponding, almost symmetrical return to the original key.

There is elegant pathos and slow variation just before the fugue, but for the most part the piece is rather playful, and the play is that of the mind fertile in the invention of detail, and one inclined by temperament toward heavily emphatic habits of speech, Reger's idea of extreme delicacy being to have at least half-a-dozen strands of activity going full tilt, though in pianissimo.

Part of the playfulness and the delight resides in Reger's orchestral virtuosity. The colors are so varied and the sonorities generated at climaxes so enormous that it is astonishing to find it all done with the most modest resources (three flutes, four horns, two trumpets, no trombones, one harp, kettle drums, and strings — except for the harp, less than a Brahms orchestra, and nowhere near Strauss's).

The performance was careful, even down to an almost exaggerated deference to Reger's eccentric notion about the phrasing of Mozart's theme; it was persuasively paced and shaped; it was lively. There was, however, the usual problem about the absence of pianissimo in the orchestra's playing for Steinberg: something is really wrong when, for example, the mezzoforte of the first note of the fugue subject, the piano in ther emainder of that measure, and the triple piano in bar five all come out more or less the same.

Of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Steinberg produced a beautiful performance, direct, clarifying, and compelling.

A postscript: The breaking up of the Reger variations with bell ringing and the grand entrance of latecomers was wrong. Some years ago, when Herbert von Karajan was here with the Berlin Philharmonic, he let it be known that there would be no seating of latecomers even between movements of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, when it would have been quite reasonably possible, and with the result that people were there at 8:30 and ready. The Boston Symphony management owes more to the composers whose music the orchestra plays, to the conductor, and to the audience in the hall, than to those persons who cannot organize themselves well enough to get to concerts on time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 12 1970 New England

Steinberg was again comfortable with the piece. Even where Bruckner was piling cliches on top of one another, the result seemed to have a purpose. Steinberg set out to make the symphony imposing, and never, despite Bruckner's lyricism and slow tempi, was it anything less. The orchestra had a few problems: strings had some trouble with intonation, and the brass played a few wrong notes. In this sort of repertory, however, little things like that were washed over.

A year of Reger-Bruckner programs would probably bankrupt the BSO. For an occasional concert, however, it is a whole new world.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

At BSO

Steinberg Conducts Reger, Bruckner

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Romantic Revival picked up a pace with William Steinberg's masterly presentation of two latter day 19th century composers who radicalized their tradition even while they celebrated it. Both were cursed out by their own conservative Germanic critics, accepted by a few responsive conductors, and pretty much lost the stage to R. Strauss with his beguiling programs and to the French and Russian tone poets.

Chamber musicians have kept Reger in the libraries but played him mostly for fun—such fervor and swooning with ritards!—a heady trip. The Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart was composed in 1914 (the 19th century cast a long shadow) and played by the Boston Symphony in 1940. For many people it was still then modern music and now might stand as a viable follow-up for Brahm's Variation on a Theme by Haydn. Like Brahms, he takes a simply harmonized tune (from Sonata in A, K. 331) and rethinks it into such variation of melody, rhythm and inner voices that the original experience is totally changed, and only a vestige of form links the active differences. Unlike Brahms, who kept a single consistency in each variation, Reger makes each a development, even to scoring the original theme with such a play of orchestration that it is already variation (there are colorful transitions from strings to woodwinds or surprising combinations allowing for tonal counterpoint.

Steinberg kept the priorities so clear and the momentary changes of tempo so in balance that the handling of transitions never swooned away from momentum, even in cadences of dissolving harmony. However, and this must have been clearly intended, the concluding double-fugue develops its primary tune from a light dance figure to an amazing chromatic complex, shining within but no fog. And the insistent rhythm keeps absolute tempo, — mesmerizing — until the climax calls for a gradual allargando — a spread of accumulated power. (I am describing Steinberg's realization of the score, allowing Reger his musical relationship with composers from Bach on down, and it is a silly criticism that dubs such a creative consciousness eclectic if one does not also throw it at Bach or Mozart).

Now the slumbering giant, Bruckner. His Symphony No. 7 (1883) was conceived when one of his masters was still alive—The Adagio was widely accepted as a fitting funeral celebration for Wagner's death—but Beethoven could be equally credited. It was the madman of Vienna who constrained the development idea of sonata-form to express shocking evolutions of being on all levels of consciousness without losing the core idea. You can skip all 19th century symphonists to find another equal—until Bruckner. (Equal? Say, in the same league).

The shivers in the violins that underlay the uprising bold thrust of the 'cello's that initiate the Allegro theme may have been caught from Wagnerian techniques of tension but are, as so often with classic composers, an introduction to the whole state that develops.

(It always amazes me that conservative critics—Dr. Hanslick, the Brahmisian, who diminished Brahms to hurt Wagner and Bruckner, Agnew who diminishes any honest Republican to shoot down dissent to the monetary status quo, that such public mouths try to conserve only their limited parochial values, privileges and personal importance, with no imagine or care for the classic pluralities of human justice. They are ignorant men with time-serving skill for debate—and ego for a heart).

You might say that Bruckner was—and still in inordinate—like Beethoven, but not with the sly sophistication of Strauss. But, also like Beethoven, his profound religious root, beyond credo, informs his dramatic statement. The Adagio is a tremendous extension of a chorale, not lessened by the expansive glow of the brass choir (so inspiring to Hindemith)—as if a distillation of Wagner's command of immediate experience so that now is also a moment of eternity. The Scherzo is joy, not merely joke, and the Finale becomes a great gathering of assertions that needs the blatant climax of chords on a single triad. How else to stop the rich contrapuntal life expanded?

Again I describe a performance that kept inordinate sound and experience in order, so that a moment of significence graced our so-mortal lives.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 15 1970

Music: Symphony Performs Max Reger

By HARRY NEVILLE

For those who are unfamiliar with the music of Max Reger there is no better introduction to his work than the "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart," which formed the first half of yesterday afternoon's concert by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

The work is a product of the composer's last years, which doesn't mean his maturity since Reger died at the relatively early age of 43. It does mean, however, that by that time Reger had had considerable conducting experience with a good orchestra — experience which he put to good use in scoring the "Variations."

REGER HAD an absolute passion for contrapuntal density, and his obsession is often apparent in this work. His scoring, however, makes the density somewhat less of a problem than in much of his earlier music. But only somewhat less.

The "Variations" still present mind-boggling problems of balance and coordination, especially when Reger sets nearly every instrument going with different countermelodies and divides the strings so as to add even more lines.

STEINBERG and the BSO coped very well indeed with the balances, and my only complaint — not a strong one — is that the ensemble at times became a bit hectic. The initial variation suffered especially in that respect. What impressed especially about Steinberg's reading was the exact rightness of the tempo he chose for each succeeding section. As a result the music breathed naturally, and one could savor fully all the geniality of this really quite charming score.

In the matter of tempos Steinberg again scored points with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Tempos for any Bruckner symphony tend to vary immensely among different conductors, and there are few composers whose work is so easily and often destroyed by too slow or too fast speeds, or by exaggerated ritards which hold up the flow of the music and make everything sound awkward and labored.

STEINBERG'S ACCOUNT of the opening movement had great breadth of span despite a speed that was perhaps a trifle faster than what we usually get. Much of the movement was kept within a single tempo and the fluctuations that did take place were quite convincing because of the expressive intensity of the playing.

The Adagio came across with great splendor, and this listener's only reservation was to wish for a slightly faster speed with the entry of the contrasting theme. For those who are interested in the recondite matters that afford Brucknerites so much pleasure, Steinberg did use the debatable cymbals and triangle at the slow movement's climax.

THE DELICATE handling of the trio was an especial pleasure of the third movement, and the finale was beautifully integrated, without the persistent drawing-out of the main theme's cadence which flaws so many performances. The playing of the BSO was the most polished this writer has heard so far this year, and although there was much fine individual work from many quarters, the beginning of the season seems an appropriate time to mention the especially fine contribution of the new clarinetist, Harold Wright.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 10 1970 New England

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 8 1970 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

18 1970

A law professor at National Taiwan University and sometime chairman of the political science department, Peng had even offer of ... mission ... kept ... States s ... Michiga ... nesty, h ... Un ... pear ... wane ... in a ... powe ... Chine ... Taiw ... shek ... main ... sensi ... case. ... Cambridge 8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which jures up whispers as well as storms spi through constantly varying rhythmic terns of the most engaging sort. Pene ing these sometimes liquid, someti metallic tonal textures now and then the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina the insistent, resonant comments of guitar strings. It is at once image-pro ing, stirring, humorous, mysterious, challenging. A penny for the thoughts of most attentive listener. There were m because they gave the Canticle and its formers a big reception. It will be pl once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
- Ouverture
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Gavotte
- Menuet 1 – menuet 2
- Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON — Canticle no. 3

RAVEL — 'La valse' — choreographic poem

intermission

PISTON — Symphony no. 2 (1943)
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throught the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of Tuesday night concerts: Tuesday evening, Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct as the orchestra performs Bach, Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Lou Harrison; Ravel's La valse; and Symphony no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders Theatre, Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266 - 1492.)

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with a warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and tonal warmth in the flute solos of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor. Steinberg had pared the orchestra down to a size that was ideal for this festive dance music. It would have helped had he also modified the string tone, which seemed a trifle over-ripe for such joyous, lighthearted pieces.

STEINBERG'S IDEA of double-dotting probably doesn't go far enough in such short, required considerable virtuosic ability. Ghitalla performed with agility, but his tone sounded somewhat constricted and high notes tended to go flat.

CHESTER SCHMITZ was the soloist in Vaughan Williams' Tuba Concerto in F. Minor. This is a work of such grace and lyricism that it might have been specially written to divert the solo instrument of its "Tubby the Tuba" image. The tuba may not have an infinite capacity to charm, but this is nonetheless a quite charming work, rtly because the composer n't overextend his ideas. mitz played with a melous tone, negotiating the vura flights with absolute mb.

ollowing intermission nberg and the orchestra themselves to one of the

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 29 1970

New England Newsclip

THE OPENING OF SYMPHONY H/
by Andrew Raeburn

Plans for a new concert hall in Boston were for of 1893. The old Music Hall in Hamilton Place, phony Orchestra had played since 1881, was to way for a new city street. Henry Lee Higginson unless a new building were erected, the Orches disband. On June 21 a letter was published ov proposing 'to organize a corporation with a capi into 4000 shares of $100 each', to finance a new h ton rallied round, and eventually a total of $410,

Before the year was out, land had been bought, was made that the New York firm of McKim, Mea work on designs for the new building. The Cit because of the economic recession, had abando area around Hamilton Place. The Music Hall was and the need to build an alternative hall became I tects, at Major Higginson's insistence, engaged W a young assistant Professor of physics at Harvard for the acoustics of the new auditorium. Mr McK designs, and prepared new plans, which for the f note of scientific theory of acoustics. Sabine, ras time, 'guaranteed' that the new hall would be 'ac

He proved to be right. Not only were his technica correct, but the sound of the orchestra in the critics. Henry E. Krehbiel, musical editor of the Ne '[Mr Sabine's] confidence, it may be said now, rewarded.' The reporter of the New York Evening remembered that, as the late John Dwight wrot like those of a violin, must ripen and grow music tinuous response to musical vibrations; they mu condition, and become gradually attuned, acclim Boston Symphony Hall has the advantage of st would not be surprising, therefore, if mellowing varius among halls.'

On the evening of October 15 1900, some 250 ca fashionable occupants', to quote the reporter o the entrances to Symphony Hall for the 'Inaug "dressy" gathering, it was not extraordinarily so, reporter, 'for not a single decolleté gown was se form, though the costumes worn by the female were prevailingly of rich fabrics and of rare ar designs. . . . Mrs John L. Gardner sat in the front at about the middle of the hall, accompanied by pianist, who held a score book which Mrs Gar closest attention all the evening, frequently acce a marked swaying of her head and shoulders to th

The stage had been extended some fifteen fee large number of performers, which included no

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

TRICK OR TREAT AT BSO

Talent Time came to the Symphony last weekend. Doriot Dwyer did the Bach Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings, and Armando Ghitalla and Chester Schmitz had at Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C and the Vaughn Williams' Tuba Concerto in F minor, respectively. Mr. Steinberg's oddly assorted program saw these solo pieces sandwiched between the first Boston rendition of Lopatnikoff's Festival Overture and Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps.

The performances all around were nothing if not mettlesome.

Mrs. Dwyer's demonstrated command of her craft has long been a fixture on the scene here, and the fact was reinforced on this occasion. The redoubtable B minor Suite is far too much of a fixture, however; what with the vastness of the literature for flute and strings, surely her talents could have been put more imaginatively to work on something else. By way of mitigation, she played a version of the Suite that embodied considerable ornamentations, though these and indeed the whole rather understated solo line tended to get lost in the extended reaches of Symphony Hall.

Michael Haydn's sawed-off, two-movement essay is certainly no candidate to displace his big brother Franz Joseph's standard work in the genre. Indeed, it is quite a ridiculous piece. The tiny, high pitched trumpet for which it is written is fearfully difficult to control, and not even a performer of Mr. Ghitalla's attainment can make it sound easy— it's not that he negotiated the higher registers well but that he managed to get through them at all. For the rest, though, the combination of his silken tone and satin legatos and obvious relish for his task, combined with the sheer novelty of the Concerto, were irresistible. Ridiculous piece or not, his efforts brought down the biggest applause of the concert.

The good work of Chester Schmitz deep down in the bowels of the orchestra has been consistently noted in this space ever since he came here several years ago. One could remark, or ven marvel, at how a mere tuba could so positively affect the underpinnings of the orchestra. Well, in that rare moment of front and forward for a tubist, Mr. Schmitz showed how he manages it. The expressive vocabulary of this instrument doesn't quite run from a bull moose to a nightingale, but it is far rangier than those, like me, whose experience with it in the solo dimension had heretofore been limited to "Tubby the Tuba", would believe. The Concerto in question, a GI product of Uncle Rafe, was a merely adequate vehicle for the purposes at hand.

There was a conductor for all these happenings, and Mr. Steinberg's turn came with the Lopatnikoff and the Stravinsky. The former, commissioned in 1960 by the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company for the automobile industry, was not as awful as advance reports had indicated—just relatively mediocre derivative stuff by a contemporary of Michael Haydn. But let us hoist a toast to the corporate enlightenment that brought the work into being, for these is the germ of something colossal in its potential: Is yesterday's Count Esterhazy today's General Motors?

The "Sacre", after all these years, and after so many hearings, remains one of the truly stirring works of this century, its impact remarkable undiminished by the myriads of pieces that have borrowed or stolen or appropriated from it. The Saturday evening traversal was a stunning one and, inevitably, made the occasion an experience.

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his first appearance of the season this week. Works to be played include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Stravinsky's Renard and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from "Swan Lake"—Act. 3.

THE SOLOISTS

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 24 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

LOPATNIKOFF — Festival overture op. 40
first performance in Boston

BACH — Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
- Ouverture
- Rondeau
- Sarabande
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Polonaise – double
- Menuet
- Badinerie

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute

HAYDN — Trumpet concerto in C
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

ARMANDO GHITALLA

performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Angeles Philharmonic, f the Hollywood Bowl Mrs Dwyer has served Tanglewood, the New ce joining the Boston Chamber Players, she on many occasions.

estra, and was soloist ven many recitals, and em the Houston Symh Symphony and the the Boston Symphony nade records for RCA. ge Records. He is on anglewood, of Boston y.

erformance of Verdi's dance, polka and dixie-963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associaputized for the Orchesce of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was e Orchestra.

n 1966. Since that time as soloist with the New ony, the Newton Symboston Civic Symphony

orks showcase

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 2
(S)
(E) 194,700

New Englan

was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which jures up whispers as well as storms spil through constantly varying rhythmic terns of the most engaging sort. Pene ing these sometimes liquid, someti metallic tonal textures now and then the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina the insistent, resonant comments of guitar strings. It is at once image-pro ing, stirring, humorous, mysterious, challenging. A penny for the thoughts o most attentive listener. There were m because they gave the Canticle and its formers a big reception. It will be pl once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with a warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and tonal warmth in the flute solos of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor. Steinberg had pared the orchestra down to a size that was ideal for this festive dance music. It would have helped had he also modified the string tone, which seemed a trifle over-ripe for such joyous, lighthearted pieces.

STEINBERG'S IDEA of double-dotting probably doesn't go far enough to satisfy most purists these days, but the ornamentations he used were tastefully conceived and elegantly executed. Symphony Hall could stand a brighter sounding harpsichord

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,[illegible] (S) 298,557

OCT 2[illegible] 1970 New Engl

short, required considerable virtuosic ability. Ghitalla performed with agility, but his tone sounded somewhat constricted and high notes tended to go flat.

CHESTER SCHMITZ was the soloist in Vaughan Williams' Tuba Concerto in F. Minor. This is a work of such grace and lyricism that it might have been specially written to divert the solo instrument of its "Tubby the Tuba" image. The tuba may not have an infinite capacity to charm, but this is nonetheless a quite charming work, partly because the composer didn't overextend his ideas. Schmitz played with a mellifluous tone, negotiating the bravura flights with absolute aplomb.

Following intermission Steinberg and the orchestra put themselves to one of the ultimate virtuoso tests by performing Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Reasonably good performance of this work are likely to be exciting affairs, and this performance was both reasonably good and exciting.

It would be a great deal more so if some of the problems of coordination, balance and articulation could be cleared up. An ideal performance of this score takes more rehearsal time than any orchestra has at its disposal, but we might reasonably expect better balances — especially as regards the brass section — than what we got Friday afternoon.

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.

THE SOLOISTS

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 24 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

LOPATNIKOFF Festival overture op. 40
first performance in Boston

BACH Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
Ouverture
Rondeau
Sarabande
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Polonaise – double
Menuet
Badinerie
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute

M. HAYDN Trumpet concerto in C
Adagio
Allegro molto
ARMANDO GHITALLA
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Angeles Philharmonic, f the Hollywood Bowl Mrs Dwyer has served Tanglewood, the New ce joining the Boston Chamber Players, she on many occasions.

estra, and was soloist ven many recitals, and em the Houston Symh Symphony and the the Boston Symphony nade records for RCA. ge Records. He is on anglewood, of Boston y.

erformance of Verdi's dance, polka and dixie-963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associaoutized for the Orchesce of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was se Orchestra.

n 1966. Since that time as soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym-Boston Civic Symphony

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
Ouverture
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Gavotte
Menuet 1 – menuet 2
Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON Canticle no. 3

RAVEL 'La valse' — choreographic poem*

intermission

PISTON Symphony no. 2 (1943)
Moderato
Adagio
Allegro

THE OPENING OF SYMPHONY HALL IN 1900

by Andrew Raeburn

Plans for a new concert hall in Boston were formulated in the summer of 1893. The old Music Hall in Hamilton Place, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra had played since 1881, was to be demolished to make way for a new city street. Henry Lee Higginson warned the public that unless a new building were erected, the Orchestra would be forced to disband. On June 21 a letter was published over fifty-two signatures, proposing 'to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each', to finance a new hall. The people of Boston rallied round, and eventually a total of $410,700 was subscribed.

Before the year was out, land had been bought, and an announcement was made that the New York firm of McKim, Mead & White had started work on designs for the new building. The City meanwhile, possibly because of the economic recession, had abandoned its project in the area around Hamilton Place. The Music Hall was temporarily reprieved, and the need to build an alternative hall became less pressing. The architects, at Major Higginson's insistence, engaged Wallace Clement Sabine, a young assistant Professor of physics at Harvard, to take responsibility for the acoustics of the new auditorium. Mr McKim abandoned his first designs, and prepared new plans, which for the first time in history took note of scientific theory of acoustics. Sabine, rashly as it seemed at the time, 'guaranteed' that the new hall would be 'acoustically perfect'.

He proved to be right. Not only were his technical predictions absolutely correct, but the sound of the orchestra in the new hall delighted the critics. Henry E. Krehbiel, musical editor of the New York Tribune, wrote: '[Mr Sabine's] confidence, it may be said now, has been justified and rewarded.' The reporter of the New York Evening Post wrote: 'It must be remembered that, as the late John Dwight wrote, "The walls of a hall, like those of a violin, must ripen and grow musical by frequent and continuous response to musical vibrations; they must outgrow their crude condition, and become gradually attuned, acclimated to harmony." The Boston Symphony Hall has the advantage of starting out well, and it would not be surprising, therefore, if mellowing time made it a Stradivarius among halls.'

On the evening of October 15 1900, some 250 carriages 'discharged their fashionable occupants', to quote the reporter of The Boston Globe, at the entrances to Symphony Hall for the 'Inaugural Concert'. 'While a "dressy" gathering, it was not extraordinarily so,' continued the Globe's reporter, 'for not a single decolleté gown was seen save upon the platform, though the costumes worn by the female portion of the audience were prevailingly of rich fabrics and of rare and delicate shades and designs. . . . Mrs John L. Gardner sat in the front row of the first balcony at about the middle of the hall, accompanied by Mr George Proctor, the pianist, who held a score book which Mrs Gardner followed with the closest attention all the evening, frequently accentuating her interest by a marked swaying of her head and shoulders to the rhythm of the music.'

The stage had been extended some fifteen feet to accommodate the large number of performers, which included not only the Boston Sym-

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist in the Bach B Minor Suite for Flute and Strings. It was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out, and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 24 1970 New Engla

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throughout the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of Tuesday night concerts; Tuesday evening, Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct as the orchestra performs Bach, Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Lou Harrison; Ravel's La Valse; and Symphony no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders Theatre, Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266 - 1492.)

ture of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim) range ancestors on his estate. He will benefit by knowing clearly what his long-range plans are.

The owner-manager should realize the importance of tax information and advice to his management. He can develop his knowledge of tax matters by reading, by attending various tax workshops, and by working with other businessmen. In addition, he must organize and train his office staff in matters of tax collection, withholding, recording, reporting, and remittance. His bookkeeper should be in the forefront in the fight for consumerism rather than wait for government agencies to ask the member to "cease and desist?"

Can significant education programs be put on cassettes and offered the members . . such as the speeches of the speaker at the national convention?

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spilling through constantly varying rhythmic patterns of the most engaging sort. Penetrating these sometimes liquid, sometimes metallic tonal textures now and then are the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina and the insistent, resonant comments of the guitar strings. It is at once image-provoking, stirring, humorous, mysterious, and challenging. A penny for the thoughts of the most attentive listener. There were many, because they gave the Canticle and its performers a big reception. It will be played once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and warmth in the flute [illegible] Bach's Suite No. 2 in [illegible] Steinberg had pared [illegible] chestra down to a [illegible] was ideal for [illegible] dance music. It [illegible] helped had he [illegible] the string tone, [illegible] a trifle over-rip[illegible] ous, lightheart[illegible]

STEINBER[illegible] double-dottin[illegible] doesn't go [illegible] fy most [illegible] but the [illegible] used we[illegible] and el[illegible] phony [illegible] brigh[illegible] than [illegible] hal[illegible] he[illegible] le[illegible]

In Mich[illegible] pet Concerto in [illegible] mando Ghitalla was [illegible] good voice," as is said o[illegible] ordinarily excellent vocalists who experience an off-night. This is a pleasant two-movement work which though [illegible] both reas[illegible] citing.

It would be a great [illegible] more so if some of the problems of coordination, balance and articulation could be cleared up. An ideal performance of this score takes more rehearsal time than any orchestra has at its disposal, but we might reasonably expect better balances — especially as regards the brass section — than what we got Friday afternoon.

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500
OCT 22 1970
New England Newschip

SYMPHONY ON TV

Michael Tilson-Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second color-telecast on Friday, October 30, at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONTENTS

Program for October 23 and 24 1970

Future programs

Program notes

Lopatnikoff – Festival overture op. 40
by Andrew Raeburn

Bach – Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
by John N. Burk

M. Haydn – Trumpet concerto in C
by Andrew Raeburn

Vaughan Williams – Tuba concerto in F minor
by Andrew Raeburn

Stravinsky – Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)
by James Lyons

The opening of Symphony Hall in 1900
by Andrew Raeburn

The Music Director

The soloists

Program Editor ANDREW RAEBURN

THE SOLOISTS

[illegible]incipal flute of the Boston Symphony [illegible]rchestra, DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER [illegible]ame to Boston in 1952, the first woman to [illegible]e engaged as a principal by the Orchestra. Her early teachers included her mother and Ernest Liegl, who was then first flute of the Chicago Symphony. Later she studied with Georges Barrère, William Kincaid, and Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which she is a graduate. Before her appointment to the Boston Symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was music director there. Mrs Dwyer has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the New England Conservatory and Boston University since joining the Boston Symphony. A member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, she has also appeared as soloist with the Orchestra on many occasions.

ARMANDO GHITALLA, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony, has been a member of the Orchestra since 1951. Born in Alpha, Illinois, he began to play the trumpet as a boy of eight. His formal education was at Knoxville High School, Illinois Wesleyan University and New York University. He then continued musical studies at the Juilliard School. Before coming to Boston he was first trumpet of the New York City [illegible]estra, and was soloist [illegible]ven many recitals, and [illegible]em the Houston Sym[illegible]h Symphony and the [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible]nade records for RCA. [illegible]ge Records. He is on [illegible]anglewood, of Boston [illegible].

Tuba concerto in F minor

Prelude: allegro moderato
Romanza: andante sostenuto
Rondo alla tedesca: allegro

CHESTER SCHMITZ

[illegible]rmance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

[illegible]ssion

[illegible]AVINSKY

Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

[illegible]erformance of Verdi's [illegible] dance, polka and dixie-[illegible]963. Meanwhile he had [illegible] the Women's Associa-[illegible]utized for the Orches-[illegible]ce of Petrushka. During [illegible]e jazz band, and was [illegible]e Orchestra.

[illegible] 1966. Since that time [illegible]s soloist with the New [illegible]ony, the Newton Sym-[illegible]Boston Civic Symphony

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
Ouverture
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Gavotte
Menuet 1 – menuet 2
Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON — Canticle no. 3

RAVEL — 'La valse' — choreographic poem*

intermission

PISTON — Symphony no. 2 (1943)
Moderato
Adagio
Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850
OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throughout the season the Boston Symp[illegible] Orchestra will take up residence in [illegible] bridge's Sanders Theatre for a seri[illegible] Tuesday night concerts; Tuesday eve[illegible] Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra performs [illegible] Suite no. 4, in D S. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Harrison; Ravel's La valse; and Symp[illegible] no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders The[illegible] Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266-1492.)

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 24 1970
New Engla[illegible]

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist in the Bach B Minor Suite for Flute and Strings. It was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out, and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

[illegible] $350,000 more than had been subscribed. The directors borrowed the extra money needed, mortgaged the hall with reluctance, and leased the building to Major Higginson for ten years. He undertook to meet costs of administration, taxes and all other charges, and to pay to the stockholders the rest of the receipts. In fact the stockholders were never to receive any return on their shares. The Hall lost money from the beginning, and Major Higginson gallantly added the deficit to the large amounts he was already paying to maintain the Orchestra itself.

Major Higginson ended his speech: 'Whether this hall can ever give so much joy to our people as the old Music Hall no one can tell. Much depends on the public, which has already been loyal and staunch to the Orchestra, and for the Orchestra I can only promise in return that it will try to do its share.' Major Higginson then introduced a young man from Philadelphia, Owen Wister, the grandson of Fanny Kemble, whom he had invited to compose a poem for the occasion. 'Mr Wister read quite a long ode to instrumental music, entitled "The bird of passage".'

After an intermission Wilhelm Gericke returned to the podium to conduct a performance of Beethoven's Missa solemnis. The critic of The Boston Herald, who wrote as detailed a report of the evening's proceedings as did his colleague of The Globe, ended his review as follows: 'The whole performance was in all probability as satisfying a one as it is possible to give the stupendous and labored composition. The audience listened appreciatively, and applauded in a like spirit. The occasion was a brilliant one, musically and socially, and a new and interesting page has been turned in the musical history of Boston.'

[illegible] ing. [illegible] ment [illegible] work [illegible] men. [illegible] ganiz[illegible] in m[illegible] with[illegible] ing. [illegible] ous [illegible] by re[illegible] men[illegible] his k[illegible] mana[illegible] infor[illegible] realiz[illegible] The [illegible] will b[illegible] what [illegible] range [illegible] sues [illegible] ing [illegible] us? Should the trade association be in the forefront in the fight for consumerism rather than wait for government agencies to ask the member to "cease and desist?"

Can significant education programs be put on cassettes and offered the members [illegible] such as the speeches of the speaker at the national con[illegible]

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spilling through constantly varying rhythmic patterns of the most engaging sort. Penetrating these sometimes liquid, sometimes metallic tonal textures now and then are the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina and the insistent, resonant comments of the guitar strings. It is at once image-provoking, stirring, humorous, mysterious, and challenging. A penny for the thoughts of the most attentive listener. There were many, because they gave the Canticle and its performers a big reception. It will be played once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with warm, prolonged recep

MRS. DWYER admirable fluency warmth in the fl Bach's Suite No. Steinberg had chestra down was ideal dance mu helped h the stri a trif ous than th halfway bac hears little more less rustling noise.

In Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C, soloist Armando Ghitalla was "not in good voice," as is said of ordinarily excellent vocalists who experience an off-night. This is a pleasant two-movement work which though

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

OCT 22 1970

New England Newscli

SYMPHONY ON TV

Michael Tilson-Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second color-telecast on Friday, October 30, at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONTENTS

Program for October 23 and 24 1970

Future programs

Bach – Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
by John N. Burk

M. Haydn – Trumpet concerto in C
by Andrew Raeburn

Vaughan Williams – Tuba cor
by Andrew Raeburn

Stravinsky – Le
by James L

The or 242

The Mus 241

The soloists 239

ormance by the Boston Symphor 234

Prob 220

ARMANDO GH

Adagio

Allegro molto

Trumpet con

JORIO

ser ideas.

th a mel-egotiating the ts with absolute

llowing intermission

einberg and the orchestra put themselves to one of the ultimate virtuoso tests by performing Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Reasonably good performance of this work are likely to be exciting affairs, and this performance was both reasonably good and exciting.

It would be a great deal more so if some of the problems of coordination, balance and articulation could be cleared up. An ideal performance of this score takes more rehearsal time than any orchestra has at its disposal, but we might reasonably expect better balances — especially as regards the brass section — than what we got Friday afternoon.

THE SOLOISTS

Principal flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER came to Boston in 1952, the first woman to be engaged as a principal by the Orchestra. Her early teachers included her mother and Ernest Liegl, who was then first flute of the Chicago Symphony. Later she studied with Georges Barrère, William Kincaid, and Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which she is a graduate. Before her appointment to the Boston Symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was music director there. Mrs Dwyer has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the New England Conservatory and Boston University since joining the Boston Symphony. A member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, she has also appeared as soloist with the Orchestra on many occasions.

ARMANDO GHITALLA, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony, has been a member of the Orchestra since 1951. Born in Alpha, Illinois, he began to play the trumpet as a boy of eight. His formal education was at Knoxville High School, Illinois Wesleyan University and New York University. He then continued musical studies at the Juilliard School. Before coming to Boston he was first trumpet of the New York City

estra, and was soloist
ven many recitals, and em the Houston Sym-
h Symphony and the
the Boston Symphony
nade records for RCA.
ge Records. He is on anglewood, of Boston
y.

erformance of Verdi's
dance, polka and dixie-
963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associautized for the Orches-ce of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was
e Orchestra.

1966. Since that time s soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym-
Boston Civic Symphony

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
- Ouverture
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Gavotte
- Menuet 1 – menuet 2
- Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON — Canticle no. 3

RAVEL — 'La valse' — choreographic poem*

intermission

PISTON — Symphony no. 2 (1943)
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS — Tuba concerto in F minor
- Prelude: allegro moderato
- Romanza: andante sostenuto
- Rondo alla tedesca: allegro

CHESTER SCHMITZ

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

PRESS: CAMBRIDGE SERIE

Throughout the season the Boston Sy Orchestra will take up residence i Sanders Theatre for a se Tuesday night concerts. Tuesday e Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thom conduct as the orchestra perform Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 Harrison; Ravel's La Valse; and Sy no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders T Kirkland St., Cambridge. 354 - 1492

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist in the Bach B Minor Suite for Flute and Strings. It was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out, and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 666,377

OCT 24 1970

New Engla

experience, has watched and guided the construction and guarded our slender purse.

The construction of Symphony Hall finally cost, rising $750,000, about $350,000 more than had been subscribed. The directors borrowed the extra money needed, mortgaged the hall with reluctance, and leased the building to Major Higginson for ten years. He undertook to meet costs of administration, taxes and all other charges, and to pay to the stockholders the rest of the receipts. In fact the stockholders were never to receive any return on their shares. The Hall lost money from the beginning, and Major Higginson gallantly added the deficit to the large amounts he was already paying to maintain the Orchestra itself.

Major Higginson ended his speech: 'Whether this hall can ever give so much joy to our people as the old Music Hall no one can tell. Much depends on the public, which has already been loyal and staunch to the Orchestra, and for the Orchestra I can only promise in return that it will try to do its share.' Major Higginson then introduced a young man from Philadelphia, Owen Wister, the grandson of Fanny Kemble, whom he had invited to compose a poem for the occasion. 'Mr Wister read quite a long ode to instrumental music, entitled ''The bird of passage''.'

After an intermission Wilhelm Gericke returned to the podium to conduct a performance of Beethoven's Missa solemnis. The critic of The Boston Herald, who wrote as detailed a report of the evening's proceedings as did his colleague of The Globe, ended his review as follows: 'The whole performance was in all probability as satisfying a one as it is possible to give the stupendous and labored composition. The audience listened appreciatively, and applauded in a like spirit. The occasion was a brilliant one, musically and socially, and a new and interesting page has been turned in the musical history of Boston.'

stand on the great social issues of the day confronting us? Should the trade association be in the forefront in the fight for consumerism rather than wait for government agencies to ask the member to 'cease and desist?'

Can significant education programs be put on cassettes and offered to the members — such as the speeches of the speaker at the national convention?

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spilling through constantly varying rhythmic patterns of the most engaging sort. Penetrating these sometimes liquid, sometimes metallic tonal textures now and then are the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina and the insistent, resonant comments of the guitar strings. It is at once image-provoking, stirring, humorous, mysterious, and challenging. A penny for the thoughts of the most attentive listener. There were many, because they gave the Canticle and its performers a big reception. It will be played once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with warm, prolonged recep

MRS. DWYER admirable fluency, warmth in the fl Bach's Suite No. Steinberg had chestra down was ideal dance mu helped h the stri a trif ous.

In Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C, soloist Armando Ghitalla was "not in good voice," as is said of ordinarily excellent vocalists who experience an off-night. This is a pleasant two-movement work which though

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

OCT 22 1970

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY ON TV

Michael Tilson-Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second color-telecast on Friday, October 30, at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONTENTS

Program for October 23 and 24 1970

Future programs

Bach – Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
by John N. Burk

M. Haydn – Trumpet concerto in C
by Andrew Raeburn

Vaughan Williams – T
by Andrew Raeb

Stravinsky – by James

The

242

The Mu

The soloists

formance by the Boston Symphon

ARMANDO GH

Prog

Adagio

Allegro molto

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR CRIPPLE
241 ST. BOTOLPH STREET •

Provides For The Hand
In A Free, Private, Da

A 12 Year Academic Vocational Training
Health Program •

The Industrial School for solicits funds for its opera Bequests, Annuities or L

In case of a life agreem capital to the Industrial S Children and in return r life.

Donors are invited to di with the Treasurer.

Treasurer, CHARLES E. COTTING, 10 Post Offic
CHARLES H. TAYLOR, President — MRS. CHARLE, Chairman Ladie

The House of Qua

THE SOLOISTS

Principal flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER came to Boston in 1952, the first woman to be engaged as a principal by the Orchestra. Her early teachers included her mother and Ernest Liegl, who was then first flute of the Chicago Symphony. Later she studied with Georges Barrère, William Kincaid, and Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which she is a graduate. Before her appointment to the Boston Symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was music director there. Mrs Dwyer has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the New England Conservatory and Boston University since joining the Boston Symphony. A member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, she has also appeared as soloist with the Orchestra on many occasions.

ARMANDO GHITALLA, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony, has been a member of the Orchestra since 1951. Born in Alpha, Illinois, he began to play the trumpet as a boy of eight. His formal education was at Knoxville High School, Illinois Wesleyan University and New York University. He then continued musical studies at the Juilliard School. Before coming to Boston he was first trumpet of the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, the Houston Symphony and the RCA recording Orchestra, and was soloist with the City Service Band of America. He has given many recitals, and has been soloist with many orchestras, among them the Houston Symphony, Philomusica of London, the Miami Beach Symphony and the Boston Pops. Armando Ghitalla is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has toured and made records for RCA. He has also made two solo albums for Cambridge Records. He is on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, of Boston University and of the New England Conservatory.

CHESTER SCHMITZ, principal tuba of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began playing the instrument about fifteen years ago in the Vinton, Iowa, high school band. His college education was at the University of Iowa school of music, and there he performed in orchestra, band and brass ensembles, meanwhile organizing a jazz group in which he played string bass. In addition he studied clarinet, flute, percussion and voice. Professionally he started his career by playing an off-stage trumpet in a performance of Verdi's Requiem, then earned his living by performing in dance, polka and dixieland bands until he joined the US Army band in 1963. Meanwhile he had won a prize in the young artists' competition of the Women's Association of the Minneapolis Symphony, and had deputized for the Orchestra's regular tuba, who became ill, in a performance of Petrushka. During his Service he played tuba and string bass in the jazz band, and was assistant principal bass player in the White House Orchestra.

Chester Schmitz joined the Boston Symphony in 1966. Since that time he has played many recitals, and has appeared as soloist with the New Hampshire Philharmonic, the Wellesley Symphony, the Newton Symphony, the North Shore Philharmonic and the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestras.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH	Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
	Ouverture
	Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
	Gavotte
	Menuet 1 – menuet 2
	Réjouissance (Rejoicing)
LOU HARRISON	Canticle no. 3
RAVEL	'La valse' — choreographic poem*
intermission
PISTON	Symphony no. 2 (1943)
	Moderato
	Adagio
	Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist in the Bach B Minor Suite for Flute and Strings. It was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out, and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 24 1970

New Engla

sues of [illegible] us? Should the trade association be in the forefront in the fight for consumerism rather than wait for government agencies to ask the member to "cease and desist?"

Can significant education programs be put on cassettes and offered the members — such as the speeches of the speaker at the national convention?

The construction of Symphony Hall finally cost rising $750,000, about $350,000 more than had been subscribed. The directors borrowed the extra money needed, mortgaged the hall with reluctance, and leased the building to Major Higginson for ten years. He undertook to meet costs of administration, taxes and all other charges, and to pay to the stockholders the rest of the receipts. In fact the stockholders were never to receive any return on their shares. The Hall lost money from the beginning, and Major Higginson gallantly added the deficit to the large amounts he was already paying to maintain the Orchestra itself.

Major Higginson ended his speech: Whether this hall can ever give so much joy to our people as the old Music Hall no one can tell. Much depends on the public, which has already been loyal and staunch to the Orchestra, and for the Orchestra I can only promise in return that it will try to do its share.' Major Higginson then introduced a young man from Philadelphia, Owen Wister, the grandson of Fanny Kemble, whom he had invited to compose a poem for the occasion, 'Mr Wister read quite a long ode to instrumental music, entitled ''The bird of passage''.'

After an intermission Wilhelm Gericke returned to the podium to conduct a performance of Beethoven's Missa solemnis. The critic of The Boston Herald, who wrote as detailed a report of the evening's proceedings as did his colleague of The Globe, ended his review as follows: 'The whole performance was in all probability as satisfying a one as it is possible to give the superbous and labored composition. The audience listened appreciatively, and applauded in a like spirit. The occasion was a brilliant one, musically and socially, and a new and interesting page has been turned in the musical history of Boston.'

[illegible] experience has watered and guided the construction and guarded our slender purse.

[illegible] will [illegible] what [illegible] The [illegible] realiz [illegible] history [illegible] manag [illegible] his k [illegible] by re [illegible] ous [illegible] work [illegible] men. [illegible] ganiz [illegible] in m [illegible] with [illegible] ing. [illegible] tion?

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spilling through constantly varying rhythmic patterns of the most engaging sort. Penetrating these sometimes liquid, sometimes metallic tonal textures now and then are the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina and the insistent, resonant comments of the guitar strings. It is at once image-provoking, stirring, humorous, mysterious, and challenging. A penny for the thoughts of the most attentive listener. There were many, because they gave the Canticle and its performers a big reception. It will be played once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with a warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and tonal warmth in the flute solos of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor. Steinberg had pared the orchestra down to a size that was ideal for this festive dance music. It would have helped had he also modified the string tone, which seemed a trifle over-ripe for such joyous, lighthearted pieces.

STEINBERG'S IDEA of double-dotting probably doesn't go far enough to satisfy most purists these days, but the ornamentations he used were tastefully conceived and elegantly executed. Symphony Hall could stand a brighter sounding harpsichord than the one in use. From halfway back in the hall one hears little more than a pitchless rustling noise.

In Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C, soloist Armando Ghitalla was "not in good voice," as is said of ordinarily excellent vocalists who experience an off-night. This is a pleasant two-movement work which though short, required considerable virtuosic ability. Ghitalla performed with agility, but his tone sounded somewhat constricted and high notes tended to go flat.

CHESTER SCHMITZ was the soloist in Vaughan Williams' Tuba Concerto in F. Minor. This is a work of such grace and lyricism that it might have been specially written to divert the solo instrument of its "Tubby the Tuba" image. The tuba may not have an infinite capacity to charm, but this is nonetheless a quite charming work, partly because the composer didn't overextend his ideas. Schmitz played with a mellifluous tone, negotiating the bravura flights with absolute aplomb.

Following intermission Steinberg and the orchestra put themselves to one of the ultimate virtuoso tests by performing Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Reasonably good performance of this work are likely to be exciting affairs, and this performance was both reasonably good and exciting.

It would be a great deal more so if some of the problems of coordination, balance and articulation could be cleared up. An ideal performance of this score takes more rehearsal time than any orchestra has at its disposal, but we might reasonably expect better balances — especially as regards the brass section — than what we got Friday afternoon.

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY

OCT 22 1970

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY ON TV
Michael Tilson-Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second color-telecast on Friday, October 30, at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

THE SOLOISTS

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 24 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

LOPATNIKOFF Festival overture op. 40
first performance in Boston

BACH Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
Ouverture
Rondeau
Sarabande
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Polonaise – double
Menuet
Badinerie
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute

M. HAYDN Trumpet concerto in C
Adagio
Allegro molto
ARMANDO GHITALLA
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

...u printemps (The rite of spring)
Part one: The adoration of the earth
Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth
Part two: The sacrifice
Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

os Angeles Philharmonic, of the Hollywood Bowl
e. Mrs Dwyer has served at Tanglewood, the New since joining the Boston ny Chamber Players, she on many occasions.

estra, and was soloist en many recitals, and em the Houston Sym-
Symphony and the
he Boston Symphony
made records for RCA.
ge Records. He is on nglewood, of Boston

erformance of Verdi's
dance, polka and dixie-
963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associa-
outized for the Orches-
ce of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was
e Orchestra.

1966. Since that time
s soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym-
Boston Civic Symphony

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
Ouverture
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Gavotte
Menuet 1 – menuet 2
Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON Canticle no. 3

RAVEL 'La valse' — choreographic poem*

intermission

PISTON Symphony no. 2 (1943)
Moderato
Adagio
Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throught the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of Tuesday night concerts: Tuesday evening, Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct as the orchestra performs Bach, Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Lou Harrison; Ravel's La valse; and Symphony no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders Theatre, Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266 - 1492.)

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist in the Bach B Minor Suite for Flute and Strings. It was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M)
(S)
(E) 194,700

New England

$750,000 more than ...
extra money needed, 'mortgaged the hall with ... the building to Major Higginson for ten years. He undertook 'to meet costs of administration, taxes and all other charges, and to pay to the stockholders the rest of the receipts.' In fact the stockholders were never to receive any return on their shares. The Hall lost money from the beginning, and Major Higginson gallantly added the deficit to the large amounts he was already paying to maintain the Orchestra itself.

Major Higginson ended his speech: 'Whether this hall can ever give so much joy to our people as the old Music Hall no one can tell. Much depends on the public, which has already been loyal and staunch to the Orchestra, and for the Orchestra I can only promise in return that it will try to do its share.' Major Higginson then introduced a young man from Philadelphia, Owen Wister, the grandson of Fanny Kemble, whom he had invited to compose a poem for the occasion. 'Mr Wister read quite a long ode to instrumental music, entitled "The bird of passage."'

After an intermission Wilhelm Gericke returned to the podium to conduct a performance of Beethoven's Missa solemnis. The critic of The Boston Herald, who wrote as detailed a report of the evening's proceedings as did his colleague of The Globe, ended his review as follows:
'The whole performance was in all probability as satisfying a one as it is possible to give the stupendous and laborded composition. The audience listened appreciatively, and applauded in a like spirit. The occasion was a brilliant one, musically and socially, and a new and interesting page has been turned in the musical history of Boston.'

us? Should the trade association be in the forefront in the fight for consumerism rather than wait for government agencies to ask the member to "cease and desist?"

Can significant education programs be put on cassettes and offered the members . .
such as the speeches of the speaker at the national convention?

8.

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spi through constantly varying rhythmic terns of the most engaging sort. Pene ing these sometimes liquid, somet metallic tonal textures now and then the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina the insistent, resonant comments of guitar strings. It is at once image-pro ing, stirring, humorous, mysterious, challenging. A penny for the thoughts o most attentive listener. There were m because they gave the Canticle and its formers a big reception. It will be pl once more on Oct. 27.

Monitor 10-15-70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069
- Ouverture
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Gavotte
- Menuet 1 – menuet 2
- Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON — Canticle no. 3

RAVEL — 'La valse' — choreographic poem

intermission

PISTON — Symphony no. 2 (1943)
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throughout the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of Tuesday night concerts: Tuesday evening, Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct as the orchestra performs Bach, Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Lou Harrison; Ravel's La valse; and Symphony no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders Theatre, Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266 - 1492.)

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with a warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and tonal warmth in the flute solos of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor. Steinberg had pared the orchestra down to a size that was ideal for this festive dance music. It would have helped had he also modified the string tone, which seemed a trifle over-ripe for such joyous, lighthearted pieces.

STEINBERG'S IDEA of double-dotting probably doesn't go far enough to satisfy most ...

short, required considerable virtuosic ability. Ghitalla performed with agility, but his tone sounded somewhat constricted and high notes tended to go flat.

CHESTER SCHMITZ was the soloist in Vaughan Williams' Tuba Concerto in F. Minor. This is a work of such grace and lyricism that it might have been specially written to divert the solo instrument of its "Tubby the Tuba" image. The tuba may not have an infinite capacity to charm, but this is nonetheless a quite charming work, partly because the composer didn't overextend his ideas. Schmitz played with a mellifluous tone, negotiating the bravura flights with absolute aplomb.

Following intermission Steinberg and the orchestra put themselves to one of the ultimate virtuoso tests by ...

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 29 1970

New England Newsclip

THE OPENING OF SYMPHONY

by Andrew Raeburn

Plans for a new concert hall in Boston were of 1893. The old Music Hall in Hamilton Pla phony Orchestra had played since 1881, was way for a new city street. Henry Lee Higgins unless a new building were erected, the Orc disband. On June 21 a letter was published proposing 'to organize a corporation with a c into 4000 shares of $100 each', to finance a ne ton rallied round, and eventually a total of $4

Before the year was out, land had been bougl was made that the New York firm of McKim, M work on designs for the new building. The because of the economic recession, had aban area around Hamilton Place. The Music Hall w and the need to build an alternative hall becam tects, at Major Higginson's insistence, engaged a young assistant Professor of physics at Harva for the acoustics of the new auditorium. Mr M designs, and prepared new plans, which for the note of scientific theory of acoustics. Sabine, r time, 'guaranteed' that the new hall would be '

He proved to be right. Not only were his technic correct, but the sound of the orchestra in the critics. Henry E. Krehbiel, musical editor of the N '[Mr Sabine's] confidence, it may be said now rewarded.' The reporter of the New York Evenin, remembered that, as the late John Dwight wro like those of a violin, must ripen and grow musi tinuous response to musical vibrations; they m condition, and become gradually attuned, acclir Boston Symphony Hall has the advantage of s would not be surprising, therefore, if mellowin varius among halls.'

On the evening of October 15 1900, some 250 ca fashionable occupants', to quote the reporter c the entrances to Symphony Hall for the 'Inaug "dressy" gathering, it was not extraordinarily so, reporter, 'for not a single decolleté gown was s form, though the costumes worn by the female were prevailingly of rich fabrics and of rare a designs. . . . Mrs John L. Gardner sat in the front at about the middle of the hall, accompanied by pianist, who held a score book which Mrs Gar closest attention all the evening, frequently acce a marked swaying of her head and shoulders to t

The stage had been extended some fifteen fee large number of performers, which included no

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

TRICK OR TREAT AT BSO

Talent Time came to the Symphony last weekend. Dwyer did the Bach Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute strings, and Armando Ghitalla and Chester Schmitz had at Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C and the Vaughn Williams' Tuba Concerto in F minor, respectively. Mr. Steinberg's oddly assorted program saw these solo pieces sandwiched between the first Boston rendition of Lopatnikoff's Festival Overture and Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps.

The performances all around were nothing if not mettlesome.

Mrs. Dwyer's demonstrated command of her craft has long been a fixture on the scene here, and the fact was reinforced on this occasion. The redoubtable B minor Suite is far too much of a fixture, however; what with the vastness of the literature for flute and strings, surely her talents could have been put more imaginatively to work on something else. By way of mitigation, she played a version of the Suite that embodied considerable ornamentations, though these and indeed the whole rather understated solo line tended to get lost in the extended reaches of Symphony Hall.

Michael Haydn's sawed-off, two-movement essay is certainly no candidate to displace his big brother Franz Joseph's standard work in the genre. Indeed, it is quite a ridiculous piece. The tiny, high pitched trumpet for which it is written is fearfully difficult to control, and not even a performer of Mr. Ghitalla's attainment can make it sound easy— it's not that he negotiated the higher registers well but that he managed to get through them at all. For the rest, though, the combination of his silken tone and satin legatos and obvious relish for his task, combined with the sheer novelty of the Concerto, were irresistible. Ridiculous piece or not, his efforts brought down the biggest applause of the concert.

The good work of Chester Schmitz deep down in the bowels of the orchestra has been consistently noted in this space ever since he came here several years ago. One could remark, or ven marvel, at how a mere tuba could so positively affect the underpinnings of the orchestra. Well, in that rare moment of front and forward for a tubist, Mr. Schmitz showed how he manages it. The expressive vocabulary of this instrument doesn't quite run from a bull moose to a nightingale, but it is far rangier than those, like me, whose experience with it in the solo dimension had heretofore been limited to "Tubby the Tuba", would believe. The Concerto in question, a GI product of Uncle Rafe, was a merely adequate vehicle for the purposes at hand.

There was a conductor for all these happenings, and Mr. Steinberg's turn came with the Lopatnikoff and the Stravinsky. The former, commissioned in 1960 by the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company for the automobile industry, was not as awful as advance reports had indicated—just relatively mediocre derivative stuff by a contemporary of Michael Haydn. But let us hoist a toast to the corporate enlightenment that brought the work into being, for these is the germ of something colossal in its potential: Is yesterday's Count Esterhazy today's General Motors?

The "Sacre", after all these years, and after so many hearings, remains one of the truly stirring works of this century, its impact remarkable undiminished by the myriads of pieces that have borrowed or stolen or appropriated from it. The Saturday evening traversal was a stunning one and, inevitably, made the occasion an experience.

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his first appearance of the season this week. Works to be played include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Stravinsky's Renard and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from "Swan Lake"—Act. 3.

THE SOLOISTS

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 24 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

LOPATNIKOFF — Festival overture op. 40
first performance in Boston

BACH — Suite no. 2 in B minor S. 1067
- Ouverture
- Rondeau
- Sarabande
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Polonaise – double
- Menuet
- Badinerie

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute

M. HAYDN — Trumpet concerto in C
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

ARMANDO GHITALLA

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim) os Angeles Philharmonic, of the Hollywood Bowl . Mrs Dwyer has served at Tanglewood, the New ince joining the Boston y Chamber Players, she on many occasions.

estra, and was soloist en many recitals, and m the Houston Sym- Symphony and the he Boston Symphony ade records for RCA. ge Records. He is on nglewood, of Boston erformance of Verdi's dance, polka and dixie- 963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associa- outized for the Orches- ce of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was e Orchestra.

1966. Since that time s soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym- Boston Civic Symphony works showcase

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) (E) 194,700
(S)

New England

was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 8 1970

BSO On Color-TV

Michael Tilson - Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a color-telecast BSO concert Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44. Program will be heard simultaneously in stereo on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

Program will include the "Suite No. 4 in D" by Bach, Lou Harrison's "Canticle No. 3", "La Valse" by Ravel and Walter Piston's "Symphony No. 2".

BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms spilling through constantly varying rhythmic patterns of the most engaging sort. Penetrating these sometimes liquid, sometimes metallic tonal textures now and then are the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarina and the insistent, resonant comments of the guitar strings. It is at once image-provoking, stirring, humorous, mysterious, and challenging. A penny for the thoughts of the most attentive listener. There were many, because they gave the Canticle and its performers a big reception. It will be played once more on Oct. 27.

MESSENGER
AVON
WEEKLY

OCT 2 1970

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY ON TV

Michael Tilson-Thomas will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second color-telecast on Friday, October 30, at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening October 13 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D S. 1069

Ouverture
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Gavotte
Menuet 1 – menuet 2
Réjouissance (Rejoicing)

LOU HARRISON — Canticle no. 3

RAVEL — 'La valse' — choreographic poem*

intermission

PISTON — Symphony no. 2 (1943)

Moderato
Adagio
Allegro

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

OCT 10 1970

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES

Throught the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of Tuesday night concerts: Tuesday evening, Oct. 13 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct as the orchestra performs Bach Suite no. 4, in DS. 1069; Canticle no. 3 by Lou Harrison; Ravel's La valse; and Symphony no. 2 (1943) by Piston. (Sanders Theatre, Kirkland St., Cambridge, 266 - 1492.)

phony Orchestra, but also a chorus of 250 ('The Cecilia Society and other singers'). 'The women of the Cecilia Society, who were massed on each side of the stage in ascending tiers, appeared like great banks of beautiful flowers, in their gowns of various tints, for all were in evening dress and none in somber colors.'

The concert began with a setting of a chorale by Bach, 'Grant us to do with zeal our portion, whatsoever'. Next followed a report by Henry Lee Higginson'. The founder of the Orchestra told briefly how the Hall had come into being, he paid tribute to Mr McKim, to Professor Sabine, to the contractor Mr Norcross, and to his old friend C. E. Cotting, a successful realtor and a Trustee of the old Music Hall, 'who, with his wide experience, has watched and guided the construction and guarded our slender purse'.

The construction of Symphony Hall finally cost 'rising $750,000', about $350,000 more than had been subscribed. The directors borrowed the extra money needed, mortgaged the hall with reluctance, and leased the building to Major Higginson for ten years. He undertook 'to meet costs of administration, taxes and all other charges, and to pay to the stockholders the rest of the receipts'. In fact the stockholders were never to receive any return on their shares. The Hall lost money from the beginning, and Major Higginson gallantly added the deficit to the large amounts he was already paying to maintain the Orchestra itself.

Major Higginson ended his speech: 'Whether this hall can ever give so much joy to our people as the old Music Hall no one can tell. Much depends on the public, which has already been loyal and staunch to the Orchestra, and for the Orchestra I can only promise in return that it will try to do its share.' Major Higginson then introduced a young man from Philadelphia, Owen Wister, the grandson of Fanny Kemble, whom he had invited to compose a poem for the occasion. 'Mr Wister read quite a long ode to instrumental music, entitled "The bird of passage".'

After an intermission Wilhelm Gericke returned to the podium to conduct a performance of Beethoven's Missa solemnis. The critic of The Boston Herald, who wrote as detailed a report of the evening's proceedings as did his colleague of The Globe, ended his review as follows: 'The whole performance was in all probability as satisfying a one as it is possible to give the stupendous and labored composition. The audience listened appreciatively, and applauded in a like spirit. The occasion was a brilliant one, musically and socially, and a new and interesting page has been turned in the musical history of Boston.'

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 606,375

OCT 24 1970

New Englan

3 short works showcase

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

Yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by William Steinberg was a mixed bag. Main feature was the presence of three short works for solo instrument and orchestra. Featured were first-deck players Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; and Chester Schmitz, tuba.

Mrs. Dwyer was soloist [illegible] the Bach B Minor Suite. Would an infrequent gathering for husbands and wives be a social success? Should the trade associations take a stand on the great social issue (the failure to pay taxes due) ference between tax evasion aware of the important difaction. He should above all, be current and future courses of into consideration as he plans planning. He must take them

The business man should recognize that tax laws are an important factor in his business

CONSIDERATIONS I

By HARVEY C. KRENTZMAN

MANAGIN FOR PROFI

NEW LEATHER WORLD — I opening of its newest store, Le Newton Centre, are Bernard I G. Bashas of Newton and J World, Coolidge Corner, Brookln in a complete selection of luggag items and gifts.

was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

The C Major trumpet concerto of Michael Haydn is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Unfortunately, Steinberg's sound approach to the work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an insult to both the orchestra and the audience.

doesn
fy bur us hall hears litt less rustling no

In Michael Haydn's pet Concerto in C, soloist A mando Ghitalla was "not in good voice," as is said of ordinarily excellent vocalists who experience an off-night. This is a pleasant two-movement work which though likely to and this perfor

both reasonably good and citing.

It would be a great deal more so if some of the problems of coordination, balance and articulation could be cleared up. An ideal performance of this score takes more rehearsal time than any orchestra has at its disposal, but we might reasonably expect better balances — especially as regards the brass section — than what we got Friday afternoon.

The Music Director

The soloists

Program Editor ANDREW RAEBURN

Andrew Raeburn

Symphony Hall in 1900

(The rite of spring)

termission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Romanza: andante sostenuto
Rondo alla tedesca: allegro

CHESTER SCHMITZ

erformance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

ge Records. He is on nglewood, of Boston

erformance of Verdi's
dance, polka and dixie-
963. Meanwhile he had the Women's Associa-
outized for the Orchesice of Petrushka. During he jazz band, and was e Orchestra.

n 1966. Since that time
as soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym-
Boston Civic Symphony

Harrison's 'Canticle' a BSO hit

By Louis Snyder

Tuesday was the first night of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series when the musically curious cross the Charles to sample the fare at Symphony Hall. The conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas ("Who is that young man?"), repeated three selections from his first program this season—the Bach Suite No. 4 in D, Ravel's "La Valse," and the Symphony No. 2 by Cambridge's own Walter Piston.

However, into this gourmet feast Mr. Thomas dropped an exotic BSO first—Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3—first performed in 1941 in San Francisco, and requiring the services of five percussionists, a guitarist, and an ocarina player. Iron pipes (muted), brake drums (muted), dragon's mouths (temple blocks), small and large elephant bells, and water buffalo bells, along with the more familiar battery, were allotted to the percussionists. ("That's an orchestra?")

Yes, indeed, professor. Just as strings and winds have their day alone, the brilliant BSO percussion section, with Martin Hoherman, erstwhile associate first cellist (ocarina), violist Robert Karol (guitarist), and BSO assistant treasurer Thomas W. Morris a ringer (no pun intended) among the percussionists, displayed their varied accomplishments to the admiration of one and all.

The Harrison piece is an enchanting, atmospheric congress of sounds, which conjures up whispers as well as storms sp through constantly varying rhythmic terns of the most engaging sort. Pen ing these sometimes liquid, some metallic tonal textures now and the the wistful, eerie voice of the ocarin the insistent, resonant comments o guitar strings. It is at once image-pr ing, stirring, humorous, mysterious, challenging. A penny for the thoughts most attentive listener. There were r because they gave the Canticle and its formers a big reception. It will be p once more on Oct. 27.

VERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

r 13 1970 at 8.30

HOMAS conductor

te no. 4 in D. S. 1069 verture rrée 1 – bourrée 2 otte nuet 1 – menuet 2

ouissance (Rejoicing)

nticle no. 3

valse' — choreographic poem*

mphony no. 2 (1943)

oderato dagio legro

IMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.

B.S.O. CAMBRIDGE SERIES
Throught the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take up residence in Cambridge's Sanders Theatre for a series of

Symphony

Wind Players Take Spotlight

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some of the principal wind players of the Boston Symphony took the spotlight yesterday as William Steinberg conducted the orchestra in works of Bach, Michael Haydn and Ralph Vaughan Williams. It's only occasionally that first chair players get the chance to appear as soloists with the orchestra, and Friday's appreciative audience honored each of the performers — Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; Chester Schmitz, principal tuba — with a warm, prolonged reception.

MRS. DWYER displayed admirable fluency and tonal warmth in the flute solos of Bach's Suite No. 2 in B Minor. Steinberg had pared the orchestra down to a size that was ideal for this festive dance music. It would have helped had he also modified the string tone, which seemed a trifle over-ripe for such joyous, lighthearted pieces.

STEINBERG'S IDEA of double-dotting probably doesn't go far enough to satisfy

MESSENGER
AVON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,500

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 2 (S) 298,557

OCT 29 1970

New England

short, required considerable virtuosic ability. Ghitalla performed with agility, but his tone sounded somewhat constricted and high notes tended to go flat.

CHESTER SCHMITZ was the soloist in Vaughan Williams' Tuba Concerto in F Minor. This is a work of such grace and lyricism that it might have been specially written to divert the solo instrument of its "Tubby the Tuba" image. The tuba may not have an infinite capacity to charm, but this is nonetheless a quite charming work, partly because the composer didn't overextend his ideas. Schmitz played with a mellifluous tone, negotiating the bravura flights with absolute aplomb.

Following intermission Steinberg and the orchestra put themselves to one of the

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 29 1970

New England Newsclip

THE SOLOISTS

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Program Editor ANDREW RAEBURN

The soloists 242

The Music Director 241

The opening of Symphony Hall in 1900 239
by Andrew Raeburn

Stravinsky – Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring) 234
by James Lyons

Vaughan Williams – Tuba concerto in F minor 220
by Andrew Raeburn

M. Haydn – Trumpet concerto in C 218
by Andrew Raeburn

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS — Tuba concerto in F minor

Prelude: allegro moderato
Romanza: andante sostenuto
Rondo alla tedesca: allegro

CHESTER SCHMITZ

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

ntermission

TRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – Spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Angeles Philharmonic, f the Hollywood Bowl
Mrs Dwyer has served Tanglewood, the New nce joining the Boston Chamber Players, she on many occasions.

estra, and was soloist
ven many recitals, and em the Houston Sym-
h Symphony and the
the Boston Symphony
nade records for RCA.
ge Records. He is on anglewood, of Boston
y.

performance of Verdi's dance, polka and dixie-
1963. Meanwhile he had f the Women's Associaputized for the Orches-nce of Petrushka. During the jazz band, and was se Orchestra.

n 1966. Since that time
as soloist with the New ony, the Newton Sym-
Boston Civic Symphony

THE OPENING OF SYMPHONY I

by Andrew Raeburn

Plans for a new concert hall in Boston were f of 1893. The old Music Hall in Hamilton Plac phony Orchestra had played since 1881, was t way for a new city street. Henry Lee Higginso unless a new building were erected, the Orch disband. On June 21 a letter was published proposing 'to organize a corporation with a ca into 4000 shares of $100 each', to finance a new ton rallied round, and eventually a total of $41

Before the year was out, land had been bought was made that the New York firm of McKim, M work on designs for the new building. The C because of the economic recession, had aban area around Hamilton Place. The Music Hall w and the need to build an alternative hall became tects, at Major Higginson's insistence, engaged a young assistant Professor of physics at Harva for the acoustics of the new auditorium. Mr M designs, and prepared new plans, which for the note of scientific theory of acoustics. Sabine, ra time, 'guaranteed' that the new hall would be '

He proved to be right. Not only were his technic correct, but the sound of the orchestra in the critics. Henry E. Krehbiel, musical editor of the N '[Mr Sabine's] confidence, it may be said now, rewarded.' The reporter of the New York Evenin remembered that, as the late John Dwight wro like those of a violin, must ripen and grow musi tinuous response to musical vibrations; they m condition, and become gradually attuned, acclir Boston Symphony Hall has the advantage of s would not be surprising, therefore, if mellowin varius among halls.'

On the evening of October 15 1900, some 250 ca fashionable occupants', to quote the reporter o the entrances to Symphony Hall for the 'Inaug "dressy" gathering, it was not extraordinarily so, reporter, 'for not a single decolleté gown was s form, though the costumes worn by the female were prevailingly of rich fabrics and of rare a designs. . . . Mrs John L. Gardner sat in the front at about the middle of the hall, accompanied by pianist, who held a score book which Mrs Gar closest attention all the evening, frequently acce a marked swaying of her head and shoulders to t

The stage had been extended some fifteen fe large number of performers, which included n

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

TRICK OR TREAT AT BSO

Talent Time came to the Symphony last weekend. Doriot Dwyer did the Bach Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings, and Armando Ghitalla and Chester Schmitz had at Michael Haydn's Trumpet Concerto in C and the Vaughn Williams' Tuba Concerto in F minor, respectively. Mr. Steinberg's oddly assorted program saw these solo pieces sandwiched between the first Boston rendition of Lopatnikoff's Festival Overture and Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps.

The performances all around were nothing if not mettlesome.

Mrs. Dwyer's demonstrated command of her craft has long been a fixture on the scene here, and the fact was reinforced on this occasion. The redoubtable B minor Suite is far too much of a fixture, however; what with the vastness of the literature for flute and strings, surely her talents could have been put more imaginatively to work on something else. By way of mitigation, she played a version of the Suite that embodied considerable ornamentations, though these and indeed the whole rather understated solo line tended to get lost in the extended reaches of Symphony Hall.

Michael Haydn's sawed-off, two-movement essay is certainly no candidate to displace his big brother Franz Joseph's standard work in the genre. Indeed, it is quite a ridiculous piece. The tiny, high pitched trumpet for which it is written is fearfully difficult to control, and not even a performer of Mr. Ghitalla's attainment can make it sound easy— it's not that he negotiated the higher registers well but that he managed to get through them at all. For the rest, though, the combination of his silken tone and satin legatos and obvious relish for his task, combined with the sheer novelty of the Concerto, were irresistible. Ridiculous piece or not, his efforts brought down the biggest applause of the concert.

The good work of Chester Schmitz deep down in the bowels of the orchestra has been consistently noted in this space ever since he came here several years ago. One could remark, or ven marvel, at how a mere tuba could so positively affect the underpinnings of the orchestra. Well, in that rare moment of front and forward for a tubist, Mr. Schmitz showed how he manages it. The expressive vocabulary of this instrument doesn't quite run from a bull moose to a nightingale, but it is far rangier than those, like me, whose experience with it in the solo dimension had heretofore been limited to "Tubby the Tuba", would believe. The Concerto in question, a GI product of Uncle Rafe, was a merely adequate vehicle for the purposes at hand.

There was a conductor for all these happenings, and Mr. Steinberg's turn came with the Lopatnikoff and the Stravinsky. The former, commissioned in 1960 by the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company for the automobile industry, was not as awful as advance reports had indicated—just relatively mediocre derivative stuff by a contemporary of Michael Haydn. But let us hoist a toast to the corporate enlightenment that brought the work into being, for these is the germ of something colossal in its potential: Is yesterday's Count Esterhazy today's General Motors?

The "Sacre", after all these years, and after so many hearings, remains one of the truly stirring works of this century, its impact remarkable undiminished by the myriads of pieces that have borrowed or stolen or appropriated from it. The Saturday evening traversal was a stunning one and, inevitably, made the occasion an experience.

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his first appearance of the

orks showcase

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 24 1970

New Engla

was a disappointing performance with flaccid rhythm and a general lack of animation that, unfortunately, is typical of Boston Symphony Bach performances. Michael Tilson Thomas' continuo realizations were interesting in themselves but tended to work against the already tentative forward motion of the music. Mrs. Dwyer's performance of the solo part was interesting, well-thought out, and phrased; but her decision to ornament the work, to such a degree was, I think, a mistake.

Certain cadential trills in a work such as this are acceptable if not mandatory, but excessive use of interpolated roulades and arpeggios did damage to the simplicity of the line of the work. This was especially true in the Sarabande where the melody was practically indistinguishable in the fancified version performed.

is not a particularly interesting work but was a spectacular showcase for Ghitalla's remarkable control of the extreme upper register of the C trumpet. Schmitz was also dealing with a mediocre piece in his performance of the Vaughan-Williams Tuba Concerto, but again his fine control of such a seemingly unwieldly instrument was admirable and ultimately enjoyable.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." This work seems to have turned into something of a concert staple and it is strange for such a bombshell to become part of the "establishment" in such a relatively short time. Steinberg clearly sees the work in terms of its romantic antecedents. Such an approach is actually refreshing after so many neoclassic performances of the piece. Un-work was undermined by ragged ensemble and some really chaotic moments near the end. The concert opened with a pretty terrible piece, Festival Overture by Lopatnikoff. It was an

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 28 1970

New England Newsclip

VERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Harrison's Canticle No. 3 fine, sometimes surprising

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Lou Harrison, whose Canticle No. 3 Michael Tilson Thomas included on his Boston Symphony program last night walks alone. Now 53, he has composed copiously and idiosyncratically for nearly 40 years, his works defying classification and having relatively little stylistic uniformity among themselves. His teachers were Henry Cowell and Schoenberg, and I imagine that from the one he got his interest in non-Western musics, and from the other his precision of workmanship. He has remarkable gifts as a conductor, and in and out of music, his occupation and concerns have been astonishingly and engagingly diversified.

His Canticle No. 3 must have been startling in 1941 when it was first heard and when its gamelanlike sounds would have been totally unfamiliar to just about everyone in an American audience. By now we have heard dozens, hundreds of pieces with exotic instrumentations, especially ones that aggressively make a point of their delicacy and there is little that is more tiresome. It really says something about the quality of Harrison's work that his Canticle No. 3 sounds so fresh today and makes so delightful an effect.

It is scored for ocarinas (played by Martin Hoherman, the Symphony's assistant principal cellist), guitar, and something like 15 kinds of percussion instruments, including iron pipes (muted), brak- edrums (five out of eight muted), dragons' mouths (temple blocks), Egyptian rattles, and elephant bells in three sizes. The ensemble makes fine and gentle and sometimes surprising sounds, and the music, which lasts a bit under a quarter hour, moves with pleasing variety sometimes involved in ruminations round about tiny phrases, sometimes making percussive, irregular accompaniments to unheard melodies.

It is light in weight: I at least cannot hear what led Virgil Thomson, reviewing it in 1953, to call it "powerful in expression," though "subtle" it is, as he said, and "lovely to listen to." I found its rhythmic looseness refreshing, particularly in the symphony concert context where so much regular and beaty music is served up.

On stage, along with the fine players and their rather jumpy conductor, was an ambulatory television camera-man. His softly irritating presense was the counterpart of that experience we have all had of being kept waiting in a store while the shopkeeper thought it more important to talk on the telephone than to deal with his real flesh-and-blood customers.

Symphony: A Program for All Tastes

By HARRY NEVILLE

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas's program yesterday with the Boston Symphony was exquisitely conceived in every detail. There was something to satisfy nearly every taste — Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Schoenberg, Stravinsky —and each piece was a gem of its kind. (Yes, I do think "Swan Lake" contains some fine music.)

For the most part, the program was exquisitely played, too, and my only real complaint had to do with the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. Most conductors take a serene, genial view of this work. The tempo of the first movement, for example, is generally somewhat slower than what Beethoven indicated, and conductors tend to linger over the opening measures as though they were savoring unusually good wine.

THIS APPROACH can, of course, become maudlin, but when it does work it seems to reveal what the Eighth Symphony is all about. Perhaps it's just a matter of being used to hearing the work played in this way that made Thomas's quite different approach seem wrong. He appears to take a rather severe, uncompromising view of the music. His tempos are literal and there isn't a great deal of flexibility in his phrasing.

The result is that he makes of the Eighth a rather stormy affair, and if it's to be played that way then a great deal of care —more than was the case yesterday —should be taken to iron out the problems of articulation and balance in which the score abounds.

SCHOENBERG'S Five Pieces for Orchestra is a carry-over from last season, and its performance yesterday was even more brilliant and expressive than before. Stravinsky's "Renard" likewise got a first-rate reading. The soloists — tenors Robert Gartside and Alexander Stevenson, basses Mark Pearson and Richard Gill — threw themselves into their work with evident relish. Thomas detailed the rhythmic inflections superbly and the whole score came through with great wit and charm.

Although the divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" was listed as a first performance for the Boston Symphony, its inclusion might easily strike one as the epitome of clinche-ridden programming. Let me only say that I would gladly hear any ancient warhorse in the repertory in a performance as fresh and good as this one.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

OCT 21 1970

Michael Thomas l Conduct ston Concerts

TON — Michael Tilson s, associate conductor e Boston Symphony tra, conducts the fifth Friday-Saturday con- the Boston Symphony ra, Friday, Oct. 30 at and Saturday, Oct. 31 p.m.

half of the program oven's Symphony No. Schoenberg's Five or Orchestra. Follow- mission, Thomas con- avinsky's Renard and sky's Divertissement three of Swan Lake. concert of the Tues- series takes place evening, Oct. 27 at . Thomas conducts uite No. 4, Lou Har- anticle No. 3, Ravel's and Piston's Sym- o. 2. This concert aped as the second east concert of the eason and will be WGBH-TV, Channel n, Friday, Oct. 30

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 31 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

OCT 22 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

22 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

OCT 22 1970 OCT 22 1970 OCT 22 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Oct. 30 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Oct. 31 at 8:30 p.m. The first half of the program is Beethoven's Symphony no. 8 and Schoenberg's Five pieces for Orchestra. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Stravinsky's "Renard" and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act three of "Swan Lake."

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 30 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 31 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 8 in F op. 93*
Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

SCHOENBERG — Five pieces for orchestra op. 16
Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
Vergangenes (The past)
Farben (Chord colors)
Peripetia
Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Renard
ROBERT GARTSIDE, ALEXANDER STEVENSON tenors
MARK PEARSON, RICHARD GILL basses
TONI KOVES-STEINER cimbalom

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TCHAIKOVSKY — Divertissement from Act 3 of 'Swan Lake'
Entrance of the guests and waltz – Entrance of Von Rotbart and Odile – Pas de six (Intrada and variations) – Czardas – Danse éspagnole – Danse napolitaine – Danse russe – Mazurka – Scène (Rejoicing of Siegfried's mother; Waltz of Siegfried and Odile; Siegfried announces his betrothal to Odile; Odette appears at the castle window; Von Rotbart and Odile vanish; Siegfried's departure)

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

A Fresh Look at the BS

By Valerie Restivo

I have always been a little awed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I am new to Massachusetts, and I heard the orchestra for the first time, Tuesday evening. The awe is still there. This might be titled, "A Former Midwesterner's Impressions of a Yankee Institution." The recordings I had heard of the BSO did not, of course, do it justice.

Tuesday's program was nicely balanced and superbly directed by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. The first offering was Bach's Suite No. 4 in D, bright, neat and well-tailored, but not devoid of feeling. Thomas's interpretation furnished substance without sentimentality. The final "Rejouissance" ("Rejoicing") was glorious. As I sat, savoring the experience, I heard a lady nearby remark that "that was tiresome — one of the most tiresome pieces I think I've ever heard . . . he did work awfully hard at it." The orchestral suites are pompous, it's true . . . but such magnificent pomposity!

Albert Schweitzer called the orchestral suites "the ideal musical picture of the rococo period." The audience was polite, but not overwhelmed by that musical picture.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 followed. Written in 1943, the symphony is a blending of Piston's dual Yankee-Ita original career gressed to the c often pictorial draftsmanship, ted.

Simplicity ch Symphony. The carefully develo stated but not overstated. The main theme, which has been placed in "a sort of Dorian mode," follows through to the final movement. Bel canto cellos and basses sing the opening of the Moderato. The plaintive, cantabile sound moves quickly to a wild-west syncopation of brass and percussion. It's all very American; then the opening song returns. The symphony is more synthesis than contrast, more romantic than experimental.

The Adagio is Piston at his most romantic. Lush orchestration enriches the imagery; the composer is more painter than draughtsman here.

The Allegro is crisper, often brash. There is some of the oom-pah sound of public park bands; a bit of satire, perhaps, some buffoonery before the return to the nostalgic opening song.

It is a beautiful, uncomplicated work, that lends itself to repeated but casual listening. The lady nearby said it was "disconnected," a response that baffled me.

The second half of the program gan with William Schuman's Violin ncerto. Although the conductor nphasized textural and dynamic ntrasts, I found the piece rather dantic. Soloist Paul Zukofsky hand the difficult work with admirable ll. But skill was not enough to stain my interest in the concerto.

William Schuman has been called "the most powerful man in American musical life." His innovativeness as composer, as mentor of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, his work at Juillard and elsewhere are well known. If either his power or his stature as a composer were judged solely by the violin concerto, I doubt that William Schuman would make the mark.

In the first part of the opening Allegro Risoluto section the entire orchestra is used like a single, massive percussion instrument — then there is the surprise of rich, nearly traditional harmonies. One of the high points of the performance was Paul Zukofsky's flawless rendering of the cadenza that ends the first movement. The passage for trombones and violin combines comedy with dramatic intensity, for a fascinating effect.

The second movement contains some characteristic writing for brass and percussion, with an opportunity to demonstrate tympanist Everett Firth's virtuosity. The last section would be good background for a super, old-fashioned, Cecil B. De Mille-type spectacular, with a melodramatic, much-ado-about-too-little Hollywood finale. The audience seemed more pleased than I was; applause was warm.

The final selection turned a pleasant evening into an event. "La Valse" holds a very special place in Ravel literature. Immersed in death and destruction, surrounded by the horror of World War I, Ravel's sole composition offered homage to the dead. From the start of the war until 1920, he had composed only "Le Tombeau de Couperin." Then he created "La Valse." The title is both literal and ironic. Conceived as homage to another composer, Johann Strauss, the piece is at the same time charming and grotesque. Ravel often dealt in contradictions; "La Valse" relies on them for its very existence.

It is La Grande Valse pushed to the brink of madness. The conductor and the orchestra gave it an inspired performance. Thomas nearly flew with the dance as it built, from themes and tempi that might have been written by Strauss himself, to chaos, to madness. I could almost hear an old radio playing the aristocratic waltzes, while a more contemporary orchestra gave the truer story: military drumbeats, soft and ominous, death and devastation, a rough, ungraceful, even cruel superimposition of conflicting views of reality.

"La Valse" reminds me of Katharine Anne Porter's novel, "Ship of Fools," in which the dreams and fantasies of a doomed society are played out against a background of the impending Second World War.

No longer merely a "former Midwesterner," I now feel on the brink of Bostonian loyalty to the BSO. Michael Tilson Thomas is a delight to watch, and his results are impeccable.

* * *

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON MASS.
WEEKLY 2,004

OCT 8 1970

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000

OCT 27 1970

The Cantata Singers, conducted by John Harbison, will sing three Bach cantatas Wednesday night, October 28, at 8:30 in Sanders. Last year this small, excellent chorus gave some of the best concerts around, especially if you like cantatas. These will be BWV 103, 67 and 115; and student tickets are only $1.50 for any seat in the house.

If you haven't been to an Open Rehearsal of the BSO yet, go Thursday night. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct Beethoven's eighth, Schoenberg's five, Tchaikovsky's third act from Swan Lake and Stravinsky's Renard. 7:30 pm at Symphony Hall but get there early. ■

Thomas conducts

BSO's first 'Renard'

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

An embarrassment of riches is what Michael Tilson Thomas had to offer on his latest Boston Symphony program — Beethoven, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky — but thanks to juxtaposition, choice of selections, and the vitality of his and the orchestra's performances, this was not just another session with master composers of past and present.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony to begin with — a strong, soaring performance in the BSO tradition, with a characteristic electric touch of Thomas. Then a repeat, from last season, of Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, cumulative in their effect as they explored combinations of sounds that still are not common currency.

The Stravinsky choice was "Renard," his 1916 ballet score, which was having its first BSO performances in these weekend concerts. Scored for a chamber orchestra and four singers (two tenors, two basses), it traces as its "banal moral tale" (in the composer's words) the ever-ready susceptibility of a vain and foolish cock to the blandishments of voracious Renard the fox, and the rooster's good fortune in having for friends a cat and a goat who, twice in the nick of time, snatch him from the predator's cluches.

Sung in English (mostly incomprehensible), "Renard" turned out to be neither fur nor fowl in this kind of performance, despite the obvious sense of fun Stravinsky infused into the score, and the possibilities for visual realization it offered. Mr. Thomas had shaped it nicely, the small orchestra played with verve, the singers (Robert Gartside, Alexander Stevenson, Mark Pearson, and Richard Gill) sang, crowed, barked, and bleated (no audible meows) appropriately, and Toni Koves-Steiner starred at the cimbalom. However, in these surroundings and in this concept, "Renard" regrettably finished at the wrong end of the opera-glasses, aurally and visually.

On the other hand, the concluding number, which seemed on paper to be unimaginative programming, turned out to justify itself completely: "Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's 'Swan Lake'" had all the promise of a fugitive from the Pops season. Mr. Thomas approached it with the seriousness and attention that a Tchaikovsky symphony or concerto would elicit, and the result was a stirring performance of wonderfully structured music which usually gets lost in the shuffle as background for dancing. And how often does a ballet company's pit band do this brilliant score the honor it deserves?

In addition to the luscious BSO sound, there were outstanding individual contributions by Armando Ghitalla (trumpet), Ann Hobson and Ralph Gomberg (harp and oboe), Doriot Dwyer (flute), Sherman Walt (bassoon), Harold Wright (clarinet), and above all Joseph Silverstein, whose violin solo iced this sparkling musical confection with the purest spun sugar. In this case, the score set its own stage, and Mr. Thomas's rhythmic feel moved from section to section with choreographic grace and sensitivity. Here was a "Swan Lake" where it was the musicians who were on their toes.

The program will be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening.

Monitor
11-2-'70

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,[illegible] (E) 194,700
(S) [illegible]
OCT 2[illegible] 1970
New England Newsclip
27 1970 at 7:30

VERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Harrison's Canticle No. 3 fine, sometimes surprising

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Lou Harrison, whose Canticle No. 3 Michael Tilson Thomas included on his Boston Symphony program last night walks alone. Now 53, he has composed copiously and idiosyncratically for nearly 40 years, his works defying classification and having relatively little stylistic uniformity among themselves. His teachers were Henry Cowell and Schoenberg, and I imagine that from the one he got his interest in non-Western musics, and from the other his precision of workmanship. He has remarkable gifts as a conductor, and in and out of music, his occupation and concerns have been astonishingly and engagingly diversified.

His Canticle No. 3 must have been startling in 1941 when it was first heard and when its gamelanlike sounds would have been totally unfamiliar to just about everyone in an American audience. By now we have heard dozens, hundreds of pieces with exotic instrumentations, especially ones that aggressively make a point of their delicacy and there is little that is more tiresome. It really says something about the quality of Harrison's work that his Canticle No. 3 sounds so fresh today and makes so delightful an effect.

It is scored for ocarinas (played by Martin Hoherman, the Symphony's assistant principal cellist), guitar, and something like 15 kinds of percussion instruments, including iron pipes (muted), brak- edrums (five out of eight muted), dragons' mouths (temple blocks), Egyptian rattles, and elephant bells in three sizes. The ensemble makes fine and gentle and sometimes surprising sounds, and the music, which lasts a bit under a quarter hour, moves with pleasing variety sometimes involved in ruminations round about tiny phrases, sometimes making percussive, irregular accompaniments to unheard melodies.

It is light in weight: I at least cannot hear what led Virgil Thomson, reviewing it in 1953, to call it "powerful in expression," though "subtle" it is, as he said, and "lovely to listen to." I found its rhythmic looseness refreshing, particularly in the symphony concert context where so much regular and beaty music is served up.

On stage, along with the fine players and their rather jumpy conductor, was an ambulatory television camera-man. His softly irritating presense was the counterpart of that experience we have all had of being kept waiting in a store while the shopkeeper thought it more important to talk on the telephone than to deal with his real flesh-and-blood customers.

Symphony: A Program for All Tastes

By HARRY NEVILLE

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas's program yesterday with the Boston Symphony was exquisitely conceived in every detail. There was something to satisfy nearly every taste — Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Schoenberg, Stravinsky —and each piece was a gem of its kind. (Yes, I do think "Swan Lake" contains some fine music.)

For the most part, the program was exquisitely played, too, and my only real complaint had to do with the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. Most conductors take a serene, genial view of this work. The tempo of the first movement, for example, is generally somewhat slower than what Beethoven indicated, and conductors tend to linger over the opening measures as though they were savoring unusually good wine.

THIS APPROACH can, of course, become maudlin, but when it does work it seems to reveal what the Eighth Symphony is all about. Perhaps it's just a matter of being used to hearing the work played in this way that made Thomas's quite different approach seem wrong. He appears to take a rather severe, uncompromising view of the music. His tempos are literal and there isn't a great deal of flexibility in his phrasing.

The result is that he makes of the Eighth a rather stormy affair, and, if it's to be played that way, then a great deal of care —more than was the case yesterday —should be taken to iron out the problems of articulation and balance in which the score abounds.

SCHOENBERG'S Five Pieces for Orchestra is a carry-over from last season, and its performance yesterday was even more brilliant and expressive than before. Stravinsky's "Renard" likewise got a first-rate reading. The soloists — tenors Robert Gartside and Alexander Stevenson, basses Mark Pearson and Richard Gill — threw themselves into their work with evident relish. Thomas detailed the rhythmic inflections superbly and the whole score came through with great wit and charm.

Although the divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" was listed as a first performance for the Boston Symphony, its inclusion might easily strike one as the epifome of clinche-ridden programming. Let me only say that I would gladly hear any ancient warhorse in the repertory in a performance as fresh and good as this one.

Michael Thomas l Conduct ston Concerts

TON — Michael Tilson s, associate conductor Boston Symphony ra, conducts the fifth Friday-Saturday con- the Boston Symphony ra, Friday, Oct. 30 at and Saturday, Oct. 31 p.m.

half of the program oven's Symphony No. Schoenberg's Five or Orchestra. Follow- mission, Thomas con- avinsky's Renard and sky's Divertissement three of Swan Lake. concert of the Tues- series takes place evening, Oct. 27 at . Thomas conducts uite No. 4, Lou Har- anticle No. 3, Ravel's and Piston's Sym- o. 2. This concert aped as the second ecast concert of the eason and will be WGBH-TV, Channel n, Friday, Oct. 30

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654
OCT 21 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 31 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
OCT 22 1970

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
22 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
OCT 22 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,100
OCT 22 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
OCT 22 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas. Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Oct. 30 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Oct. 31 at 8:30 p.m. The first half of the program is Beethoven's Symphony no. 8 and Schoenberg's Five pieces for Orchestra. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Stravinsky's "Renard" and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act three of "Swan Lake."

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 30 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 31 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 8 in F op. 93*
Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

SCHOENBERG — Five pieces for orchestra op. 16
Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
Vergangenes (The past)
Farben (Chord colors)
Peripetia
Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Renard
ROBERT GARTSIDE, ALEXANDER STEVENSON tenors
MARK PEARSON, RICHARD GILL basses
TONI KOVES-STEINER cimbalom

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TCHAIKOVSKY — Divertissement from Act 3 of 'Swan Lake'
Entrance of the guests and waltz – Entrance of Von Rotbart and Odile – Pas de six (Intrada and variations) – Czardas – Danse éspagnole – Danse napolitaine – Danse russe – Mazurka – Scène (Rejoicing of Siegfried's mother; Waltz of Siegfried and Odile; Siegfried announces his betrothal to Odile; Odette appears at the castle window; Von Rotbart and Odile vanish; Siegfried's departure)

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

A Fresh Look at the BS

By Valerie Restivo

I have always been a little awed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I am new to Massachusetts, and I heard the orchestra for the first time, Tuesday evening. The awe is still there. This might be titled, "A Former Midwesterner's Impressions of a Yankee Institution." The recordings I had heard of the BSO did not, of course, do it justice.

Tuesday's program was nicely balanced and superbly directed by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. The first offering was Bach's Suite No. 4 in D, bright, neat and well-tailored, but not devoid of feeling. Thomas's interpretation furnished substance without sentimentality. The final "Rejouissance" ("Rejoicing") was glorious. As I sat, savoring the experience, I heard a lady nearby remark that "that was tiresome — one of the most tiresome pieces I think I've ever heard . . . he did work awfully hard at it." The orchestral suites are pompous, it's true . . . but such magnificent pomposity!

Albert Schweitzer called the orchestral suites "the ideal musical picture of the rococo period." The audience was polite, but not overwhelmed by that musical picture.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 followed. Written in 1943, the symphony is a blending of Piston's dual Yankee-Ita original career gressed to the c often pictorial draftsmanship, ted.

Simplicity ch Symphony. The carefully develc stated but not overstated. The main theme, which has been placed in "a sort of Dorian mode," follows through to the final movement. Bel canto cellos and basses sing the opening of the Moderato. The plaintive, cantabile sound moves quickly to a wild-west syncopation of brass and percussion. It's all very American; then the opening song returns. The symphony is more synthesis than contrast, more romantic than experimental.

The Adagio is Piston at his most romantic. Lush orchestration enriches the imagery; the composer is more painter than draughtsman here.

The Allegro is crisper, often brash. There is some of the oom-pah sound of public park bands; a bit of satire, perhaps, some buffoonery before the return to the nostalgic opening song.

It is a beautiful, uncomplicated work, that lends itself to repeated but casual listening. The lady nearby said it was "disconnected," a response that baffled me.

The second half of the program gan with William Schuman's Violin oncerto. Although the conductor nphasized textural and dynamic ntrasts, I found the piece rather dantic. Soloist Paul Zukofsky handed the difficult work with admirable ill. But skill was not enough to stain my interest in the concerto.

William Schuman has been called "the most powerful man in American musical life." His innovativeness as composer, as mentor of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, his work at Juillard and elsewhere are well known. If either his power or his stature as a composer were judged solely by the violin concerto, I doubt that William Schuman would make the mark.

In the first part of the opening Allegro Risoluto section the entire orchestra is used like a single, massive percussion instrument — then there is the surprise of rich, nearly traditional harmonies. One of the high points of the performance was Paul Zukofsky's flawless rendering of the cadenza that ends the first movement. The passage for trombones and violin combines comedy with dramatic intensity, for a fascinating effect.

The second movement contains some characteristic writing for brass and percussion, with an opportunity to demonstrate tympanist Everett Firth's virtuosity. The last section would be good background for a super, old-fashioned, Cecil B. De Mille-type spectacular, with a melodramatic, much-ado-about-too-little Hollywood finale. The audience seemed more pleased than I was; applause was warm.

The final selection turned a pleasant evening into an event. "La Valse" holds a very special place in Ravel literature. Immersed in death and destruction, surrounded by the horror of World War I, Ravel's sole composition offered homage to the dead. From the start of the war until 1920, he had composed only "Le Tombeau de Couperin." Then he created "La Valse." The title is both literal and ironic. Conceived as homage to another composer, Johann Strauss, the piece is at the same time charming and grotesque. Ravel often dealt in contradictions; "La Valse" relies on them for its very existence.

It is La Grande Valse pushed to the brink of madness. The conductor and the orchestra gave it an inspired performance. Thomas nearly flew with the dance as it built, from themes and tempi that might have been written by Strauss himself, to chaos, to madness. I could almost hear an old radio playing the aristocratic waltzes, while a more contemporary orchestra gave the truer story: military drumbeats, soft and ominous, death and devastation, a rough, ungraceful, even cruel superimposition of conflicting views of reality.

"LaValse" reminds me of Katharine Anne Porter's novel, "Ship of Fools," in which the dreams and fantasies of a doomed society are played out against a background of the impending Second World War.

No longer merely a "former Midwesterner," I now feel on the brink of Bostonian loyalty to the BSO. Michael Tilson Thomas is a delight to watch, and his results are impeccable.

* * *

The Cantata Singers, conducted by John Harbison, will sing three Bach cantatas Wednesday night, October 28, at 8:30 in Sanders. Last year this small, excellent chorus gave some of the best concerts around, especially if you like cantatas. These will be BWV 103, 67 and 115; and student tickets are only $1.50 for any seat in the house.

If you haven't been to an Open Rehearsal of the BSO yet, go Thursday night. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct Beethoven's eighth, Schoenberg's five, Tchaikovsky's third act from Swan Lake and Stravinsky's Renard. 7:30 pm at Symphony Hall but get there early. ■

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,001
OCT 8 1970

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000
OCT 27 1970

Thomas conducts

BSO's first 'Renard'

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

An embarrassment of riches is what Michael Tilson Thomas had to offer on his latest Boston Symphony program — Beethoven, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky — but thanks to juxtaposition, choice of selections, and the vitality of his and the orchestra's performances, this was not just another session with master composers of past and present.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony to begin with — a strong, soaring performance in the BSO tradition, with a characteristic electric touch of Thomas. Then a repeat, from last season, of Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, cumulative in their effect as they explored combinations of sounds that still are not common currency.

The Stravinsky choice was "Renard," his 1916 ballet score, which was having its first BSO performances in these weekend concerts. Scored for a chamber orchestra and four singers (two tenors, two basses), it traces as its "banal moral tale" (in the composer's words) the ever-ready susceptibility of a vain and foolish cock to the blandishments of voracious Renard the fox, and the rooster's good fortune in having for friends a cat and a goat who, twice in the nick of time, snatch him from the predator's cluches.

Sung in English (mostly incomprehensible), "Renard" turned out to be neither fur nor fowl in this kind of performance, despite the obvious sense of fun Stravinsky infused into the score, and the possibilities for visual realization it offered. Mr. Thomas had shaped it nicely, the small orchestra played with verve, the singers (Robert Gartside, Alexander Stevenson, Mark Pearson, and Richard Gill) sang, crowed, barked, and bleated (no audible meows) appropriately, and Toni Koves-Steiner starred at the cimbalom. However, in these surroundings and in this concept, "Renard" regrettably finished at the wrong end of the opera-glasses, aurally and visually.

On the other hand, the concluding number, which seemed on paper to be unimaginative programming, turned out to justify itself completely: "Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's 'Swan Lake'" had all the promise of a fugitive from the Pops season. Mr. Thomas approached it with the seriousness and attention that a Tchaikovsky symphony or concerto would elicit, and the result was a stirring performance of wonderfully structured music which usually gets lost in the shuffle as background for dancing. And how often does a ballet company's pit band do this brilliant score the honor it deserves?

In addition to the luscious BSO sound, there were outstanding individual contributions by Armando Ghitalla (trumpet), Ann Hobson and Ralph Gomberg (harp and oboe), Doriot Dwyer (flute), Sherman Walt (bassoon), Harold Wright (clarinet), and above all Joseph Silverstein, whose violin solo iced this sparkling musical confection with the purest spun sugar. In this case, the score set its own stage, and Mr. Thomas's rhythmic feel moved from section to section with choreographic grace and sensitivity. Here was a "Swan Lake" where it was the musicians who were on their toes.

The program will be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening.

Monitor
11-2-'70

:TIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

y evening October 27 1970 at 7.30

AEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HARRISON

ssion

N

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 70,000

NOV 8 1970

A note on Lou Harrison's 'Canticle No. 2'

At the Boston Symphony concert of Oct. 26, I was pleasantly surprised by the appealing quality of Lou Harrison's brief little work, "Canticle No. 2," scored for only seven instruments — a guitar, an ocarina, and five percussionists. Harrison is little played today — and the loss is ours.

Born in 1917, Harrison is a well-trained musician, having studied composition with Henry Cowell and Arnold Schoenberg. He has written symphonies, concertos, string quartets and several masses. In his music, there is a deeply serious, semi-mystical vein. I would say that in his experimentation, he stands about midway between Edgar Varese and John Cage, sharing the former's interest in exploring the resources of pure percussion and the latter's penchant for subtle and distinctive quasi-Oriental sonorities.

Both these interests are evident in "Canticle No. 2." There are ocarina and guitar melodies that are certainly Eastern in sound; the use of a variety of bells and a remarkable paraphernalia of percussion instruments is intended to make us realize that an orchestral percussion section is capable of unusual and good-to-listen to work. In any event, I found listening to this short composition a decided pleasure.

Harrison, incidentally, whose recent work has been, for the most part, utilizing the 12-tone technique, is also an accomplished writer on music. In fact, he once served on the staff of the now defunct New York Herald-Tribune.

Moderato
Adagio
Allegro

Symphony: A Program for All Tastes

By HARRY NEVILLE

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas's program yesterday with the Boston Symphony was exquisitely conceived in every detail. There was something to satisfy nearly every taste — Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Schoenberg, Stravinsky —and each piece was a gem of its kind. (Yes, I do think "Swan Lake" contains some fine music.)

For the most part, the program was exquisitely played, too, and my only real complaint had to do with the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. Most conductors take a serene, genial view of this work. The tempo of the first movement, for example, is generally somewhat slower than what Beethoven indicated, and conductors tend to linger over the opening measures as though they were savoring unusually good wine.

THIS APPROACH can, of course, become maudlin, but when it does work it seems to reveal what the Eighth Symphony is all about. Perhaps it's just a matter of being used to hearing the work played in this way that made Thomas's quite different approach seem wrong. He appears to take a rather severe, uncompromising view of the music. His tempos are literal and there isn't a great deal of flexibility in his phrasing.

The result is that he makes of the Eighth a rather stormy affair, and, if it's to be played that way then a great deal of care —more than was the case yesterday —should be taken to iron out the problems of articulation and balance in which the score abounds.

SCHOENBERG'S Five Pieces for Orchestra is a carry-over from last season, and its performance yesterday was even more brilliant and expressive than before. Stravinsky's "Renard" likewise got a first-rate reading. The soloists — tenors Robert Gartside and Alexander Stevenson, basses Mark Pearson and Richard Gill — threw themselves into their work with evident relish. Thomas detailed the rhythmic inflections superbly and the whole score came through with great wit and charm.

Although the divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" was listed as a first performance for the Boston Symphony, its inclusion might easily strike one as the epitome of clinche-ridden programming. Let me only say that I would gladly hear any ancient warhorse in the repertory in a performance as fresh and good as this one.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

OCT 21 1970

Michael Thomas Will Conduct Boston Concerts

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fifth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday, Oct. 30 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Oct. 31 at 8:30 p.m.

First half of the program is Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Stravinsky's Renard and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from act three of Swan Lake.

Second concert of the Tuesday B series takes place Tuesday evening, Oct. 27 at 7:30 p.m. Thomas conducts Bach's Suite No. 4, Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3, Ravel's La valse and Piston's Symphony No. 2. This concert will be taped as the second color telecast concert of the 1970-71 season and will be seen on WGBH-TV, Channel 2, Boston, Friday, Oct. 30 at 9 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 31 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

OCT 22 1970
MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

22 1970
CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,300

OCT 22 1970 OCT 22 1970 OCT 22 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Oct. 30 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Oct. 31 at 8:30 p.m. The first half of the program is Beethoven's Symphony no. 8 and Schoenberg's Five pieces for Orchestra. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Stravinsky's "Renard" and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act three of "Swan Lake."

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon October 30 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 31 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 8 in F op. 93*
Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

SCHOENBERG — Five pieces for orchestra op. 16
Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
Vergangenes (The past)
Farben (Chord colors)
Peripetia
Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Renard
ROBERT GARTSIDE, ALEXANDER STEVENSON tenors
MARK PEARSON, RICHARD GILL basses
TONI KOVES-STEINER cimbalom

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TCHAIKOVSKY — Divertissement from Act 3 of 'Swan Lake'
Entrance of the guests and waltz – Entrance of Von Rotbart and Odile – Pas de six (Intrada and variations) – Czardas – Danse éspagnole – Danse napolitaine – Danse russe – Mazurka – Scène (Rejoicing of Siegfried's mother; Waltz of Siegfried and Odile; Siegfried announces his betrothal to Odile; Odette appears at the castle window; Von Rotbart and Odile vanish; Siegfried's departure)

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

A Fresh Look at the BSO

By Valerie Restivo

I have always been a little awed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I am new to ~~Massachusetts, and I~~ heard the orchestra for the first time, Tuesday evening. The awe is still there. This might be titled, "A Former Midwesterner's Impressions of a Yankee Institution." The recordings I had heard of the BSO did not, of course, do it justice.

Tuesday's program was nicely balanced and superbly directed by Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. The first offering was Bach's Suite No. 4 in D, bright, neat and well-tailored, but not devoid of feeling. Thomas's interpretation furnished substance without sentimentality. The final "Rejouissance" ("Rejoicing") was glorious. As I sat, savoring the experience, I heard a lady nearby remark that "that was tiresome — one of the most tiresome pieces I think I've ever heard . . . he did work awfully hard at it." The orchestral suites are pompous, it's true . . . but such magnificent pomposity!

Albert Schweitzer called the orchestral suites "the ideal musical picture of the rococo period." The audience was polite, but not overwhelmed by that musical picture.

Walter Piston's Symphony No. 2 followed. Written in 1943, the symphony is a blending of Piston's dual Yankee-Italian heritage. From his original career as draftsman, he progressed to the creation of music that is often pictorial and, true to his draftsmanship, always well constructed.

Simplicity characterizes the Second Symphony. The three movements are carefully developed; themes are restated but not overstated. The main theme, which has been placed in "a sort of Dorian mode," follows through to the final movement. Bel canto cellos and basses sing the opening of the Moderato. The plaintive, cantabile sound moves quickly to a wild-west syncopation of brass and percussion. It's all very American; then the opening song returns. The symphony is more synthesis than contrast, more romantic than experimental.

The Adagio is Piston at his most romantic. Lush orchestration enriches the imagery; the composer is more painter than draughtsman here.

The Allegro is crisper, often brash. There is some of the oom-pah sound of public park bands; a bit of satire, perhaps, some buffoonery before the return to the nostalgic opening song.

It is a beautiful, uncomplicated work, that lends itself to repeated but casual listening. The lady nearby said it was "disconnected," a response that baffled me.

The second half of the program began with William Schuman's Violin Concerto. Although the conductor emphasized textural and dynamic contrasts, I found the piece rather pedantic. Soloist Paul Zukofsky handled the difficult work with admirable skill. But skill was not enough to sustain my interest in the concerto.

William Schuman has been called "the most powerful man in American musical life." His innovativeness as composer, as mentor of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, his work at Juillard and elsewhere are well known. If either his power or his stature as a composer were judged solely by the violin concerto, I doubt that William Schuman would make the mark.

In the first part of the opening Allegro Risoluto section the entire orchestra is used like a single, massive percussion instrument — then there is the surprise of rich, nearly traditional harmonies. One of the high points of the performance was Paul Zukofsky's flawless rendering of the cadenza that ends the first movement. The passage for trombones and violin combines comedy with dramatic intensity, for a fascinating effect.

The second movement contains some characteristic writing for brass and percussion, with an opportunity to demonstrate tympanist Everett Firth's virtuosity. The last section would be good background for a super, old-fashioned, Cecil B. De Mille-type spectacular, with a melodramatic, much-ado-about-too-little Hollywood finale. The audience seemed more pleased than I was; applause was warm.

The final selection turned a pleasant evening into an event. "La Valse" holds a very special place in Ravel literature. Immersed in death and destruction, surrounded by the horror of World War I, Ravel's sole composition offered homage to the dead. From the start of the war until 1920, he had composed only "Le Tombeau de Couperin." Then he created "La Valse." The title is both literal and ironic. Conceived as homage to another composer, Johann Strauss, the piece is at the same time charming and grotesque. Ravel often dealt in contradictions; "La Valse" relies on them for its very existence.

It is La Grande Valse pushed to the brink of madness. The conductor and the orchestra gave it an inspired performance. Thomas nearly flew with the dance as it built, from themes and tempi that might have been written by Strauss himself, to chaos, to madness. I could almost hear an old radio playing the aristocratic waltzes, while a more contemporary orchestra gave the truer story: military drumbeats, soft and ominous, death and devastation, a rough, ungraceful, even cruel superimposition of conflicting views of reality.

"LaValse" reminds me of Katharine Anne Porter's novel, "Ship of Fools," in which the dreams and fantasies of a doomed society are played out against a background of the impending Second World War.

No longer merely a "former Midwesterner," I now feel on the brink of Bostonian loyalty to the BSO. Michael Tilson Thomas is a delight to watch, and his results are impeccable.

* * *

The Cantata Singers, conducted by John Harbison, will sing three Bach cantatas Wednesday night, October 28, at 8:30 in Sanders. Last year this small, excellent chorus gave some of the best concerts around, especially if you like cantatas. These will be BWV 103, 67 and 115; and student tickets are only $1.50 for any seat in the house.

If you haven't been to an Open Rehearsal of the BSO yet, go Thursday night. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct Beethoven's eighth, Schoenberg's five, Tchaikovsky's third act from Swan Lake and Stravinsky's Renard. 7:30 pm at Symphony Hall but get there early. ■

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,001

OCT 8 1970

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000

OCT 27 1970

Thomas conducts

BSO's first 'Renard'

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

An embarrassment of riches is what Michael Tilson Thomas had to offer on his latest Boston Symphony program — Beethoven, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky — but thanks to juxtaposition, choice of selections, and the vitality of his and the orchestra's performances, this was not just another session with master composers of past and present.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony to begin with — a strong, soaring performance in the BSO tradition, with a characteristic electric touch of Thomas. Then a repeat, from last season, of Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, cumulative in their effect as they explored combinations of sounds that still are not common currency.

The Stravinsky choice was "Renard," his 1916 ballet score, which was having its first BSO performances in these weekend concerts. Scored for a chamber orchestra and four singers (two tenors, two basses), it traces as its "banal moral tale" (in the composer's words) the ever-ready susceptibility of a vain and foolish cock to the blandishments of voracious Renard the fox, and the rooster's good fortune in having for friends a cat and a goat who, twice in the nick of time, snatch him from the predator's cluches.

Sung in English (mostly incomprehensible), "Renard" turned out to be neither fur nor fowl in this kind of performance, despite the obvious sense of fun Stravinsky infused into the score, and the possibilities for visual realization it offered. Mr. Thomas had shaped it nicely, the small orchestra played with verve, the singers (Robert Gartside, Alexander Stevenson, Mark Pearson, and Richard Gill) sang, crowed, barked, and bleated (no audible meows) appropriately, and Toni Koves-Steiner starred at the cimbalom. However, in these surroundings and in this concept, "Renard" regrettably finished at the wrong end of the opera-glasses, aurally and visually.

On the other hand, the concluding number, which seemed on paper to be unimaginative programming, turned out to justify itself completely: "Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's 'Swan Lake' " had all the promise of a fugitive from the Pops season. Mr. Thomas approached it with the seriousness and attention that a Tchaikovsky symphony or concerto would elicit, and the result was a stirring performance of wonderfully structured music which usually gets lost in the shuffle as background for dancing. And how often does a ballet company's pit band do this brilliant score the honor it deserves?

In addition to the luscious BSO sound, there were outstanding individual contributions by Armando Ghitalla (trumpet), Ann Hobson and Ralph Gomberg (harp and oboe), Doriot Dwyer (flute), Sherman Walt (bassoon), Harold Wright (clarinet), and above all Joseph Silverstein, whose violin solo iced this sparkling musical confection with the purest spun sugar. In this case, the score set its own stage, and Mr. Thomas's rhythmic feel moved from section to section with choreographic grace and sensitivity. Here was a "Swan Lake" where it was the musicians who were on their toes.

The program will be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening.

Monitor
11-2-'70

10.

BSO: an odd program, it worked well

By Michael Steinberg

Globe Staff

The program Michael Tilson Thomas thought up for the programs which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last weekend and repeated Tuesday evening must have struck lots of people as odd on paper: Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16; Stravinsky's "Renard," and most of the music for the third act of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

In practice, with its audacious juxtapositions and contrasts, and with its revealing and witty bridges, it worked marvelously.

At Tuesday's concert, the idea lost some of its punch because the Beethoven, coming out so stiff and being so brutally played, was anything other than inviting or stimulating. Still, much of what happened during the evening was remarkable, and nothing more so than the extraordinary performance of Schoenberg's powerfully evocative early masterpiece. That, I should guess, is where most of the rehearsal time went, and of course the orchestra had played the work under Thomas as recently as eight months ago.

The performance Tuesday was confident and virtuosic, close to exemplary in its clarity, and marvelous in its hold on Schoenberg's expressive content. I have heard Boulez get the textures cleaned up as impressively and I have heard performances under those conductors who live where this music lives and who have conveyed something of its intensity. I have heard no performance in which both aspects were brought out as well as by Thomas and the Boston Symphony Tuesday. It was also a useful reminder that when it comes to putting in the expression, getting the notes right is quite a help.

Stravinsky's "Renard" has engaging music, a preview of the language of "Les Noces." It is a tiny, rather sadistic show about the besting, in fact the strangling, of Renard the Fox by a cock, a cat, and a goat, and it did not work all the way Tuesday because it really wants a stage to live on, or at least a more complete and consistent intelligibility of the words.

No text was printed in the program, only a brief synopsis, and the combination of the hall's reverberant, word-swallowing acoustics, and a stilted English translation, was no help to an able quartet of singer, Rober Gartside and Alexander Stevenson, tenors, Mark Pearson and Richard Gill, basses.

Gartside and Gill were especially amusing, and there was snappy playing by a small ensemble that included Toni Kovesteiner as guest virtuosa on the cimbalom.

Much of "Swan Lake" tended to be rough and loud, with the tunes mostly better tended than their basses. Thomas's dramatic flair is considerable, though, and right in place in that music. Then, the pit orchestras from which one most often hears Tchaikovsky's ballet scores don't have concertmasters like Joseph Silverstein, trumpters like Armando Ghitalla, or clarinetists like Harold Wright; also passages like Rotbart's entrance or the peppery Czardas clearly showed the pleasures to be derived from hearing that beautifully made music played by a first-rate orchestra under a conductor of uncommon vitality.

In memory of Cardinal Cushing, Tuesday's concert began with the Entombment music from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

Boston Globe 11-4-'70

Hub Symphony review delayed

Music critic Michael Steinberg is in Washington attending the 14th Festival of Chamber Music at the Library of Congress, sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and commemorating the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation. He will review this weekend's Boston Symphony program when it is repeated Tuesday evening, Nov. 3.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 31 1970

Thomas Leads
Varied Boston Symphony Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Conducting the October 31 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Michael Tilson played a program including Beethoven No. 8, Schoenberg Five Pieces, Stravinsky Renard and Tschaikovsky Divertissement from Act 3 of Swan Lake.

The Eighth: pure joy (from a sad time in Beethoven's life) with no barnacled tradition of interpretation — continuity always, interplay and surprise as in the score. Lyrical fun and sentiment over the metronome (an invention the composer hailed, but made clumsy use of). The excitement of fugato even at the end of the Menuetto. Abrupt modulations, like Schuberts, that tickle the stomach. And always a pacing to let the music breathe.

Like Opus 18 among the quartets, No. 8 is not lesser Beethoven though less grandly fateful and Thomas elicited all its kinetic complexity.

Schoenberg: amazing frenzy (Premonitions), lovely dream of color (the Past and Chordcolors), a tearing of the veil (Peripetia) a dark, heavier, more dramatic finale. For an early try at full orchestra Schoenberg — atonal, but not yet serial in language—shows amazing grasp of instrumental resource, especially in fracturing a melodic line into stained glass colors. His relation to the French and his own country programmers (Strauss) is all there along with his so-original hyper concentration.

Renard—small baroque orchestra, sparks from the cimbalon (I used to hear the hammer-harp in N.Y. Hungarian restaurants with gypsy violin) each instrument sounding in its own clear space and asserting the satire of carnival. The two tenors and two basses were excellent in voice and character, especially Robert Garside (only a few years out of Harvard Glee Club).

Tchaikovsky: frankly diversion, corny and artful, with a few lovely folkish melodies and many turgid climaxes. The orchestra played it without condescension — with wit, sentiment and excitement.

Cantata Singers

Last Wednesday, in Sanders, the Cantata Singers came of age in presenting three Bach Cantatas with moving distinction. The small chorus is of professional caliber (the soloists are imbedded in it). Harbison's definition as a conductor equals his scholarship. A figure of elegance, he achieves an elegant sound without thrashing — what's even more important, an expressive sound, subtly projected from scores understood and sympathized with.

The instrumentalists are of the best chamber music freewheelers in the area. Soloists not perfect, but intelligent and stylish (the contralto, thrilling in her uppers, fades out with a mouthful of hot potato down there where the cello sings), soprano and tenor remarkable —clean tone, easy range, expressive phrase.

Harbison—scholar, composer and active musician—compares with young Thomas. With both, there is the knowledge and sensitivity to find feeling in form with tempos and dynamics that set the musical ideas free and release in us unsuspected realms of experience.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 5 1970

Herald Traveler (Boston)
November 7, 1970

Seiji Ozawa Conducting BSO for Two Weeks

By HARRY NEVILLE

Seiji Ozawa began a two-week guest conducting stint with the Boston Symphony Thursday night with a program of Debussy, Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky which was repeated yesterday and will be heard again tonight.

Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood, has by now had considerable experience with the orchestra, one of the benefits of which is a rapport that makes the players usually responsive to his direction.

This seems to have had an effect on Ozawa's podium manner, which on Thursday was gentler and more restrained than on many previous occasions. In both Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony the orchestra responded with playing that was notable for its carefully wrought details and unlabored eloquence. The elegiac qualities of the Tchaikovsky emerged particularly well from this reposeful approach.

Maurizio Pollini, winner of the 1960 Warsaw International Choplin Competition, is making his Boston Symphony debut at this series of concerts. His vehicle is the Prokofiev Third Piano Concerto and his rousing performance makes one regret that he did no appear earlier. His technique is more than equal to the work's bristling executant demands. In fact his ease suggests that he holds a great deal in reserve — which is perhaps the mark of the true virtuoso — and yet there is nothing facile in his playing. All in all, a splendid performance.

Ozawa conducts Symphony Concerts

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducts the sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Nov. 6 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 7 at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Maurizio Pollini makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. The program includes Debussey's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun. Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Pollini as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6.

Maurizio Pollini won first prize in the Warsaw Chopin Competition at age 18. Since then he has played with leading Eorchestras of Europe, including those in France, England, the USSR, Scandanavia, Germany and in his native Italy. He has recently performed with the Israel Philharmonic under Claudio Abbado, and in this country, with the Detroit and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras, the Los Angeles and New York Philharmonics and the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

Tuesday, Nov. 3 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the third concert of the Tuesday "A" series. The program includes Beethoven's Symphony no. 8, Schoenberg's Five pieces for orchestra, Stravinsky's Renard, and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act III of Swan Lake.

Thursday, Nov. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of the Thursday "A" series with Maurizio Pollini as piano soloist. The program is Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun. Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Pollini as soloist and Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
OCT 29 1970

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
OCT 29 1970

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
OCT 29 1970

BSO On Channel 2

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 13 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44, and simultaneously in stereo on WGBH-FM. With him is the talented young Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini. Program includes "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Fawn" by Debussy, Piano Concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev and Symphony No. 6 by Tchaikovsky.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 22 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
OCT 29 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
OCT 29 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducts the sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Nov. 6 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 7 at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Maurizio Pollini makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. The program includes Debussy's "Prelude to the afternoon of a faun," Prokofiev's "Piano concerto no. 3" with Mr. Pollini as soloist, and "Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6."

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
OCT 29 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
OCT 29 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
OCT 29 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening November 5 1970 at 8.30
Friday afternoon November 6 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 7 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 10 1970 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

DEBUSSY — Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, after the eclogue of Stéphane Mallarmé*

PROKOFIEV — Piano concerto no. 3 in C op. 26*
- Andante – allegro
- Theme and variations
- Finale: allegro ma non troppo

MAURIZIO POLLINI

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 'Pathétique'*
- Adagio – allegro non troppo
- Allegro con grazia
- Allegro molto vivace
- Finale: adagio lamentoso

Maurizio Pollini plays the Steinway piano

Friday's concert will end about 3.50; Thursday's, Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.20

Tuesday evening's concert is being recorded for future telecast by WGBH (Channel 2)

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has appeared with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, Boston and New York on many occasions since. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting. He went to Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Competition of conductors at Besançon; one of the judges was Charles Munch, who invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The following year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. Appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors in 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same summer, he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Japanese Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and America with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London Symphony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philadelphia, Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his post as Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and devoted last season to guest conducting. During the summer of 1969 he conducted opera for the first time, Così fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal guest conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He opened the 1969-1970 season of the New York Philharmonic, and later was guest conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He has recently returned from his second series of appearances at Salzburg. Seiji Ozawa became Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony this fall. He has made many recordings for RCA and Angel.

THE SOLOIST

MAURIZIO POLLINI makes his debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born in Milan twenty-eight years ago, he won first prize in the Warsaw Chopin Competition when he was 18. This success led to appearances with the leading orchestras of Europe, including those in France, England, the USSR, Scandinavia, Germany, and in his native Italy. In Torino he gave the Italian première of Boulez's Sonata, which he played again in the May Festival of Florence. More recently he has appeared in Israel, where he performed with the Israel Philharmonic under Claudio Abbado's direction, the Prague Festival, with the Czech Philharmonic led by Karel Ancerl, and in the 1968-1969 season, the opening performance of the Hamburg Philharmonic directed by Wolfgang Sawallisch. In the United States, Maurizio Pollini appeared in 1969 with the Chicago Symphony and Seiji Ozawa at the Ravinia Festival, with the Detroit Symphony, and last season played for the first time with the New York Philharmonic, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. He has recorded for the Seraphim label.

10.

BSO: an odd program, it worked well

By Michael Steinberg

Globe Staff

The program Michael Tilson Thomas thought up for the programs which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last weekend and repeated Tuesday evening must have struck lots of people as odd on paper: Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16; Stravinsky's "Renard," and most of the music for the third act of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

In practice, with its audacious juxtapositions and contrasts, and with its revealing and witty bridges, it worked marvelously.

At Tuesday's concert, the idea lost some of its punch because the Beethoven, coming out so stiff and being so brutally played, was anything other than inviting or stimulating. Still, much of what happened during the evening was remarkable, and nothing more so than the extraordinary performance of Schoenberg's powerfully evocative early masterpiece. That, I should guess, is where most of the rehearsal time went, and of course the orchestra had played the work under Thomas as recently as eight months ago.

The performance Tuesday was confident and virtuosic, close to exemplary in its clarity, and marvelous in its hold on Schoenberg's expressive content. I have heard Boulez get the textures cleaned up as impressively and I have heard performances under those conductors who live where this music lives and who have conveyed something of its intensity. I have heard no performance in which both aspects were brought out as well as by Thomas and the Boston Symphony Tuesday. It was also a useful reminder that when it comes to putting in the expression, getting the notes right is quite a help.

Stravinsky's "Renard" has engaging music, a preview of the language of "Les Noces." It is a tiny, rather sadistic show about the besting, in fact the strangling, of Renard the Fox by a cock, a cat, and a goat, and it did not work all the way Tuesday because it really wants a stage to live on, or at least a more complete and consistent intelligibility of the words.

No text was printed in the program, only a brief synopsis, and the combination of the hall's reverberant, word-swallowing acoustics, and a stilted English translation, was no help to an able quartet of singer, Rober Gartside and Alexander Stevenson, tenors, Mark Pearson and Richard Gill, basses.

Gartside and Gill were especially amusing, and there was snappy playing by a small ensemble that included Toni Kovessteiner as guest virtuosa on the cimbalom.

Much of "Swan Lake" tended to be rough and loud, with the tunes mostly better tended than their basses. Thomas's dramatic flair is considerable, though, and right in place in that music. Then, the pit orchestras from which one most often hears Tchaikovsky's ballet scores don't have concertmasters like Joseph Silverstein, trumpters like Armando Ghitalla, or clarinetists like Harold Wright; also passages like Rotbart's entrance or the peppery Czardas clearly showed the pleasures to be derived from hearing that beautifully made music played by a first-rate orchestra under a conductor of uncommon vitality.

In memory of Cardinal Cushing, Tuesday's concert began with the Entombment music from Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

Boston Globe 11-4-'70

Hub Symphony review delayed

Music critic Michael Steinberg is in Washington attending the 14th Festival of Chamber Music at the Library of Congress, sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and commemorating the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation. He will review this weekend's Boston Symphony program when it is repeated Tuesday evening, Nov. 3.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 31 1970

Thomas Leads Varied Boston Symphony Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Conducting the October 31 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Michael Tilson played a program including Beethoven No. 8, Schoenberg Five Pieces, Stravinsky Renard and Tschaikovsky Divertissement from Act 3 of Swan Lake.

The Eighth: pure joy (from a sad time in Beethoven's life) with no barnacled tradition of interpretation — continuity always, interplay and surprise as in the score. Lyrical fun and sentiment over the metronome (an invention the composer hailed, but made clumsy use of). The excitement of fugato even at the end of the Menuetto. Abrupt modulations, like Schuberts, that tickle the stomach. And always a pacing to let the music breathe.

Like Opus 18 among the quartets, No. 8 is not lesser Beethoven though less grandly fateful and Thomas elicited all its kinetic complexity.

Schoenberg: amazing frenzy (Premonitions), lovely dream of color (the Past and Chord-colors), a tearing of the veil (Peripetia) a dark, heavier, more dramatic finale. For an early try at full orchestra Schoenberg — atonal, but not yet serial in language—shows amazing grasp of instrumental resource, especially in fracturing a melodic line into stained glass colors. His relation to the French and his own country programmers (Strauss) is all there along with his so-original hyper concentration.

Renard—small baroque orchestra, sparks from the cimbalon (I used to hear the hammer-harp in N.Y. Hungarian restaurants with gypsy violin) each instrument sounding in its own clear space and asserting the satire of carnival. The two tenors and two basses were excellent in voice and character, especially Robert Garside (only a few years out of Harvard Glee Club).

Tchaikovsky: frankly diversion, corny and artful, with a few lovely folkish melodies and many turgid climaxes. The orchestra played it without condescension — with wit, sentiment and excitement.

Cantata Singers

Last Wednesday, in Sanders, the Cantata Singers came of age in presenting three Bach Cantatas with moving distinction. The small chorus is of professional caliber (the soloists are imbedded in it). Harbison's definition as a conductor equals his scholarship. A figure of elegance, he achieves an elegant sound without thrashing — what's even more important, an expressive sound, subtly projected from scores understood and sympathized with.

The instrumentalists are of the best chamber music freewheelers in the area. Soloists not perfect, but intelligent and stylish (the contralto, thrilling in her uppers, fades out with a mouthful of hot potato down there where the cello sings), soprano and tenor remarkable —clean tone, easy range, expressive phrase.

Harbison—scholar, composer and active musician—compares with young Thomas. With both, there is the knowledge and sensitivity to find feeling in form with tempos and dynamics that set the musical ideas free and release in us unsuspected realms of experience.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 5 1970

Herald Traveler (Boston)
November 7, 1970

Seiji Ozawa Conducting BSO for Two Weeks

By HARRY NEVILLE

Seiji Ozawa began a two-week guest conducting stint with the Boston Symphony Thursday night with a program of Debussy, Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky which was repeated yesterday and will be heard again tonight.

Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood, has by now had considerable experience with the orchestra, one of the benefits of which is a rapport that makes the players usually responsive to his direction.

This seems to have had an effect on Ozawa's podium manner, which on Thursday was gentler and more restrained than on many previous occasions. In both Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony the orchestra responded with playing that was notable for its carefully wrought details and unlabored eloquence. The elegiac qualities of the Tchaikovsky emerged particularly well from this reposeful approach.

Maurizio Pollini, winner of the 1960 Warsaw International Choplin Competition, is making his Boston Symphony debut at this series of concerts. His vehicle is the Prokofiev Third Piano Concerto and his rousing performance makes one regret that he did no appear earlier. His technique is more than equal to the work's bristling executant demands. In fact his ease suggests that he holds a great deal in reserve — which is perhaps the mark of the true virtuoso — and yet there is nothing facile in his playing. All in all, a splendid performance.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

OCT 29

Ozawa conducts Symphony Concerts

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducts the sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Nov. 6 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 7 at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Maurizio Pollini makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. The program includes Debussey's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Pollini as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6.

Maurizio Pollini won first prize in the Warsaw Chopin Competition at age 18. Since then he has played with leading orchestras of Europe, including those in France, England, the USSR, Scandanavia, Germany and in his native Italy. He has recently performed with the Israel Philharmonic under Claudio Abbado, and in this country, with the Detroit and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras, the Los Angeles and New York Philharmonics and the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

Tuesday, Nov. 3 at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the third concert of the Tuesday "A" series. The program includes Beethoven's Symphony no. 8, Schoenberg's Five pieces for orchestra, Stravinsky's Renard, and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act III of Swan Lake.

Thursday, Nov. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of the Thursday "A" series with Maurizio Pollini as piano soloist. The program is Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Pollini as soloist and Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

OCT 29 1970

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

OCT 29 1970

BSO On Channel 2

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 13 at 9 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44, and simultaneously in stereo on WGBH-FM. With him is the talented young Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini. Program includes "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Fawn" by Debussy, Piano Concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev and Symphony No. 6 by Tchaikovsky.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 22 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

OCT 29 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

OCT 29 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducts the sixth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon, Nov. 6 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 7 at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Maurizio Pollini makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. The program includes Debussy's "Prelude to the afternoon of a faun," Prokofiev's "Piano concerto no. 3" with Mr. Pollini as soloist, and "Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 6."

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975

OCT 29 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

OCT 29 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

OCT 29 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening November 5 1970 at 8.30
Friday afternoon November 6 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 7 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 10 1970 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

DEBUSSY — Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, after the eclogue of Stéphane Mallarmé*

PROKOFIEV — Piano concerto no. 3 in C op. 26*
Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo
MAURIZIO POLLINI

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 'Pathétique'*
Adagio – allegro non troppo
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: adagio lamentoso

Maurizio Pollini plays the Steinway piano

Friday's concert will end about 3.50; Thursday's, Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.20

Tuesday evening's concert is being recorded for future telecast by WGBH (Channel 2)

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has appeared with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, Boston and New York on many occasions since. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting. He went to Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Competition of conductors at Besançon; one of the judges was Charles Munch, who invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The following year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. Appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors in 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same summer, he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Japanese Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and America with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London Symphony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philadelphia, Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his post as Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and devoted last season to guest conducting. During the summer of 1969 he conducted opera for the first time, Così fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal guest conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He opened the 1969-1970 season of the New York Philharmonic, and later was guest conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He has recently returned from his second series of appearances at Salzburg. Seiji Ozawa became Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony this fall. He has made many recordings for RCA and Angel.

THE SOLOIST

MAURIZIO POLLINI makes his debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Born in Milan twenty-eight years ago, he won first prize in the Warsaw Chopin Competition when he was 18. This success led to appearances with the leading orchestras of Europe, including those in France, England, the USSR, Scandinavia, Germany, and in his native Italy. In Torino he gave the Italian première of Boulez's Sonata, which he played again in the May Festival of Florence. More recently he has appeared in Israel, where he performed with the Israel Philharmonic under Claudio Abbado's direction, the Prague Festival, with the Czech Philharmonic led by Karel Ancerl, and in the 1968-1969 season, the opening performance of the Hamburg Philharmonic directed by Wolfgang Sawallisch. In the United States, Maurizio Pollini appeared in 1969 with the Chicago Symphony and Seiji Ozawa at the Ravinia Festival, with the Detroit Symphony, and last season played for the first time with the New York Philharmonic, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. He has recorded for the Seraphim label.

3 works beautifully done

BSO, Ozawa click

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

The Boston Symphony concert conducted yesterday by Seiji Ozawa was, without a doubt, one of the finest concerts given by that orchestra in a long while. What impressed the most was the sense of utter naturalness and lack of pretension in Ozawa's work that cleaned layers of mannerism and stale tradition away from three of the most shopworn works in the repertoire.

Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune" was played with a restraint not usually associated with Ozawa. It worked beautifully, with a softness about the textures and contours so necessary yet so elusive in this piece. At the same time, the performance never decended into a "hundred and one strings" sonority to which it is so susceptible.

Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini gave what must be the most elegant performance of Prokofiev's 3rd Piano Concerto on record. Elegance is not a word usually associated with this piece, and indeed the performance Friday afternoon was eons away from Prokofiev's own-monolithic recorded performance. In fact, the dexterous Pollini hit whole fistfulls of notes which Prokofiev not only misses on his record of the piece but also probably never expected to be played accurately.

Pollini's care in the piano part was reflected also in the extreme refinement andprecision of the orchestral playing. Even the tricky coordination of piano and orchestra in the second movement variations was achieved with nary a hint of ensemble difficulties. Luckily the cleanness of textures drained not one ounce of energy from the piece but, rather, brought to the fore a range of orchestral sonorities and rhythmic bite that this listener, for one, had never thought existed in the work.

Tchaikovsky's 6th Symphony is an unusually problematic piece. For one thing of all the orchestral works it most clearly presents the two sides of his orchestral writing, the balletic and the symphonic. If a successful performance is to be achieved, some compromise between the "molto expressivo" writing of the outer movements and the dance oriented grace of the middle movements must be found. Ozawa reached this synthesis of expression superbly, playing the middle movements with an unusual amount of urgency, and finding a lucidity and rhythmic bounce in the outer movements one would never have suspected was there. What resulted was not a distortion of the character of the individual movements but rather a cogent statement of the whole work which allowed the true stature of this wonderful piece to be heard. The orchestral playing throughout the concert was of an extremely high order with some especially beautiful playing from clarinetist Harold Wright in the Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 7 1970
New England Newsclip

BSO's Pollini—

By Louis Snyder

Maurizio Pollini, playing the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofiev, made a spectacular and ecstatically received debut with the Boston Symphony, under Seiji Ozawa's direction, in its weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Ozawa, back for two sets of programs with the orchestra, chose Debussy's "Prelude à l'après-midi d'un faune" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony to bracket the Concerto in C.

The Third Concerto, which has now made its way into general acceptance in much the same way the Bartok concertos, for instance, are gradually making theirs, gave Mr. Pollini ample opportunities to display an electric technique and lightning flashes of interpretative wit, which were emphasized by Mr. Ozawa's careful integration of soloist and orchestra in this virtuoso setting. The pianist has a strong, lithe touch, indispensable here for encompassing the keyboard, yet his shaping and shading of phrases made this more than mere digital athleticism. As in so much of the music of Prokofiev, there is a quality of breathless good humor in this work, all of which was fittingly conveyed and gratefully received.

The Debussy Prelude (with an immeasurable assist from the flute of Doriot Anthony Dwyer) was its usual languorous impressionistic self, but the "Pathétique" had its ups and downs, on Friday at least, on the podium and around about it. Two of the ups were the well-rounded second Allegro, and Sherman Walt's bassoon in the Finale, but otherwise it seemed rather random Tchaikovsky.

The program will be repeated tomorrow at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
NOV 9 1970
New England Newsclip

Conducts Romantics with BSO

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in three works that, however played, are sure-fire with the populous of which I was a happy member. The latent revival of the Romantic in the arts (electronics notwithstanding) already has one musical hero in Seiji Ozawa. What he contrived with three latter-day R's, the incomparable orchestra (in the Prokofiev No. 3, with Pollini) and a responsive audience—many young—made a memorable occasion.

In Debussy's (Prelude to l'apres-midi d'un faune) Faun prelude Mallarme's exotic verses and the composer's projection of a fun's desires and dreams in a hot afternoon glowed with a rare sensitivity of color and movement—Doriot Dwyer's flute with a woody resonance in low register—the collaborating oboe and clarinet a match; and beginning with the alluring flute, an improvisational impulsiveness gained by an orchestral rubato, finely controlled. Dynamically, Ozawa asks for a wide range from ppp to fff, but here the sound was never pushed to an extreme that would violate the dream.

Prokofiev was an a-political young genius when surprised by the Red Revolution. Swimming with the current he found himself a cultural envoy of the new regime to the U. S. The vacation from anxious bureaucracy was a welcomed chance to play his way into the western world (Koussevitsky was a help in Boston). The third piano concerto was naturally a vehicle for his own pianism. It has its share of brilliant scale passages, massive orchestra sounds animated by the driving percussion of the piano, but always rhythmic, always marching, and never too much. When the sophisticated young Russian went "straight," he lost none of his wit. Any other composer would give his eye-teeth for that lovely prancing theme in the second movement—and its infectious smile when it slips back in out of a variation-furor Rachmaninov glows darkly and obsessively, Prokofiev shines with glint and flash—at least when sparked by Ozawa and Pollini (in his first appearance in Boston—an Ozawa importation).

But the most memorable piece was the one most belabored in modern performance: Tchaikovsky's No. 6 (Pathetique). The frenchified title is historically interesting, but the substance is, of course, unique and startling. Until Saturday night I had avoided it, treasuring Toscanini's way of classicizing the score as if to honor Tchaikovsky's Mozartian strain. But the composer, himself, said that the symphony was "penetrated by subjective sentiment" that made an unverbal program of private experience (Beethoven also had hidden programs of deeper human validity). Ozawa believed the composer. His opening Adagio grows up out of the ground into an allegro taut with drama. "Congrazia" (second movement) is no languid Viennese waltz but a five-beat fling of crowding exhuberance. "Molto vivace" was really molto so that some of the rapid scale passages for the first time (to me) became convincing as frenetic swirls of impulse and not mere flim-flam-filler, and the wow ending was justified by the accumulated power (no wonder the audience applauded out of turn. Why not? They were 'with it'). The concluding "Adagio lamentoso," an original (as finale) in symphonic history, circled back to the dark depths out of which the first movement emerged. Like Brahms, his exciting drama (with more orchestral flair than the Bavarian's) pushes up from introspective volcanoes of feeling. The final silence, like that before the beginning, left the conductor spent, the audience tentative to applaud. Properly so.

When applause comes, Ozawa directed it to the orchestra and the solo voices concerned and slipped away. It is symptomatic of his complete personal absorption in the feeling and form of music. Lest you think this a hippie dream, consider a time-pressured rehearsal when delicate techniques must be decided in minutes and complex attitudes of performance adjusted sympathetically. The answer is still "a miracle."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 12 1970

BSO

Previewing the present BSO season in these pages some weeks ago, I noted with approval the relative lack of war-horses and the abundance of less well-known music. I wrote, "But many neglected pieces will be heard . . . which deserve a hearing and are far more interesting than yet another Pathetique."

I should have known better. Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa conducted the Pathetique last weekend, pre-empting the previously scheduled Third Symphony of William Schuman. Don't get me wrong. I have nothing against the Pathetique. I wish I'd written it. It is certainly better than some of music's effete intellectuals would have us believe. But yet . . .

It was a fine Pathetique for all that. Best about Ozawa's performance was that it was exciting without being histrionic, not an easy balance to achieve. Many a lesser conductor has succumbed to the score's considerable temptations. But cheap thrills are not something in which Ozawa often indulges. He is a conductor of taste and refinement, so the total lack of vulgarity was not entirely unexpected. I liked, too, the throaty sound he elicited from the brass, which have been throatier all season. Ozawa is an exciting conductor to watch, expressive but not distracting or acrobatic, and the Pathetique is a fun piece to watch him shape.

A remarkable young pianist by the name of Maurizio Pollini joined Ozawa and the BSO for Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto. I cannot remember having heard Pollini before, I expect to hear him again, often. Like all pianists of his generation, his technical abilities are phenomenal. The Prokofiev Third is not a very profound piece, so it was hard to judge that side of Pollini's talents, but Pollini could well become one of the leading pianists of the next few years. His Prokofiev had power, drive, nuance and much charm.

A wonderfully evocative, understated L'Apres-midi d'un Faun opened the concert.

— L. P. KATZENSTEIN

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500
NOV 17 1970
New England Newsclip

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon November 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 24 1970 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

COPLAND Short symphony
in honor of the composer's seventieth birthday
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

LIGETI Atmosphères
first performance by the Orchestra in Boston

intermission

BERLIOZ Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
Day dreams; passions
Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
A ball
Waltz: allegro non troppo
Scene in the fields
Adagio
March to the scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
Dream of a witches' sabbath
Larghetto – allegro

Friday's concert will end about 3.40; Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra records exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA* RECORDS

At the Boston Symphony

Patrons Hail Seiji Ozawa

By HARRY NEVILLE

Audience moods are difficult to determine, but since no one can disprove the point, I'll venture that the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony patrons have seldom been more absorbed with a performance than they were yesterday during Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

The matinee crowd often seems a bit eager to leve during the program's final piece — any many of them do just that — but yesterday very few left and a great many stayed longer than usual to voice their approval of Seiji Ozawa, who this week conducts the second of two guest programs with the BSO.

THE BERLIOZ is a gripping work, especially its final two movements, but what the audience was responding to was an unusually fine performance, one that was notable, above all, for its lack of mannerism. It's tempting for a conductor of this work to make points simply by blasting listeners out of their seats. Ozawa never once yielded to that impulse and yet gave a reading that never lacked vitality and excitement.

The program opened with Aaron Copland's "Short Symphony," played as a 70th birthday offering to the composer. Despite its brevity, simplicity and attractiveness, this work is not often played — possibly because of the difficulties presented by its metrical and coordinative complexities. These proved to be no problem yesterday, and, if the Symphony's rhythms and scoring distinctly suggested Stravinsky's influence, that fact in no way lessened its charm.

Also accorded a warm reception yesterday was Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres," whose title and composer are unknown to thousands of people who would instantly recognize the music. This familiarity comes of course from the music's use in the film "2001."

Accounting too for the popularity of "Atmospheres" is the fact that the score, despite its enormous complexity, is an easy one to respond to. Its success, I'm afraid, in no way signals a breakthrough for the avant-garde.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
NOV 14 1970
New England Newsclip

Seiji Osawa, Tanglewood's Artistic director is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 13 featuring Aaron' Copland's "Short Symphony" in honor of the composer's seventieth birthday on Nov. 14., Ligeti's "Atmospheres and, following intermission, Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
COURIER
DETROIT EDITION (N)
W. 130,000 COMB. CIRC. OF ALL EDITIONS
NOV 14 1970

3 works beautifully done

BSO, Ozawa click

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

The Boston Symphony concert conducted yesterday by Seiji Ozawa was, without a doubt, one of the finest concerts given by that orchestra in a long while. What impressed the most was the sense of utter naturalness and lack of pretension in Ozawa's work that cleaned layers of mannerism and stale tradition away from three of the most shopworn works in the repertoire.

Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune" was played with a restraint not usually associated with Ozawa. It worked beautifully, with a softness about the textures and contours so necessary yet so elusive in this piece. At the same time, the performance never decended into a "hundred and one strings" sonority to which it is so susceptible.

Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini gave what must be the most elegant performance of Prokofiev's 3rd Piano Concerto on record. Elegance is not a word usually associated with this piece, and indeed the performance Friday afternoon was eons away from Prokofiev's own-monolithic recorded performance. In fact, the dexterous Pollini hit whole fistfulls of notes which Prokofiev not only misses on his record of the piece but also probably never expected to be played accurately.

Pollini's care in the piano part was reflected also in the extreme refinement andprecision of the orchestral playing. Even the tricky coordination of piano and orchestra in the second movement variations was achieved with nary a hint of ensemble difficulties. Luckily the cleanness of textures drained not one ounce of energy from the piece but, rather, brought to the fore a range of orchestral sonorities and rhythmic bite that this listener, for one, had never thought existed in the work.

Tchaikovsky's 6th Symphony is an unusually problematic piece. For one thing of all the orchestral works it most clearly presents the two sides of his orchestral writing, the balletic and the symphonic. If a successful performance is to be achieved, some compromise between the "molto expressivo" writing of the outer movements and the dance oriented grace of the middle movements must be found. Ozawa reached this synthesis of expression superbly, playing the middle movements with an unusual amount of urgency, and finding a lucidity and rhythmic bounce in the outer movements one would never have suspected was there. What resulted was not a distortion of the character of the individual movements but rather a cogent statement of the whole work which allowed the true stature of this wonderful piece to be heard. The orchestral playing throughout the concert was of an extremely high order with some especially beautiful playing from clarinetist Harold Wright in the Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 7 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO's Pollini—

By Louis Snyder

Maurizio Pollini, playing the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofiev, made a spectacular and ecstatically received debut with the Boston Symphony, under Seiji Ozawa's direction, in its weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. Mr. Ozawa, back for two sets of programs with the orchestra, chose Debussy's "Prelude à l'après-midi d'un faune" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony to bracket the Concerto in C.

The Third Concerto, which has now made its way into general acceptance in much the same way the Bartok concertos, for instance, are gradually making theirs, gave Mr. Pollini ample opportunities to display an electric technique and lightning flashes of interpretative wit, which were emphasized by Mr. Ozawa's careful integration of soloist and orchestra in this virtuoso setting. The pianist has a strong, lithe touch, indispensable here for encompassing the keyboard, yet his shaping and shading of phrases made this more than mere digital athleticism. As in so much of the music of Prokofiev, there is a quality of breathless good humor in this work, all of which was fittingly conveyed and gratefully received.

The Debussy Prelude (with an immeasurable assist from the flute of Doriot Anthony Dwyer) was its usual languorous impressionistic self, but the "Pathétique" had its ups and downs, on Friday at least, on the podium and around about it. Two of the ups were the well-rounded second Allegro, and Sherman Walt's bassoon in the Finale, but otherwise it seemed rather random Tchaikovsky.

The program will be repeated tomorrow at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Conducts Romantics with BSO

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in three works that, however played, are sure-fire with the populous of which I was a happy member. The latent revival of the Romantic in the arts (electronics notwithstanding) already has one musical hero in Seiji Ozawa. What he contrived with three latter-day R's, the incomparable orchestra (in the Prokofiev No. 3, with Pollini) and a responsive audience—many young—made a memorable occasion.

In Debussy's (Prelude to l'apres-midi d'un faune) Faun prelude Mallarme's exotic verses and the composer's projection of a fun's desires and dreams in a hot afternoon glowed with a rare sensitivity of color and movement—Doriot Dwyer's flute with a woody resonance in low register—the collaborating oboe and clarinet a match; and beginning with the alluring flute, an improvisational impulsiveness gained by an orchestral rubato, finely controlled. Dynamically, Ozawa asks for a wide range from ppp to fff, but here the sound was never pushed to an extreme that would violate the dream.

Prokofiev was an a-political young genius when surprised by the Red Revolution. Swimming with the current he found himself a cultural envoy of the new regime to the U. S. The vacation from anxious bureaucracy was a welcomed chance to play his way into the western world (Koussevitsky was a help in Boston). The third piano concerto was naturally a vehicle for his own pianism. It has its share of brilliant scale passages, massive orchestra sounds animated by the driving percussion of the piano, but always rhythmic, always marching, and nover too much. When the sophisticated young Russian went "straight," he lost none of his wit. Any other composer would give his eye-teeth for that lovely prancing theme in the second movement—and its infectious smile when it slips back in out of a variation-furor Rachmaninov glows darkly and obsessively, Prokofiev shines with glint and flash—at least when sparked by Ozawa and Pollini (in his first appearance in Boston—an Ozawa importation).

But the most memorable piece was the one most belabored in modern performance: Tchaikovsky's No. 6 (Pathetique). The frenchified title is historically interesting, but the substance is, of course, unique and startling. Until Saturday night I had avoided it, treasuring Toscanini's way of classicizing the score as if to honor Tchaikovsky's Mozartian strain. But the composer, himself, said that the symphony was "penetrated by subjective sentiment" that made an unverbal program of private experience (Beethoven also had hidden programs of deeper human validity). Ozawa believed the composer. His opening Adagio grows up out of the ground into an allegro taut with drama. "Congrazia" (second movement) is no languid Viennese waltz but a five-beat fling of crowding exhuberance. "Molto vivace" was really molto so that some of the rapid scale passages for the first time (to me) became convincing as frenetic swirls of impulse and not mere flim-flam-filler, and the wow ending was justified by the accumulated power (no wonder the audience applauded out of turn. Why not? They were 'with it'). The concluding "Adagio lamentoso," an original (as finale) in symphonic history, circled back to the dark depths out of which the first movement emerged. Like Brahms, his exciting drama (with more orchestral flair than the Bavarian's) pushes up from introspective volcanoes of feeling. The final silence, like that before the beginning, left the conductor spent, the audience tentative to applaud. Properly so.

When applause comes, Ozawa directed it to the orchestra and the solo voices concerned and slipped away. It is symptomatic of his complete personal absorption in the feeling and form of music. Lest you think this a hippie dream, consider a time-pressured rehearsal when delicate techniques must be decided in minutes and complex attitudes of performance adjusted sympathetically. The answer is still "a miracle."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 12 1970

BSO

Previewing the present BSO season in these pages some weeks ago, I noted with approval the relative lack of war-horses and the abundance of less well-known music. I wrote, "But many neglected pieces will be heard . . . which deserve a hearing and are far more interesting than yet another Pathetique."

I should have known better. Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa conducted the Pathetique last weekend, pre-empting the previously scheduled Third Symphony of William Schuman. Don't get me wrong. I have nothing against the Pathetique. I wish I'd written it. It is certainly better than some of music's effete intellectuals would have us believe. But yet . . .

It was a fine Pathetique for all that. Best about Ozawa's performance was that it was exciting without being histrionic, not an easy balance to achieve. Many a lesser conductor has succumbed to the score's considerable temptations. But cheap thrills are not something in which Ozawa often indulges. He is a conductor of taste and refinement, so the total lack of vulgarity was not entirely unexpected. I liked, too, the throaty sound he elicited from the brass, which have been throatier all season. Ozawa is an exciting conductor to watch, expressive but not distracting or acrobatic, and the Pathetique is a fun piece to watch him shape.

A remarkable young pianist by the name of Maurizio Pollini joined Ozawa and the BSO for Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto. I cannot remember having heard Pollini before, I expect to hear him again, often. Like all pianists of his generation, his technical abilities are phenomenal. The Prokofiev Third is not a very profound piece, so it was hard to judge that side of Pollini's talents, but Pollini could well become one of the leading pianists of the next few years. His Prokofiev had power, drive, nuance and much charm.

A wonderfully evocative, understated L'Apres - midi d'un Faun opened the concert.

— L. P. KATZENSTEIN

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

NOV 17 1970 New England Newsclip

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon November 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 24 1970 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

COPLAND Short symphony
in honor of the composer's seventieth birthday
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

LIGETI Atmosphères
first performance by the Orchestra in Boston

intermission

BERLIOZ Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
Day dreams; passions
Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
A ball
Waltz: allegro non troppo
Scene in the fields
Adagio
March to the scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
Dream of a witches' sabbath
Larghetto – allegro

Friday's concert will end about 3.40; Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra records exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon

BALDWIN PIANO
DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON AND RCA* RECORDS

At the Boston Symphony

Patrons Hail Seiji Ozawa

By HARRY NEVILLE

Audience moods are difficult to determine, but since no one can disprove the point, I'll venture that the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony patrons have seldom been more absorbed with a performance than they were yesterday during Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

The matinee crowd often seems a bit eager to leve during the program's final piece — any many of them do just that — but yesterday very few left and a great many stayed longer than usual to voice their approval of Seiji Ozawa, who this week conducts the second of two guest programs with the BSO.

THE BERLIOZ is a gripping work, especially its final two movements, but what the audience was responding to was an unusually fine performance, one that was notable, above all, for its lack of mannerism. It's tempting for a conductor of this work to make points simply by blasting listeners out of their seats. Ozawa never once yielded to that impulse and yet gave a reading that never lacked vitality and excitement.

The program opened with Aaron Copland's "Short Symphony," played as a 70th birthday offering to the composer. Despite its brevity, simplicity and attractiveness, this work is not often played — possibly because of the difficulties presented by its metrical and coordinative complexities. These proved to be no problem yesterday, and if the Symphony's rhythms and scoring distinctly suggested Stravinsky's influence, that fact in no way lessened its charm.

Also accorded a warm reception yesterday was Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres," whose title and composer are unknown to thousands of people who would instantly recognize the music. This familiarity comes of course from the music's use in the film "2001."

Accounting too for the popularity of "Atmospheres" is the fact that the score, despite its enormous complexity, is an easy one to respond to. Its success, I'm afraid, in no way signals a breakthrough for the avant-garde.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 14 1970 New England Newsclip

Seiji Osawa, Tanglewood's Artistic director is conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, Nov. 13 featuring Aaron' Copland's "Short Symphony" in honor of the composer's seventieth birthday on Nov. 14., Ligeti's "Atmospheres and, following intermission, Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
COURIER
DETROIT EDITION (N)
W. 130,000 COMB. CIRC. OF ALL EDITIONS

NOV 14 1970

BSO plays Copland's Short Symphony

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 14 1970

New England News

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In his second week as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa yesterday afternoon gave a concert that invited one's alert and pleased attention all the way through. The progam: Copland's Short Symphony, "Atmospheres" by Ligeti, and the Berlioz "Symphonie fantastique."

Today is Aaron Copland's 70th birthday, and playing the Short Symphony is an apt way to celebrate because it is rarely heard, very good, and a work for which the composer himself has a special fondness. It was finished in 1933, performed soon after by Carlos Chavez in Mexico, subsequently scheduled and cancelled by both Stokowski and Koussevitzky, ignored by other conductors, and introduced in the United States as late as 1944 when Stokowski evidently decided that he liked it after all. Meanwhile, in desperation as much as conviction, Copland has arranged the piece as a Sextet for clarinet, piano, and strings, and it has become fairly well known in that form. Friday's was the first Boston Symphony performance of the original version.

The Short Symphony is in three movements — quick, slow, quick — and it is short indeed, about 15 minutes. The beginning and end of the slow movement are, so far as I know, the earliest appearances of that wide-open spaces American sound that was to be so characteristic a feature of Copland's later work, from Music for Radio through "The Tender Land." The Short Symphony is not a landscape piece, though, and its quiet middle movement is an interlude in a work whose melodies are otherwise jagged, whose rhythms are nervously irregular, whose stance is ironic and detached, biting, often sharply humorous, rather than poetic and reflective. These aspects of musical character grow out of the structure, which is highly concentrated at all levels and it is extended into the fascinating and individual sonority, lean (there is no heavy brass and no percussion) but carrying enormous punch.

Copland has guessed that the rhythmic complications in the Short Symphony were "an important factor" in its early non-performance history. Friday's performance was not bad, but it lacked that energy which is given by confidence, and it showed that the Short Symphony is still a very hard piece.

Ozawa had conducted Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" at Tanglewood last summer, but this was its first performance in Boston. It is a study in clusters in shifting registers and of varying density, terribly simple as a musical idea but complex in the details of the working out. It is fantastic and suggestive, sounds gorgeous, and it got a most convincing performance.

So did the "Fantastique," Ozawa being one of the few conductors who catch the delicacy of the work as wel as its fire, its classicism along with its wildness. There needed to be more differentiation in dynamics at the pianissimo end of the scale, and I think the March to the Scaffold wants to go a little more slowly, or at least more doggedly, to be properly manacing; otherwise, Ozawa's intrepretation was very sure indeed and exceptionally beautiful in the bold, far-sighted shaping of the pastoral Adagio. The orchestra played beautifully, with evident pleasure and enthusiasm. And Berlioz, I am certain, would have been touched by the delicacy of Wayne Rapier's off-stage oboe solos in the slow movement, and delighted with the huge and hideous clangor of the bells in the finale (real, cast bells, and played by Charles Smith).

Ozawa sculptures symphony

By Louis Snyder

On the opening program of last summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in two of the three selections heard on weekend programs at Symphony Hall—Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmosphères" and the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz. This series opened with Aaron Copland's Short Symphony, played by the orchestra for the first time, and in honor of the composer's 70th birthday (Nov. 14).

In the great open spaces at Tanglewood (rain-soaked last July 3), the Ligeti piece, which deals in the composer's words with uninhabited musical "states," made something less than its intended effect thanks to atmospheric conditions which were, in their turn, moisture-filled. The independent tone colors and textures, which it is Mr. Ligeti's purpose to achieve, were lost in Berkshire fog. For the same reason, the Berlioz, though obviously strongly structured by Mr. Ozawa, barely penetrated a misty sound barrier to make a sinewy impact.

All this was changed in the Symphony Hall performances, where it was possible to concentrate on and be surrounded by the very different sonic sensations these composers had planned, 130-or-so years apart. "Atmosphères" shimmers, fades, and intensifies almost imperceptibly, like colored light against a cloudy background. The Ligeti description of it as "informal" means, in a sense, that no instrument has a chance to do its own thing except in a closely woven pattern with its fellows. The result is impressive and intriguing for almost the length of "Atmosphères," but beyond that it loses its ability to compel the listener to probe.

Something else again was Mr. Ozawa's way with the perennially stirring Fantastic Symphony. In the confines of Symphony Hall it was finally possible to hear with what meticulous care and taste he had planned the performance of this treasure trove of conductorial opportunities. And with the orchestra playing at its collective and individual best, this proved to be an interpretation to remember. The current of tonal and emotional feeling that flows through the symphony was sculptured by Mr. Ozawa with cumulative power to a climax that had the Friday afternoon audience gasping and cheering.

Along the way there was the airborne waltz of the scene at the ball; the hauntingly beautifully English horn solo in the Adagio, surpassingly played by Laurence Thorstenberg; and the rafter-ringing contributions of one and all to the Allegretto March and final Witches' Sabbath. As a demonstration of genuine satisfaction of conductor with orchestra, orchestra with conductor, and audience with everyone onstage, the Berlioz hasn't been equaled so far this season.

After a week on tour, the orchestra will return to repeat this program at Symphony Hall on Nov. 24.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 16 1970

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Nov. 25, 1970

The Sound of Music

Switching Bow For Baton.

By Peter M. Knapp

All the things a concertmaster has to do! Lead his violin section, play the solos, set the string bowings, pull together the orchestra if it begins to go astray, aid the conductor — and even conduct himself in a pinch.

And that's what happened to Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who on short notice replaced Seiji Ozawa on the podium for last night's Symphony concert. Ozawa is in Japan, where his father died Friday.

Silverstein also took over most of Ozawa's scheduled program: Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," while substituting Schubert's Symphony No. 5 for the originally scheduled Short Symphony of Aaron Copland.

Subdued Schubert

Characteristically, Silverstein turned in a thoroughly professional job, and the evening was one of well ordered, sensible music-making. Silverstein is no gazelle on the podium and his gestures are strictly functional, but they seemed to work as the orchestra generally played well for him, especially in the Berlioz.

The Schubert symphony was played in an attractive chamber scale, with a smallish orchestra, generally light, soft and sweet. Also rather literal and on the "safe" side, cautious inflections, subdued.

Ligeti's "Atmospheres" was effectively produced — and surprisingly well applauded in view of the audience's restlessness while it was being played. Silverstein set a more leisurely tempo than I remember Ozawa taking last summer at Tanglewood, and to the work's benefit.

The piece is an arresting experiment in sound transformation — gradual metamorphoses of sound and texture, without rhythm, melody or harmony. Each individual part is in motion; but the total effect of such motions gives the illusion of stationary sound.

In the Berlioz, Silverstein and the orchestra seemed most comfortable with each other, freer, more flexible, more expressive. Understandably, there were a few rough points, and the waltz movement was somewhat hard and stiff. But the last three movements, including the virtuosic finale, were played with spirit and flair, putting a rousing coda to Silverstein's night with the baton.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 24 1970

New BSO role

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will exchange his violin bow for a baton when he conducts his first complete program by the Boston Symphony tonight at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. He replaces Seiji Ozawa who has returned to Japan for his father's funeral.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon November 27 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 28 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 1 1970 at 7.30

DONALD JOHANOS conductor

MOZART — Divertimento no. 2 in D K. 131
- Allegro
- Adagio
- Menuetto
- Allegretto
- Menuetto
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston

ERB — Symphony of overtures (1964)
- The blacks (Jean Genet)
- Endgame (Samuel Beckett)
- The maids (Jean Genet)
- Rhinoceros (Eugene Ionesco)

Boston

Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70
- Allegro maestoso
- Poco adagio
- Scherzo: vivace – poco meno mosso
- Finale: allegro

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

DONALD JOHANOS, Associate Conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, began his conducting career with his high school orchestra in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he was born. He received a scholarship to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester and, after graduating, took up his first professional post with the Altoona (Pennsylvania) Symphony. In 1955 the American Symphony sent him to Europe for further study; he returned to America for a year, which he spent under the guidance of Eugene Ormandy in Philadelphia. As winner of an international conducting competition, Donald Johanos spent two consecutive summers in Holland conducting the Netherlands Radio Orchestra, and in 1963 was chosen to represent the United States as guest conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra during its gala anniversary season. The following season he was engaged by that orchestra for six concerts. Meanwhile, Donald Johanos had in 1962 become Music Director of the Dallas Symphony, which, during his eight years of leadership, developed into one of America's foremost touring orchestras; after his resignation he was named Conductor Emeritus. In 1964 his debut at the subscription series of the Philadelphia Orchestra resulted in a return to Philadelphia for the following two seasons. During the summer of 1964 he served as Director of the Alaskan Music Festival in Anchorage, attended the International String Congress in Michigan, appeared three times as guest conductor with the New York Chamber Orchestra at their Mozart Festival in Philharmonic Hall, and represented the United States Department of State in a concert tour of South America. Since 1966 Mr Johanos has appeared as guest conductor with the San Francisco, St Louis, Atlanta and Milwaukee Symphonies, the Louisville Orchestra, the Buffalo Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Donald Johanos makes his first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

JOHANOS GUEST CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

One thing that those of us get who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series is ~~plenty of guest conductors.~~ This circumstance is understandable inasmuch as William Steinberg, music director of the orchestra, also holds the same position with the Pittsburgh Symphony. Obviously, unless Mr. Steinberg is to defy a law of physics, he cannot be in two places at the same time.

In any event, the guest conductor on hand last week, making his Boston debut, was Donald Johanos in a program devoted to Mozart's "Divertimento in D," Donald Erb's "Symphony of Overtures," and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7 in D Minor." Mr. Johanos is not exactly a novice on the podium; he is at present associate conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and was for eight years director of the Dallas Symphony.

He is a musicianly, no-nonsense man with the baton. His Mozart reading was clear-cut, lucidly phrased, but not particularly scintillating. His conducting of the Erb piece, a difficult, somewhat avant-garde work that is really a series of brief overtures to four modern plays by Genet, Beckett, and Ionesco, was well-controlled and perceptive. And, in his best work of the program, he led a sonorous and sometimes rousing performance of the Dvorak symphony — an appealing work that gained him a considerable ovation.

The Erb piece was receiving its first Boston performance, and so, surprisingly, was the Mozart, which that remarkable genius composed when he was only 16. Now there's a really startling adolescent for you.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

DEC 6 1970

New England Newspaper

BSO plays Copland's Short Symphony

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 14 1970

New England News

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In his second week as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa yesterday afternoon gave a concert that invited one's alert and pleased attention all the way through. The progam: Copland's Short Symphony, "Atmospheres" by Ligeti, and the Berlioz "Symphonie fantastique."

Today is Aaron Copland's 70th birthday, and playing the Short Symphony is an apt way to celebrate because it is rarely heard, very good, and a work for which the composer himself has a special fondness. It was finished in 1933, performed soon after by Carlos Chavez in Mexico, subsequently scheduled and cancelled by both Stokowski and Koussevitzky, ignored by other conductors, and introduced in the United States as late as 1944 when Stokowski evidently decided that he liked it after all. Meanwhile, in desperation as much as conviction, Copland has arranged the piece as a Sextet for clarinet, piano, and strings, and it has become fairly well known in that form. Friday's was the first Boston Symphony performance of the original version.

The Short Symphony is in three movements — quick, slow, quick — and it is short indeed, about 15 minutes. The beginning and end of the slow movement are, so far as I know, the earliest appearances of that wide-open spaces American sound that was to be so characteristic a feature of Copland's later work, from Music for Radio through "The Tender Land." The Short Symphony is not a landscape piece, though, and its quiet middle movement is an interlude in a work whose melodies are otherwise jagged, whose rhythms are nervously irregular, whose stance is ironic and detached, biting, often sharply humorous, rather than poetic and reflective. These aspects of musical character grow out of the structure, which is highly concentrated at all levels and it is extended into the fascinating and individual sonority, lean (there is no heavy brass and no percussion) but carrying enormous punch.

Copland has guessed that the rhythmic complications in the Short Symphony were "an important factor" in its early non-performance history. Friday's performance was not bad, but it lacked that energy which is given by confidence, and it showed that the Short Symphony is still a very hard piece.

Ozawa had conducted Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" at Tanglewood last summer, but this was its first performance in Boston. It is a study in clusters in shifting registers and of varying density, terribly simple as a musical idea but complex in the details of the working out. It is fantastic and suggestive, sounds gorgeous, and it got a most convincing performance.

So did the "Fantastique," Ozawa being one of the few conductors who catch the delicacy of the work as wel as its fire, its classicism along with its wildness. There needed to be more differentiation in dynamics at the pianissimo end of the scale, and I think the March to the Scaffold wants to go a little more slowly, or at least more doggedly, to be properly manacing; otherwise, Ozawa's intrepretation was very sure indeed and exceptionally beautiful in the bold, far-sighted shaping of the pastoral Adagio. The orchestra played beautifully, with evident pleasure and enthusiasm. And Berlioz, I am certain, would have been touched by the delicacy of Wayne Rapier's off-stage oboe solos in the slow movement, and delighted with the huge and hideous clangor of the bells in the finale (real, cast bells, and played by Charles Smith).

Ozawa sculptures symphony

By Louis Snyder

On the opening program of last summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in two of the three selections heard on weekend programs at Symphony Hall—Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmosphères" and the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz. This series opened with Aaron Copland's Short Symphony, played by the orchestra for the first time, and in honor of the composer's 70th birthday (Nov. 14).

In the great open spaces at Tanglewood (rain-soaked last July 3), the Ligeti piece, which deals in the composer's words with uninhabited musical "states," made something less than its intended effect thanks to atmospheric conditions which were, in their turn, moisture-filled. The independent tone colors and textures, which it is Mr. Ligeti's purpose to achieve, were lost in Berkshire fog. For the same reason, the Berlioz, though obviously strongly structured by Mr. Ozawa, barely penetrated a misty sound barrier to make a sinewy impact.

All this was changed in the Symphony Hall performances, where it was possible to concentrate on and be surrounded by the very different sonic sensations these composers had planned, 130-or-so years apart. "Atmosphères" shimmers, fades, and intensifies almost imperceptibly, like colored light against a cloudy background. The Ligeti description of it as "informal" means, in a sense, that no instrument has a chance to do its own thing except in a closely woven pattern with its fellows. The result is impressive and intriguing for almost the length of "Atmosphères," but beyond that it loses its ability to compel the listener to probe.

Something else again was Mr. Ozawa's way with the perennially stirring Fantastic Symphony. In the confines of Symphony Hall it was finally possible to hear with what meticulous care and taste he had planned the performance of this treasure trove of conductorial opportunities. And with the orchestra playing at its collective and individual best, this proved to be an interpretation to remember. The current of tonal and emotional feeling that flows through the symphony was sculptured by Mr. Ozawa with cumulative power to a climax that had the Friday afternoon audience gasping and cheering.

Along the way there was the airborne waltz of the scene at the ball; the hauntingly beautifully English horn solo in the Adagio, surpassingly played by Laurence Thorstenberg; and the rafter-ringing contributions of one and all to the Allegretto March and final Witches' Sabbath. As a demonstration of genuine satisfaction of conductor with orchestra, orchestra with conductor, and audience with everyone onstage, the Berlioz hasn't been equaled so far this season.

After a week on tour, the orchestra will return to repeat this program at Symphony Hall on Nov. 24.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 16 1970

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Nov. 25, 1970

The Sound of Music

Switching Bow For Baton.

By Peter M. Knapp

All the things a concertmaster has to do! Lead his violin section, play the solos, set the string bowings, pull together the orchestra if it begins to go astray, aid the conductor — and even conduct himself in a pinch.

And that's what happened to Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who on short notice replaced Seiji Ozawa on the podium for last night's Symphony concert. Ozawa is in Japan, where his father died Friday.

Silverstein also took over most of Ozawa's scheduled program: Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," while substituting Schubert's Symphony No. 5 for the originally scheduled Short Symphony of Aaron Copland.

Subdued Schubert

Characteristically, Silverstein turned in a thoroughly professional job, and the evening was one of well ordered, sensible music-making. Silverstein is no gazelle on the podium and his gestures are strictly functional, but they seemed to work as the orchestra generally played well for him, especially in the Berlioz.

The Schubert symphony was played in an attractive chamber scale, with a smallish orchestra, generally light, soft and sweet. Also rather literal and on the "safe" side, cautious inflections, subdued.

Ligeti's "Atmospheres" was effectively produced — and surprisingly well applauded in view of the audience's restlessness while it was being played. Silverstein set a more leisurely tempo than I remember Ozawa taking last summer at Tanglewood, and to the work's benefit.

The piece is an arresting experiment in sound transformation — gradual metamorphoses of sound and texture, without rhythm, melody or harmony. Each individual part is in motion; but the total effect of such motions gives the illusion of stationary sound.

In the Berlioz, Silverstein and the orchestra seemed most comfortable with each other, freer, more flexible, more expressive. Understandably, there were a few rough points, and the waltz movement was somewhat hard and stiff. But the last three movements, including the virtuosic finale, were played with spirit and flair, putting a rousing coda to Silverstein's night with the baton.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 24 1970

New BSO role

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will exchange his violin bow for a baton when he conducts his first complete program by the Boston Symphony tonight at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. He replaces Seiji Ozawa who has returned to Japan for his father's funeral.

THE

likely source and to turn his fin fusion of styles put to use towar great divergence of output. Dv please, happy when he found p chamber combinations because phonies and symphonic forms oratorios because choral societies them, short works because his fi saleable scores. He wrote nine o fondest ambition was to achieve realized beyond Prague. Thus L world, obliging general taste. He esting exotic from a picturesque captivating, his rhythm heady, wh and vital. He was gratifyingly c advanced for the general taste — yea del

Joh
Ne
Un
ing tha be ye or 19 re in Fe
M
C re
S
w t
P a

THE AD
IN PROGRA ACTIVELY

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon November 27 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 28 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 1 1970 at 7.30

DONALD JOHANOS conductor

MOZART — Divertimento no. 2 in D K. 131
Allegro
Adagio
Menuetto
Allegretto
Menuetto
Adagio
Allegro molto

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston

ERB — Symphony of overtures (1964)
The blacks (Jean Genet)
Endgame (Samuel Beckett)
The maids (Jean Genet)
Rhinoceros (Eugene Ionesco)

first performance in Boston

intermission

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70
Allegro maestoso
Poco adagio
Scherzo: vivace – poco meno mosso
Finale: allegro

JOHANOS GUEST CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

One thing that those of us get who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series is ~~plenty of guest conductors.~~ This circumstance is understandable inasmuch as William Steinberg, music director of the orchestra, also holds the same position with the Pittsburgh Symphony. Obviously, unless Mr. Steinberg is to defy a law of physics, he cannot be in two places at the same time.

In any event, the guest conductor on hand last week, making his Boston debut, was Donald Johanos in a program devoted to Mozart's "Divertimento in D," Donald Erb's "Symphony of Overtures," and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7 in D Minor." Mr. Johanos is not exactly a novice on the podium; he is at present associate conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and was for eight years director of the Dallas Symphony.

He is a musicianly, no-nonsense man with the baton. His Mozart reading was clear-cut, lucidly phrased, but not particularly scintillating. His conducting of the Erb piece, a difficult, somewhat avant-garde work that is really a series of brief overtures to four modern plays by Genet, Beckett, and Ionesco, was well-controlled and perceptive. And, in his best work of the program, he led a sonorous and sometimes rousing performance of the Dvorak symphony — an appealing work that gained him a considerable ovation.

The Erb piece was receiving its first Boston performance, and so, surprisingly, was the Mozart, which that remarkable genius composed when he was only 16. Now there's a really startling adolescent for you.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

DEC 6 1970

New England Newspaper

BSO plays Copland's Short Symphony

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 14 1970

New England News

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In his second week as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa yesterday afternoon gave a concert that invited one's alert and pleased attention all the way through. The progam: Copland's Short Symphony, "Atmospheres" by Ligeti, and the Berlioz "Symphonie fantastique."

Today is Aaron Copland's 70th birthday, and playing the Short Symphony is an apt way to celebrate because it is rarely heard, very good, and a work for which the composer himself has a special fondness. It was finished in 1933, performed soon after by Carlos Chavez in Mexico, subsequently scheduled and cancelled by both Stokowski and Koussevitzky, ignored by other conductors, and introduced in the United States as late as 1944 when Stokowski evidently decided that he liked it after all. Meanwhile, in desperation as much as conviction, Copland has arranged the piece as a Sextet for clarinet, piano, and strings, and it has become fairly well known in that form. Friday's was the first Boston Symphony performance of the original version.

The Short Symphony is in three movements — quick, slow, quick — and it is short indeed, about 15 minutes. The beginning and end of the slow movement are, so far as I know, the earliest appearances of that wide-open spaces American sound that was to be so characteristic a feature of Copland's later work, from Music for Radio through "The Tender Land." The Short Symphony is not a landscape piece, though, and its quiet middle movement is an interlude in a work whose melodies are otherwise jagged, whose rhythms are nervously irregular, whose stance is ironic and detached, biting, often sharply humorous, rather than poetic and reflective. These aspects of musical character grow out of the structure, which is highly concentrated at all levels and it is extended into the fascinating and individual sonority, lean (there is no heavy brass and no percussion) but carrying enormous punch.

Copland has guessed that the rhythmic complications in the Short Symphony were "an important factor" in its early non-performance history. Friday's performance was not bad, but it lacked that energy which is given by confidence, and it showed that the Short Symphony is still a very hard piece.

Ozawa had conducted Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" at Tanglewood last summer, but this was its first performance in Boston. It is a study in clusters in shifting registers and of varying density, terribly simple as a musical idea but complex in the details of the working out. It is fantastic and suggestive, sounds gorgeous, and it got a most convincing performance.

So did the "Fantastique," Ozawa being one of the few conductors who catch the delicacy of the work as wel as its fire, its classicism along with its wildness. There needed to be more differentiation in dynamics at the pianissimo end of the scale, and I think the March to the Scaffold wants to go a little more slowly, or at least more doggedly, to be properly manacing; otherwise, Ozawa's intrepretation was very sure indeed and exceptionally beautiful in the bold, far-sighted shaping of the pastoral Adagio. The orchestra played beautifully, with evident pleasure and enthusiasm. And Berlioz, I am certain, would have been touched by the delicacy of Wayne Rapier's off-stage oboe solos in the slow movement, and delighted with the huge and hideous clangor of the bells in the finale (real, cast bells, and played by Charles Smith).

Ozawa sculptures symphony

By Louis Snyder

On the opening program of last summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in two of the three selections heard on weekend programs at Symphony Hall—Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmosphères" and the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz. This series opened with Aaron Copland's Short Symphony, played by the orchestra for the first time, and in honor of the composer's 70th birthday (Nov. 14).

In the great open spaces at Tanglewood (rain-soaked last July 3), the Ligeti piece, which deals in the composer's words with uninhabited musical "states," made something less than its intended effect thanks to atmospheric conditions which were, in their turn, moisture-filled. The independent tone colors and textures, which it is Mr. Ligeti's purpose to achieve, were lost in Berkshire fog. For the same reason, the Berlioz, though obviously strongly structured by Mr. Ozawa, barely penetrated a misty sound barrier to make a sinewy impact.

All this was changed in the Symphony Hall performances, where it was possible to concentrate on and be surrounded by the very different sonic sensations these composers had planned, 130-or-so years apart. "Atmosphères" shimmers, fades, and intensifies almost imperceptibly, like colored light against a cloudy background. The Ligeti description of it as "informal" means, in a sense, that no instrument has a chance to do its own thing except in a closely woven pattern with its fellows. The result is impressive and intriguing for almost the length of "Atmosphères," but beyond that it loses its ability to compel the listener to probe.

Something else again was Mr. Ozawa's way with the perennially stirring Fantastic Symphony. In the confines of Symphony Hall it was finally possible to hear with what meticulous care and taste he had planned the performance of this treasure trove of conductorial opportunities. And with the orchestra playing at its collective and individual best, this proved to be an interpretation to remember. The current of tonal and emotional feeling that flows through the symphony was sculptured by Mr. Ozawa with cumulative power to a climax that had the Friday afternoon audience gasping and cheering.

Along the way there was the airborne waltz of the scene at the ball; the hauntingly beautifully English horn solo in the Adagio, surpassingly played by Laurence Thorstenberg; and the rafter-ringing contributions of one and all to the Allegretto March and final Witches' Sabbath. As a demonstration of genuine satisfaction of conductor with orchestra, orchestra with conductor, and audience with everyone onstage, the Berlioz hasn't been equaled so far this season.

After a week on tour, the orchestra will return to repeat this program at Symphony Hall on Nov. 24.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 16 1970

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Nov. 25, 1970

The Sound of Music

Switching Bow For Baton

By Peter M. Knapp

All the things a concertmaster has to do! Lead his violin section, play the solos, set the string bowings, pull together the orchestra if it begins to go astray, aid the conductor — and even conduct himself in a pinch.

And that's what happened to Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who on short notice replaced Seiji Ozawa on the podium for last night's Symphony concert. Ozawa is in Japan, where his father died Friday.

Silverstein also took over most of Ozawa's scheduled program: Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," while substituting Schubert's Symphony No. 5 for the originally scheduled Short Symphony of Aaron Copland.

Subdued Schubert

Characteristically, Silverstein turned in a thoroughly professional job, and the evening was one of well ordered, sensible music-making. Silverstein is no gazelle on the podium and his gestures are strictly functional, but they seemed to work as the orchestra generally played well for him, especially in the Berlioz.

The Schubert symphony was played in an attractive chamber scale, with a smallish orchestra, generally light, soft and sweet. Also rather literal and on the "safe" side, cautious inflections, subdued.

Ligeti's "Atmospheres" was effectively produced — and surprisingly well applauded in view of the audience's restlessness while it was being played. Silverstein set a more leisurely tempo than I remember Ozawa taking last summer at Tanglewood, and to the work's benefit.

The piece is an arresting experiment in sound transformation — gradual metamorphoses of sound and texture, without rhythm, melody or harmony. Each individual part is in motion; but the total effect of such motions gives the illusion of stationary sound.

In the Berlioz, Silverstein and the orchestra seemed most comfortable with each other, freer, more flexible, more expressive. Understandably, there were a few rough points, and the waltz movement was somewhat hard and stiff. But the last three movements, including the virtuosic finale, were played with spirit and flair, putting a rousing coda to Silverstein's night with the baton.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 24 1970

New BSO role

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will exchange his violin bow for a baton when he conducts his first complete program by the Boston Symphony tonight at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. He replaces Seiji Ozawa who has returned to Japan for his father's funeral.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon November 27 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 28 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 1 1970 at 7.30

DONALD JOHANOS conductor

MOZART — Divertimento no. 2 in D K. 131
Allegro
Adagio
Menuetto
Allegretto
Menuetto
Adagio
Allegro molto

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston

ERB — Symphony of overtures (1964)
The blacks (Jean Genet)
Endgame (Samuel Beckett)
The maids (Jean Genet)
Rhinoceros (Eugene Ionesco)

n Boston

Symphony no. 7 in D minor op. 70
Allegro maestoso
Poco adagio
Scherzo: vivace – poco meno mosso
Finale: allegro

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

DONALD JOHANOS, Associate Conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, began his conducting career with his high school orchestra in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he was born. He received a scholarship to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester and, after graduating, took up his first professional post with the Altoona (Pennsylvania) Symphony. In 1955 the American Symphony sent him to Europe for further study; he returned to America for a year, which he spent under the guidance of Eugene Ormandy in Philadelphia. As winner of an international conducting competition, Donald Johanos spent two consecutive summers in Holland conducting the Netherlands Radio Orchestra, and in 1963 was chosen to represent the United States as guest conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra during its gala anniversary season. The following season he was engaged by that orchestra for six concerts. Meanwhile, Donald Johanos had in 1962 become Music Director of the Dallas Symphony, which, during his eight years of leadership, developed into one of America's foremost touring orchestras; after his resignation he was named Conductor Emeritus. In 1964 his debut at the subscription series of the Philadelphia Orchestra resulted in a return to Philadelphia for the following two seasons. During the summer of 1964 he served as Director of the Alaskan Music Festival in Anchorage, attended the International String Congress in Michigan, appeared three times as guest conductor with the New York Chamber Orchestra at their Mozart Festival in Philharmonic Hall, and represented the United States Department of State in a concert tour of South America. Since 1966 Mr Johanos has appeared as guest conductor with the San Francisco, St Louis, Atlanta and Milwaukee Symphonies, the Louisville Orchestra, the Buffalo Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Donald Johanos makes his first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

JOHANOS GUEST CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

One thing that those of us get who attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series is ~~plenty of guest conductors.~~ This circumstance is understandable inasmuch as William Steinberg, music director of the orchestra, also holds the same position with the Pittsburgh Symphony. Obviously, unless Mr. Steinberg is to defy a law of physics, he cannot be in two places at the same time.

In any event, the guest conductor on hand last week, making his Boston debut, was Donald Johanos in a program devoted to Mozart's "Divertimento in D," Donald Erb's "Symphony of Overtures," and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7 in D Minor." Mr. Johanos is not exactly a novice on the podium; he is at present associate conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and was for eight years director of the Dallas Symphony.

He is a musicianly, no-nonsense man with the baton. His Mozart reading was clear-cut, lucidly phrased, but not particularly scintillating. His conducting of the Erb piece, a difficult, somewhat avant-garde work that is really a series of brief overtures to four modern plays by Genet, Beckett, and Ionesco, was well-controlled and perceptive. And, in his best work of the program, he led a sonorous and sometimes rousing performance of the Dvorak symphony — an appealing work that gained him a considerable ovation.

The Erb piece was receiving its first Boston performance, and so, surprisingly, was the Mozart, which that remarkable genius composed when he was only 16. Now there's a really startling adolescent for you.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000

DEC 6 1970

New England Newspaper

Symphony Hall Donalds —Johanos, Erb, Gramm

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Donald Johanos, former music director of the Dallas Symphony and currently associate to William Steinberg in the Pittsburgh post, conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall.

On his program were the first performance in Boston by the orchestra of Mozart's Divertimento in D (played only at Tanglewood in 1963), the premiere here of Donald Erb's Symphony of Overtures, and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony (in D minor, Op. 70), last in the BSO's repertoire in 1967. Therefore, what was heard on Friday and Saturday represented a "from scratch" Johanos effort with the orchestra as opposed to a guest reshaping tried-and-true standard works.

Despite extensive experiences with orchestras here and abroad, Mr. Johanos has not acquired a flamboyant or overbearing style—his baton technique is businesslike in the extreme, which is probably the better part of wisdom when conducting any major orchestra for the first time. While the results weren't electric, they were substantial; thus Mr. Johanos might be said to have consolidated his gains.

We should all be fortunate enough to be invited to parties for which music like the Mozart seven-movement Divertimento has been made to order. The persuasiveness and grace which it offers, along with a variety of gracious solo opportunities, could liven any gathering, as such "party music" traditionally should. The orchestra played it beautifully, and even a few bloopers in the horn quartets on Saturday scarcely broke the spell.

Mr. Erb's Symphony of Overtures is suggested by four contemporary plays—Genet's "The Blacks," Beckett's "Endgame," Genet's "The Maids," and Ionesco's "Rhinoceros" — each of which has a symphonic movement, otherwise unmarked, of its own. It is an interesting idea, and basically a safe one, since all of the plays share a calculated complexity of meaning, hardly adaptable to literal interpretation through notation. Thus Mr. Erb could employ a wide variety of means and textures, some of which, on their own, are of considerable interest, even if any relation to the play at hand seems purely coincidental, as in the harp and percussion passages of "Endgame." Whether this Symphony of Overtures will have a life of its own—like overtures to "The Ruins of Athens," "Manfred," and "The Twin Brothers," plays that history has left behind—lies in the musical and theatrical future.

Mr. Johanos lavished a great deal of care on the Erb piece, and returned to do likewise with the Dvorak Symphony, which received a solid, controlled performance and an enthusiastic reception. The program will be repeated at Symphony Hall at 7:30 tonight.

To no one's surprise, Donald Gramm's first solo recital in Boston confirmed on personal terms what has always been apparent in his many operatic and symphonic appearances here — that this is a singer who concentrates unfailingly on the infinite details of his art. His Symphony Hall concert, given as a benefit for the Opera Company of Boston's children's performances, was a firsthand, and discreetly informal, demonstration of the many musicianly Gramm qualities that have gained general admiration.

With still another Donald—Donald Hassard—as his expertly attuned accompanist, Mr. Gramm sang three Handel arias, exemplary in style and English diction; four Brahms songs of varied emotional content, subtly conveyed; three Mozart opera arias (N.B. Sarah Caldwell—he's never sung performances of them here); and two concluding groups of songs by Charles Ives and Aaron Copland, which proved that, with taste, Americans have a viable vocal literature of their own to choose from.

Before the intermission, Mr. Gramm and Ned Rorem gave the first local performance of Mr. Rorem's "War Scenes," five sung excerpts from Walt Whitman's "Specimen Days," descriptive of the horror, fantasy, and irony of the poet's Civil War experiences. Mr. Rorem's status as a composer of "art songs" (for a better description) is high, but the moving "Scenes" add a sobering dimension, and Mr. Gramm's sonorous involvement in these heartbreaking texts produced a strong combined dramatic experience. The tender "Specimen Case," the impelling "Incident" in which a wounded rebel soldier seems to dig his own grave, and the macabre "Inauguration Ball" all drove their points home, thanks very much to the singer's impeccable taste in emotional expression, as evident here as in the Brahms, the Mozart, and the American songs, of which the Ives "Two Little Flowers" was a gleaming gem.

Now that Mr. Gramm has introduced us to his delectable one-man show (Boston's Morning Musicales will hear him on March 10), it is to be hoped that this intelligently versatile artist will return often in this and previously familiar guises.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

NOV 19 1970

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

NOV 19 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

NOV 19 1970

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940

NOV 19 1970

B.S.O. Concerts

Donald Johanos, Associate Conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Nov. 27 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Nov. 28 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Johanos conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's "Divertimento in D," Erb's "Symphony" of overtures and the Dvorak "Seventh symphony."

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the fourth concert of the Tuesday "A" series Tuesday evening, Nov. 24 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Ozawa conducts Copland's Short symphony (in honor of the composer's seventieth birthday), Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique."

[13]

Johanos Makes Local Debut with Symphony

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (SY) 298,557

NOV 28 1970

New England Newsclip

By HARRY NEVILLE

Donald Johanos, associate conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, made his local conducting debut with the Boston Symphony yesterday. Neither in content nor in execution did his program make, or seem intended to make, the kind of "splash" one associates with debuts — even debuts that take place on Friday afternoons in Boston — and the matter is cause for both compliment and complaint.

It's refreshing indeed to discover that Johanos is not yet another "interpreter," that he keeps his own profile low and doesn't confuse it with the composer's, and that he keeps neat balances, turns a phrase well and has a good sense of where the music is going and how to get it there.

AND YET MUCH of the pleasure this listener got from Johanos' conducting was a reaction against conductors who go overboard in the opposite direction, and this kind of pleasure doesn't really make for a satisfying afternoon of music. I thought we would surely be treated to a splendid climax or two in the final work, Dvorak's Seventh Symphony in D minor, but, like the rest of the program, this was played with so much restraint that one ended up berating Johanos for what was initially appealing: the lack of a sharp profile.

Johanos' choice of pieces did little to overcome his tendency to be bland as an executant. The program notes all but apologized — rightly so, I thought — for Mozart's less than inspired Divertimento No. 2 in D, K. 131. This seven-movement work is diverting, even elegant at times, but on a program where nothing rose to very great heights something stronger seemed called for.

The novelty of the afternoon was Donald Erb's "Symphony of Overtures," which dates from 1964. The work is in four movements, each of which vaguely corresponds in mood to its counterpart in a traditional symphonic structure. As a subtitle each movement bears the name of a play (Genet, Beckett and Ionesco are the authors). To the extent that for Erb the form was dictated "in a very general way ... by the dramatic structure," the symphony is programmatic.

Erb's language is anything but that of the musical avant garde. He uses the orchestra in what are by now fairly traditional ways, his rhythms for the most part scan metrically, and his harmonies and melodies can often be heard within a tonal context.

Despite all this, quite a bit of audience restlessness was observable. Usually Symphony Hall patrons will tolerate even the most outlandish nonsense with icy politeness, and I wondered if their reaction yesterday was caused by the

Boston debut

Donald Johanos, associate conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, directs the Boston Symphony for the first time at concerts this afternoon, Saturday evening, and Dec. 1, when the programs will include works by Mozart and Dvorak, and a first Boston performance of Donald Erb's Symphony of Overtures.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 27 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

DEC 3 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 28 1970

New England Newsclip

Mozart elegantly performed

Johanos conducts Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The guest conductor at Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert was Donald Johanos, who made his reputation in eight years with the Dallas Symphony and who is now Associate Conductor of William Steinberg's other orchestra, the Pittsburgh. That makes Johanos something like an in-law of the Boston Symphony, and it would be nice if his being in the family were to assure his return here soon and often, for he is very good. His program: Mozart's Divertimento in D, K.131, "Symphony of Overtures" by Donald Erb, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D minor.

Donald Erb, who is 43 and composer in residence at the Cleveland Institute of Mucic. wrote his "Symphony of Overtures" in 1964. It is a four-movement piece of conventional outline: quick, slow, scherzo with trio, energetic finale. Inside that scheme, however, Erb's music has a thoroughly "modern" sound, dissonant, fragmented both in linear continuity and texture. It is assured and adroit music, effectively scored, pleasingly punctual, just a little bit obvious, with a curious difference in interest between those parts where the discourse is mainly about rhythm and texture, where Erb can be impressively resourceful, and the occasional appearances of lyric melody, which suggest Schoenberg and sound second-hand.

Erb calls his piece "Symphony of Overtures" because each movement is based on a play, "The Blacks" (Genet), "Endgame" (Beckett), "The Maids" (Genet), and "Rhinoceros" (Ionesco), in that order. I have left this point till last because it is as drama criticism, as it were, that Erb is least convincing. He does, by the way, also offer the option that work can "be heard on purely musical terms."

The music has theatrical quality, but what I missed was something specifically to each of four highly distinctive plays. There were some good inspirations, like the clock noises with which "Endgame" begins, or the comically blustering monologue for trombone in "Rhinoceros" (splendidly delivered by William Gibson), neither penetrating nor illuminating. Particularly for Beckett it seems to me that to do justice to the extraordinary relation in his work of sound and sense, another sort of musical language must be found, one of greater originality than what I hear as a certain superficiality in Erb allows him to find.

I was reminded a bit of Tchaikovsky, who writes beautiful music, but is not too sure of the differences between Shakespeare and Dante, Juliet and Francesca, in contrast to Berlioz, who gives you assurance in every phrase that he can tell Virgil from Shakespeare and Juliet from Gretchen.

Divertimento by the 16-year old Mozart that Johanos chose is exuberantly inventive, particularly in the play of textures (besides strings there are four horns, and one each of flute, oboe, and bassoon), and it has a really touching Adagio in the style of a florid aria for strings alone. Johanos is a fine Mozart conductor, and the performance was both elegant and vigorous. The Dvorak D minor Symphony, a powerful and rich piece, went beautifully, too, in a wonderfully simple, unaffected way. The performance was spacious and relaxed more than fiery, and its energy was that of inner kind that you sense when the proportions are clarified with the utmost vividness.

The orchestra responded to Johanos with relaxed, warmly sonorous playing that was a great pleasure to hear. The horns were an exception: the virtuosic Mozart pieces clearly exposed their technical and musical insufficiencies, and they rather smudged the Dvorak as well. With Harold Wright as the new principal clarinetist, and with important and beneficial replacements in the flute, oboe, and trombone sections, the Boston Symphony sounds enormously improved this season, but that blary, uncertain, rhythmless horn group needs the Music Director's most serious attention.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: JOHANOS' GUEST STINT

William Steinberg's assistant at Pittsburgh, Donald Johanos, was the second guest conductor of the season at Symphony. A youngish man out of the American heartlands—Cedar Rapids, Iowa High School, Eastman School, American Symphony, etc. he is one of a type of whom we will see more and more in the major conductorial posts as time goes on.

The program he chose was a very nice mix of style and period. It included Mozart's Divertimento No. 2 in D, K 131; Donald Erb's "Symphony of Overtures" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D minor. The response to the performance, at least as this corner perceived it, was an equally nice mix ranging from the emphatically affirmative to the blandly negative. The reaction here lies strictly in between.

Take the Mozart Divertimento, a gem of its ilk that had never hitherto been played by the orchestra. The sixteen-year-old Mozart takes material that is seldom far removed from "Ach du lieber Augustine" and suffuses it was a freshness and charming inventiveness that is sheer joy to hear. Particularly felicitous is the abundance of solo passages for the flute and more especially for a horn quartet. From accounts of the Friday performance one might have expected downright subversion from the latter of an otherwise silken rendition. Well, on Saturday, though the horns were on the rough and tough side, I thought that on the whole they performed passably. For the rest, the reading had a good deal of unevenness, but certainly not, as one seasoned auditor averred, to the point of sounding as if it were aleatory music.

Mr. Johanos' main efforts went into the Erb piece. This is a glittering post-Webern exercise in pointillisme, which showed most evident command of orchestral resources. Each of the four sections seeks to evoke the feelings of certain contemporary plays, the first, Jean Genet's "The Blacks," the second, Beckett's "Endgame", the third, Genet's "The Maids," and lastly Ionesco's "Rhinoceros." Although familiar with three of the plays, I found that the distinctiveness among the overtures was evasive; perhaps had I read the composer's detailed program notes in advance, though, the results may have been otherwise. Here was a genre with which the conductor was at one, and the rendition proceeded with verve and wit, and with a notable absence of that certain nervous strain which is so often attendant on first performances of difficult modern scores. And so, as is usually the case, it was Mozart that turned out to be the hard one.

Dvorak's Seventh Symphony, unaccountably on the shelf for the last forty years here until it emerged early in the Leinsdorf tenure, was receiving its third reading at these concerts since 1963. By now, then, we should have a good sense of it. For all the awkwardness of the development of the first movement, it is a beautiful and strongly constructed piece which simply soars in places with its songfulness. Ideally a performance should exude bounce and color. Mr. Johanos' did not achieve that ideal, though it was by no means drab. Its problem was too much understatement and lack of sharp contour. But the players' response was always sensitive and the orchestral sound, as had been the case all evening, was invariably first

INCORRECT PAGINATION

12

Delightful Canticle No. 3 Substituted on Symphony Program

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 5 1970
New England Newsclip

By HARRY NEVILLE

Harrison Birtwistle's "Tragoedia" was removed from yesterday's Boston Symphony program, presumably because in a schedule that also included Nielsen's Fifth Symphony there was insufficient rehearsal time to put it together properly.

The omission is regrettable since Birtwistle, one of the most interesting of Britain's younger composers, is so little heard here, and one hopes that "Tragoedia" can be rescheduled later.

THE LOSS DID HAVE a delightful consequence, and that was the substitution of Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3, which will be heard again at tonight's concert. The work is scored for seven players: ocarina, guitar and a percussion ensemble (five players) which includes six muted iron pipes, five muted brake drums, three suspended brake drums, six water buffalo bells, two Egyptian rattles, three elephant bells (small, medium and large) and a variety of other arcane and not so arcane instruments.

One might expect from this assemblage some pretty raucous sounds, and one would be entirely wrong, for what Harrison wrote is a work of unusual subtlety, refinement and charm — one whose rhythmic patterns and sonic surface suggest Eastern music but whose formal scheme establishes a Western context.

In a beautifully conceived program, Michael Tilson Thomas also conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 97 in C. Thomas is a splendid interpreter of Haydn, partly because he conveys so well a certain hard to describe quality — "lusty elegance" comes close, I believe — that is present in much of Haydn's music.

ONCE AGAIN I was struck by Thomas' absolutely right tempos, by his keen ear for balances, and by his excellent control of rhythmic energy.

The afternoon closed with Nielsen's Fifth Symphony. This is a work whose programmatic significance — the struggle between the forces of light and darkness — always has seemed to this listener a little too blatant to be successful. I should add, however, that Thomas, who has a superb grasp of the work's architectural dynamics, came close to coverting me yesterday.

By any reasonable standards the orchestra's principal clarinetist, Harold Wright, would have exhausted his quota of superlatives from this column. Standards that are merely reasonable seem inadequate for this artist, however, and mention will have to be made of his stunningly beautiful playing of the clarinet solo at the end of the first movement of the Nielsen.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 4 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 5 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening December 17 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BIRTWISTLE — Tragoedia
Prologue – parodos – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – epeisodion – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – exodos

first performance in Boston

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
Adagio – vivace
Adagio ma non troppo
Menuetto & trio: allegretto
Presto assai

intermission

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

BOSTON GLOBE DEC 6, 1970

BSO's Thomas conducts Nielsen's 5th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In his program note on Carl Nielsen's 5th Symphony, which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, Klaus George Roy interestingly groups the composer with other troubled, brooding Scandinavians, Andersen, Ibsen, Strindberg, Bergman, Hammarskjold, and goes on to suggest a specific parallel between Nielsen's music and Andersen's "demonic, grim, frightening" stories. Certainly the 5th Symphony, finished and first performed in 1922, though not played in this country until 1951, is a remarkably conceived drama in music and, when projected as effectively as in Friday's performance, a powerfully gripping one.

There are two movements to this symphony, and in the first, the gradually emerging protagonist is the side drum, which interrupts the flow with a series of military tattoos, seems to try even to break up the performance altogether with a furious cadenza that is improvised while the orchestra continues to play, but with the last word given to the gentleness of a single clarinent. In a way, all that, the anthropomorphic characterizations of instruments and the victory of the still, small voice, is like an anticipation of some of Elliott Carter, though Nielsen, for all of the original flavor of his speech, is generally more interesting because of the expressive use to which he puts a familiar language than for extensions in the possibilities of the langage itself.

Perhaps it is because the scenario of the second movement is less challenging that the music, though it is all absorbing to listen to and worked out with great skill, makes a more obvious sort of impression. Nielsen has something to say that nobody else has quite thought to say, and he has a voice of his own in which to say it as well as the persuasive, projective power to make you listen. The discovery of Nielsen, late though it was, is a real enrichment of our musical experience. Now that the Boston Symphony has done the 5th Symphony several times, also the 3rd and 6th Symphonies and the Flute Concerto, they will, I hope, soon give us the vibrant 4th as well. The performance yesterday of the 5th was persuasive on all counts, and there was distinguished solo playing, from Arthur Press as the enraged drummer and from clarinetist Harold Wright.

The concert was to have begun with the first performance here of "Tragoedia" by the young English composer, Harrison Birtwistle. Thomas, however, decided that the piece was not yet ready to go as well as he thought it should—it was postponed rather than cancelled, and a new date will be announced soon—and that decision brought the unexpected pleasure of a second hearing of Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3. It had been played on a couple of the Tuesday series in October (and reviewed then), and once again it came across as a fresh, delightful, surprising, exquisitely scored work. This time, too, it pleased the audience very much indeed.

The program also included Hayden's Symphony No. 97 in C major, one of the greatest of the London series that is witty in a particularly cool way, and one where Haydn is most adventurous about the orchestra itself, so much so that he keeps offering written-out, varied repeats to accommodate his flow of fantasy in scoring. From Thomas's conducting I could tell that he knows what is supposed to happen in the piece, even though rather little of it did, in fact, happen, the performance being strangely lifeless and distant as well as inelegantly played.

Symphony: drums and trumpets

By Louis Snyder

There was a plenitude of drums and trumpets in the Boston Symphony program that Michael Tilson Thomas directed over the weekend at Symphony Hall. From a complement of seven performers in Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3 (which was substituted for the announced Birtwistle's "Tragoedia") to a stageful of instrumentalists in the closing Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen, percussion and brass were most favored by their composers. Haydn, in the intervening Symphony No. 97 in C, likewise neglected to give strings all the lines.

On second hearing, the Harrison Canticle, which Mr. Thomas introduced earlier this season, retained the flavor and exoticism produced by a variety of percussion instruments of the bell, pipe, block, and rattle variety, supplemented by an ocarina and a guitar. This time, the guitar sounded unduly electrified, producing a false and artificial timbre, which detracted from the natural metal and wood tones of its partners. Mr. Thomas and the players executed this rhythmic exercise to perfection, despite its excessive length.

Of Haydn's 104 symphonies, some are bound to be more engaging than others, and No. 97 seems to be one of the others. On Friday afternoon, at least, it meandered on its course proficiently, but without exuding much charm—less a matter of performance than of musical content, which occasionally explodes pleasantly, in a firecracker kind of way, then goes blithely on its course.

By contrast, the program's "big work"—Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony — is all sound and fury. Gradually, it is working its way into the symphonic repertory (the BSO last played it two years ago), where it will have no difficulty making an impression on first-time hearers. It is constructed on a grand scale, with deft musical effects to accentuate its at once somber and urgent cast. One cannot help but respond, for instance, to the rhythmic first-movement battle between the insistent snare-drum (superbly played by Arthur Press) and the orchestra's textural grandeur, or the pacifying influence of Harold Wright's beautiful clarinet solo which brings the movement to an end. And so, hopefully, it will win the status of an old acquaintance.

Mr. Thomas achieved his usual tastefully controlled results in each part of this program which will be repeated on Thursday, Dec. 17, at Symphony Hall.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR DEC 7, 1970

Canticle No. 3

The Boston Symphony has announced that Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3 will replace Harrison Birtwistle's "Tragoedia" in the concerts conducted today, tomorrow and Tuesday by Michael Tilson Thomas.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 4 1970
New England Newsclip

More matter? art?

The recent concerts in which Michael Tilson Thomas, assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performed works of Lou Harrison, Haydn and Carl Nielsen, may have disappointed you if you were judging the orchestra by its highest recent standards (let alone those of the pre-1950 era), but the music was good and not overfamiliar, and the way it was put across was, at the very least, attention-sustaining. It may be that Thomas, more than most conductors, has psyched out the needs and weaknesses of the kind of audience he has at his back. Subscribers coming away from such displays know they have heard something, all right, and their response is neither indifference nor despair. It's quite different from conducting for recordings and posterity; it's a strange mixture of the didactic and the demagogic.

By those traditional standards, much of the playing was a mess. The B.S.O.'s shortcomings in ensemble housekeeping and etiquette (once again: non-unanimous string attack, dynamic monotony stuck at medium-loud, raucous brasses, unreliable intonation, personnel deadwood) are proverbial by now, and one shouldn't nag. What was interesting was that Thomas got this soloistic rabble to play badly his way; there were plentiful evidences of intelligent intent along with the hyperkinesis. This meant that Haydn's C Major Symphony, No. 97, exhibited a lot of the physical enthusiasm and plethoric invention that that key seemed to inspire in this particular composer. There was some rare, hushed playing from the reduced performing group, and also the commoner play-it-out style when called for: the standard big band manner was clearly out.

Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3, substituting for the postponed Birtwistle Tragoedia, made its second appearance this season. The consensus, one I don't quarrel with, is that this early 1940s California emanation, for a spirited little ensemble of occarina, guitar and an array of percussion instruments from varied archaeological and industrial sources, is one of the more successful meetings of East and West.

Saturday's performance of the Nielsen 5th Symphony was as impassioned and broad as you could wish, though a work so high in emotional content and full of idiosyncratic sonorities as this can't really be ineffectively played. It's rather futile to try to describe, either technically or metaphorically, the effect of this Manichaean Good-Evil, War vs. Life-Affirmation piece if you don't know it. I must point out, though, that it contains some of the best instances of musical tics and compulsivity in all the literature. Harold Wright's clarinet playing was technically and artistically beyond praise, and the maniacally disruptive drumming of Arthur Press was all that Nielsen could have asked for. Throughout all this, Mr. Thomas' expenditure of calories and foot-pounds must have been considerable.

—RICHARD BUELL

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY
DEC 15 1970

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
NOV 29 1970

Boston Concerts

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the ninth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8.30 p.m. The program opens with Birtwistle's "Tragoedia," followed by Haydn's Symphony No. 97, and, following intermission, Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

12

Delightful Canticle No. 3 Substituted on Symphony Program

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 5 1970
New England Newsclip

By HARRY NEVILLE

Harrison Birtwistle's "Tragoedia" was removed from yesterday's Boston Symphony program, presumably because in a schedule that also included Nielsen's Fifth Symphony there was insufficient rehearsal time to put it together properly.

The omission is regrettable since Birtwistle, one of the most interesting of Britain's younger composers, is so little heard here, and one hopes that "Tragoedia" can be rescheduled later.

THE LOSS DID HAVE a delightful consequence, and that was the substitution of Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3, which will be heard again at tonight's concert. The work is scored for seven players: ocarina, guitar and a percussion ensemble (five players) which includes six muted iron pipes, five muted brake drums, three suspended brake drums, six water buffalo bells, two Egyptian rattles, three elephant bells (small, medium and large) and a variety of other arcane and not so arcane instruments.

One might expect from this assemblage some pretty raucous sounds, and one would be entirely wrong, for what Harrison wrote is a work of unusual subtlety, refinement and charm — one whose rhythmic patterns and sonic surface suggest Eastern music but whose formal scheme establishes a Western context.

In a beautifully conceived program, Michael Tilson Thomas also conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 97 in C. Thomas is a splendid interpreter of Haydn, partly because he conveys so well a certain hard to describe quality — "lusty elegance" comes close, I believe — that is present in much of Haydn's music.

ONCE AGAIN I was struck by Thomas' absolutely right tempos, by his keen ear for balances, and by his excellent control of rhythmic energy.

The afternoon closed with Nielsen's Fifth Symphony. This is a work whose programmatic significance — the struggle between the forces of light and darkness — always has seemed to this listener a little too blatant to be successful. I should add, however, that Thomas, who has a superb grasp of the work's architectural dynamics, came close to coverting me yesterday.

By any reasonable standards the orchestra's principal clarinetist, Harold Wright, would have exhausted his quota of superlatives from this column. Standards that are merely reasonable seem inadequate for this artist, however, and mention will have to be made of his stunningly beautiful playing of the clarinet solo at the end of the first movement of the Nielsen.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 4 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 5 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening December 17 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BIRTWISTLE — Tragoedia
Prologue – parodos – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – epeisodion – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – exodos

first performance in Boston

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
Adagio – vivace
Adagio ma non troppo
Menuetto & trio: allegretto
Presto assai

intermission

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

BOSTON GLOBE DEC 6, 1970

BSO's Thomas conducts Nielsen's 5th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

In his program note on Carl Nielsen's 5th Symphony, which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, Klaus George Roy interestingly groups the composer with other troubled, brooding Scandinavians, Andersen, Ibsen, Strindberg, Bergman, Hammarskjold, and goes on to suggest a specific parallel between Nielsen's music and Andersen's "demonic, grim, frightening" stories. Certainly the 5th Symphony, finished and first performed in 1922, though not played in this country until 1951, is a remarkably conceived drama in music and, when projected as effectively as in Friday's performance, a powerfully gripping one.

There are two movements to this symphony, and in the first, the gradually emerging protagonist is the side drum, which interrupts the flow with a series of military tattoos, seems to try even to break up the performance altogether with a furious cadenza that is improvised while the orchestra continues to play, but with the last word given to the gentleness of a single clarinent. In a way, all that, the anthropomorphic characterizations of instruments and the victory of the still, small voice, is like an anticipation of some of Elliott Carter, though Nielsen, for all of the original flavor of his speech, is generally more interesting because of the expressive use to which he puts a familiar language than for extensions in the possibilities of the langage itself.

Perhaps it is because the scenario of the second movement is less challenging that the music, though it is all absorbing to listen to and worked out with great skill, makes a more obvious sort of impression. Nielsen has something to say that nobody else has quite thought to say, and he has a voice of his own in which to say it as well as the persuasive, projective power to make you listen. The discovery of Nielsen, late though it was, is a real enrichment of our musical experience. Now that the Boston Symphony has done the 5th Symphony several times, also the 3rd and 6th Symphonies and the Flute Concerto, they will, I hope, soon give us the vibrant 4th as well. The performance yesterday of the 5th was persuasive on all counts, and there was distinguished solo playing, from Arthur Press as the enraged drummer and from clarinetist Harold Wright.

The concert was to have begun with the first performance here of "Tragoedia" by the young English composer, Harrison Birtwistle. Thomas, however, decided that the piece was not yet ready to go as well as he thought it should—it was postponed rather than cancelled, and a new date will be announced soon—and that decision brought the unexpected pleasure of a second hearing of Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3. It had been played on a couple of the Tuesday series in October (and reviewed then), and once again it came across as a fresh, delightful, surprising, exquisitely scored work. This time, too, it pleased the audience very much indeed.

The program also included Hayden's Symphony No. 97 in C major, one of the greatest of the London series that is witty in a particularly cool way, and one where Haydn is most adventurous about the orchestra itself, so much so that he keeps offering written-out, varied repeats to accommodate his flow of fantasy in scoring. From Thomas's conducting I could tell that he knows what is supposed to happen in the piece, even though rather little of it did, in fact, happen, the performance being strangely lifeless and distant as well as inelegantly played.

Symphony: drums and trumpets

By Louis Snyder

There was a plenitude of drums and trumpets in the Boston Symphony program that Michael Tilson Thomas directed over the weekend at Symphony Hall. From a complement of seven performers in Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3 (which was substituted for the announced Birtwistle's "Tragoedia") to a stageful of instrumentalists in the closing Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen, percussion and brass were most favored by their composers. Haydn, in the intervening Symphony No. 97 in C, likewise neglected to give strings all the lines.

On second hearing, the Harrison Canticle, which Mr. Thomas introduced earlier this season, retained the flavor and exoticism produced by a variety of percussion instruments of the bell, pipe, block, and rattle variety, supplemented by an ocarina and a guitar. This time, the guitar sounded unduly electrified, producing a false and artificial timbre, which detracted from the natural metal and wood tones of its partners. Mr. Thomas and the players executed this rhythmic exercise to perfection, despite its excessive length.

Of Haydn's 104 symphonies, some are bound to be more engaging than others, and No. 97 seems to be one of the others. On Friday afternoon, at least, it meandered on its course proficiently, but without exuding much charm—less a matter of performance than of musical content, which occasionally explodes pleasantly, in a firecracker kind of way, then goes blithely on its course.

By contrast, the program's "big work"—Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony — is all sound and fury. Gradually, it is working its way into the symphonic repertory (the BSO last played it two years ago), where it will have no difficulty making an impression on first-time hearers. It is constructed on a grand scale, with deft musical effects to accentuate its at once somber and urgent cast. One cannot help but respond, for instance, to the rhythmic first-movement battle between the insistent snare-drum (superbly played by Arthur Press) and the orchestra's textural grandeur, or the pacifying influence of Harold Wright's beautiful clarinet solo which brings the movement to an end. And so, hopefully, it will win the status of an old acquaintance.

Mr. Thomas achieved his usual tastefully controlled results in each part of this program which will be repeated on Thursday, Dec. 17, at Symphony Hall.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR DEC 7, 1970

Canticle No. 3

The Boston Symphony has announced that Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3 will replace Harrison Birtwistle's "Tragoedia" in the concerts conducted today, tomorrow and Tuesday by Michael Tilson Thomas.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 4 1970
New England Newsclip

More matter? art?

The recent concerts in which Michael Tilson Thomas, assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performed works of Lou Harrison, Haydn and Carl Nielsen, may have disappointed you if you were judging the orchestra by its highest recent standards (let alone those of the pre-1950 era), but the music was good and not overfamiliar, and the way it was put across was, at the very least, attention-sustaining. It may be that Thomas, more than most conductors, has psyched out the needs and weaknesses of the kind of audience he has at his back. Subscribers coming away from such displays know they have heard something, all right, and their response is neither indifference nor despair. It's quite different from conducting for recordings and posterity; it's a strange mixture of the didactic and the demagogic.

By those traditional standards, much of the playing was a mess. The B.S.O.'s shortcomings in ensemble housekeeping and etiquette (once again: non-unanimous string attack, dynamic monotony stuck at medium-loud, raucous brasses, unreliable intonation, personnel deadwood) are proverbial by now, and one shouldn't nag. What was interesting was that Thomas got this soloistic rabble to play badly his way; there were plentiful evidences of intelligent intent along with the hyperkinesis. This meant that Haydn's C Major Symphony, No. 97, exhibited a lot of the physical enthusiasm and plethoric invention that that key seemed to inspire in this particular composer. There was some rare, hushed playing from the reduced performing group, and also the commoner play-it-out style when called for: the standard big band manner was clearly out.

Lou Harrison's Canticle No. 3, substituting for the postponed Birtwistle Tragoedia, made its second appearance this season. The consensus, one I don't quarrel with, is that this early 1940s California emanation, for a spirited little ensemble of occarina, guitar and an array of percussion instruments from varied archaeological and industrial sources, is one of the more successful meetings of East and West.

Saturday's performance of the Nielsen 5th Symphony was as impassioned and broad as you could wish, though a work so high in emotional content and full of idiosyncratic sonorities as this can't really be ineffectively played. It's rather futile to try to describe, either technically or metaphorically, the effect of this Manichaean Good-Evil, War vs. Life-Affirmation piece if you don't know it. I must point out, though, that it contains some of the best instances of musical tics and compulsivity in all the literature. Harold Wright's clarinet playing was technically and artistically beyond praise, and the maniacally disruptive drumming of Arthur Press was all that Nielsen could have asked for. Throughout all this, Mr. Thomas' expenditure of calories and foot-pounds must have been considerable.

—RICHARD BUELL

BOSTON
BOSTON
DEC 15 1970

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
NOV 29 1970

Boston Concerts

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the ninth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8.30 p.m. The program opens with Birtwistle's "Tragoedia," followed by Haydn's Symphony No. 97, and, following intermission, Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

Roths to Play With Boston Symphony

SALEM, ORE.
OREGON STATESMAN
D. 35,000 S. 35,500
DEC 10 1970

A Salem man and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Roth, will be two of the guest performers to appear with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday of this week and the following Tuesday. Kenneth, son of the Marvin Roths, and Nancy are working on their master's degrees in performance of early music at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

William Steinberg is conductor of the Symphony, which will perform a composition by Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory. The work is entitled "Concerto for Renaissance instruments and Symphony Orchestra. This will be the first public performance of the concerto.

Renaissance Instruments

Both Kenneth and Nancy play early Renaissance instruments, including the recorder, lute, racquette and baroque oboe. The latter will be played by Mr. Roth with the Symphony. They both performed each evening at the Shakespearean Festival in Ashland last summer and hope to return this coming season.

The Roths are planning to come West for Christmas and will visit in Salem at the Marvin Roth home and in Santa Barbara, Calif. with her parents. Mr. Roth played the oboe with the Salem Junior Symphony and the Salem Community Symphony before going East to school.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

Museum piece

Program note by the composer

Schuller was born in New York on November 22 1925. He completed Museum piece last month. The work was commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, in celebration of its centennial year.

The group of renaissance instruments includes 2 sopranino recorders, 2 soprano recorders, 2 alto recorders, tenor recorder, renaissance bass flute; 2 soprano shawms, 2 alto shawms, bass shawm (the shawm was the European precursor of the oboe); 3 alto crumhorns, tenor crumhorn, bass crumhorn (the crumhorn, another early member of the oboe family, has its reed covered by a pierced cap, so that its sound is as unchangeable as that of an organ reed); bass racket (another member of the oboe family, the racket is a short, thick cylinder of wood pierced lengthways by ten cylindrical channels connected to form a continuous tube); 2 cornetti (wooden instruments with cup-shaped mouthpieces); sackbut (the ancestor of the trombone); 3 viole da gamba; 2 lutes; harpsichord; regal (a portable reed organ); triangle and drum.

The instruments of the symphony orchestra required are 2 flutes, piccolo, alto flute, 2 oboes, english horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 2 trumpets, 2 trombones, tuba, timpani, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, snare drum, harp, celeste, piano and strings.

Museum piece is the fulfillment of a long-time desire to compose a work which would juxtapose the sonorities and special qualities of Renaissance instruments with the instruments of the modern symphony orchestra. I thought it particularly apt to write such a work on this occasion, since the Boston Museum of Fine Arts owns a fine collection of old instruments — some of which are being used in these performances — and further, it would enable three of Boston's most venerable institutions to collaborate on this project: the Museum through its commissioning of the work and permitting the use of its old instruments, the Boston Symphony for supplying the 'modern orchestra', the New England Conservatory for supplying the fifteen soloists, all members of the Conservatory's Collegium Musicum (Director: Daniel Pinkham).

The piece is in four movements. In the first of these, Rustic shimmerings, a very light, transparent, shimmering background in solo instruments of the orchestra sets off the one-by-one entrance of the Renaissance instruments: soprano and alto recorders, soprano shawm, alto and bass crumhorns, cornetto and sackbut. This initial flurry of sound leads to a sustained section in which three gambas and the regal (a small Renaissance reed organ) provide a 'pedal point' accompaniment for a recorder cadenza. A chatty Allegro for the full solo ensemble forms the main body of the movement, ending quietly with a lyric Renaissance bass flute solo, accompanied sparsely by lute and harpsichord.

By way of contrast, the second movement is a lively Scherzo titled A play of sonorities (duets and trios). As this title implies, various duet and trio combinations are played against each other, with a particular emphasis on alternating the 'ancient' and 'modern' counterparts. Thus, two flutes are juxtaposed with two recorders, two oboes with two shawms, two bassoons with bass shawm and a bass racket (an ancestor of the modern bassoon), two clarinets with two crumhorns. The three old 'brass' instruments — two cornetts and sackbut (N.B. the cornetts over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition

The musical composition that the Museum of Fine Arts commissioned Gunther Schuller, president of the financially ailing New England Conservatory of Music, to write for its centennial gets its premiere performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this weekend's concerts. It's the first time the museum, the conservatory and the orchestra ever got together on a joint venture.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 9 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 11 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 12 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 15 1970 at 8.30

TOC

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

SCHULLER Museum piece
Rustic shimmerings
A play of sonorities (duets and trios)
Serenades
Canzon da sonar interr

CHO

SUZANNE CLEVERDON regal
RICHARD COOK cornetto
RAY CUTLER sackbut
SUSAN GILLESPIE viola da gamba
DAVID HART alto crumhorn, tenor crumhorn, lute, drum
ADRIENNE HARTZELL viola da gamba
NANCY JOYCE soprano, alto and tenor recorders, alto crumhorn, renaissance bass flute
GISELA KRAUSE sopranino, soprano and alto recorders
PHILIP LONG bass crumhorn, bass shawm, triangle
RAYMOND MASE cornetto
HENRY MOLLICONE harpsichord
KENNETH ROTH soprano and alto shawm, bass racket, sopranino recorder
ROBERT PAUL SULLIVAN lute
ELIZABETH STOLL viola da gamba
HENRY TERVO soprano and alto shawm, alto crumhorn

WAG

Friday
10.30

Joseph

world première

in celebration of the centennial of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair of Friday -Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America - Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
DEC 5 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Weekending will start with the Boston Symphony's premiere of Gunther Schuller's latest bit of composing — "Museum Piece" — which will stash into a reception line after the concert of the Museum of Fine Arts' International patrons who are also BSO subscribers (85 is the count to date). Schuller's home base, the New England BSO is making this its official 90th anniversary salute to the Museum's Centennial! Saturday subscribers will repeat the three-way gesture.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 10 1970

Steinberg conducts symphony

The tenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1970 at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director conducts the Orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut.

The program opens with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's Museum piece, commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their one-hundredth anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony no. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program includes Lopatnikoff's Festival overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

Thursday evening, Dec. 10 the Orchestra plays the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 10 1970

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 10 1970

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, who won the Leventritt Award in 1969, is still in his early twenties. He made his successful debut in New York three years ago, and has since that time been engaged as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra and the orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Denver and New Haven. He has also signed a contract with RCA Records.

Born in Tel-Aviv in January 1946, Joseph Kalichstein won scholarships from the America – Israel Cultural Foundation to study with Joshua Shor at the Shor Conservatory. He came to New York in 1962 to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School. He studied later with Ilona Kabos. This season he appears on both sides of the Atlantic in recital and with orchestras. His first recording, on the Vanguard label and released in 1968, includes sonatas by Prokofiev and Bartók. Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
DEC 10 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Symphony Orchestra Concerts Scheduled

The tenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
DEC 10 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
DEC 10 1970

Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, was inaugurated as the ninth president of the New England Conservatory of Music on November 16 1967. He was brought up in an atmosphere of music — his father was a violinist of the New York philharmonic Orchestra — and at the age of twelve began himself to perform actively, joining the St Thomas Choir School as a boy soprano, and starting the study of composition, flute, and, later, french horn.

He started composing two years later, when he wrote his first symphony; he developed so rapidly in his study of the french horn that in 1942, at the age of sixteen, he was offered a professional position with the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. At seventeen, he became solo french horn with the Cincinnati Symphony, and the following year performed his own Horn Concerto with the orchestra directed by Eugene Goossens. By the time he was nineteen he had accepted a position in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. His Symphony for brass and percussion, written in 1949, received its first public performance under the direction of Leon Barzin and was later performed by the New York philharmonic under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. In 1959, Gunther Schuller resigned his position as solo horn with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra in order to devote more time to creative work.

He has received commissions from many of the major orchestras in this country: Gala music, written for the 75th Anniversary of the Chicago Symphony; Spectra, commissioned by the New York Philharmonic; Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee, commissioned by a Ford Foundation grant for the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. He was commissioned to write a ballet for the New York City Ballet which was choreographed by George Balanchine. Major European orchestras have also commissioned works: the opera The Visitation was commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera Company. This work was given its first American production by the San Francisco Opera Company in 1967, and has been presented since at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and in other cities in Europe and America. His String quartet was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation for the University of Illinois; Music for brass quintet by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation; Double quintet for woodwinds and brass by the University of Southern California. The sacred cantata — Psalm XCVIII, written on commission from the American Guild of Organists, received its first performance at the Guild's annual convention in Atlanta, Georgia, in June 1966 and was heard in Boston in December 1967 in a concert at Symphony Hall, performed by the New England Conservatory Chorus. One of Schuller's more recent works, Triplum, was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic for its 125th Anniversary celebrations and was recorded by the Orchestra with Leonard Bernstein conducting. In honor of its 60th Anniversary, the Junior League of Boston announced the commissioning of a children's opera to be written by Gunther Schuller. The opera, which was performed for the first time by the Opera Company of Boston on May 8 of this year, is set to a libretto by John Updike, based on the fairy tale The fisherman and his wife by the Brothers Grimm. Gunther Schuller's long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet has led him to compose many works for this group, as well as for Ornette Coleman and the late Eric Dolphy. An absorbing example of his compositions in the 'third stream' idiom is his Conversations, performed by the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Beaux Arts String Quartet in an album on Atlantic Records entitled Third Stream Music.

As a conductor, he has made guest appearances with the orchestras in Cincinnati, Los Angeles, St Louis, Baltimore, Minneapolis, Cleveland, New York, Chicago, Rochester, Washington and San Francisco. In Europe, he has conducted the BBC Symphony, the Berlin Free Radio Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Philharmonia Orchestra of London, the Philharmonic Orchestra of the French Radio (O.R.T.F.) as well as the Icelandic Symphony Orchestra. Last season he led concerts by the Boston Philharmonia, the Springfield Symphony and the Minnesota Orchestra.

A series of concerts entitled 'Twentieth Century innovations', sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation, was organized and conducted by Schuller in New York City from 1963 through 1965. Also in New York, over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 11 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 12 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 15 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

SCHULLER — Museum piece

Rustic shimmerings
A play of sonorities (duets and trios)
Serenades
Canzon da sonar

SUZANNE CLEVERDON regal
RICHARD COOK cornetto
RAY CUTLER sackbut
SUSAN GILLESPIE viola da gamba
DAVID HART alto crumhorn, tenor crumhorn, lute, drum
ADRIENNE HARTZELL viola da gamba
NANCY JOYCE soprano, alto and tenor recorders, alto crumhorn, renaissance bass flute
GISELA KRAUSE sopranino, soprano and alto recorders
PHILIP LONG bass crumhorn, bass shawm, triangle
RAYMOND MASE cornetto
HENRY MOLLICONE harpsichord
KENNETH ROTH soprano and alto shawm, bass racket, sopranino recorder
ROBERT PAUL SULLIVAN lute
ELIZABETH STOLL viola da gamba
HENRY TERVO soprano and alto shawm, alto crumhorn

world première

in celebration of the centennial of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 10 1970

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair f Friday -Saturday concerts y the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 t 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 .m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
DEC 5 1970

THE SOLOIST

Kalichstein won scholarships tion to study with Joshua S New York in 1962 to study School. He studied later wit both sides of the Atlantic in ing, on the Vanguard label Prokofiev and Bartók. Joseph ton Symphony Orchestra at

He has received commissions from many of the major orchestras in this country: Gala music, written for the 75th Anniversary of the Chicago Symphony; Spectra, commissioned by the New York Philharmonic; Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee, commissioned by a Ford Foundation grant for the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. He was commissioned to write a ballet for the New York City Ballet which was choreographed by George Balanchine. Major European orchestras have also commissioned works: the opera The Visitation was commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera Company. This work was given its first American production by the San Francisco Opera Company in 1967, and has been presented since at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and in other cities in Europe and America. His String quartet was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation for the University of Illinois; Music for brass quintet by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation; Double quintet for woodwinds and brass by the University of Southern California. The sacred cantata — Psalm XCVIII, written on commission from the American Guild of Organists, received its first performance at the Guild's annual convention in Atlanta, Georgia, in June 1966 and was heard in Boston in December 1967 in a concert at Symphony Hall, performed by the New England Conservatory Chorus. One of Schuller's more recent works, Triplum, was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic for its 125th Anniversary celebrations and was recorded by the Orchestra with Leonard Bernstein conducting. In honor of its 60th Anniversary, the Junior League of Boston announced the commissioning of a children's opera to be written by Gunther Schuller. The opera, which was performed for the first time by the Opera Company of Boston on May 8 of this year, is set to a libretto by John Updike, based on the fairy tale The fisherman and his wife by the Brothers Grimm. Gunther Schuller's long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet has led him to compose many works for this group, as well as for Ornette Coleman and the late Eric Dolphy. An absorbing example of his compositions in the 'third stream' idiom is his Conversations, performed by the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Beaux Arts String Quartet in an album on Atlantic Records entitled Third Stream Music.

As a conductor, he has made guest appearances with the orchestras in Cincinnati, Los Angeles, St Louis, Baltimore, Minneapolis, Cleveland, New York, Chicago, Rochester, Washington and San Francisco. In Europe, he has conducted the BBC Symphony, the Berlin Free Radio Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Philharmonia Orchestra of London, the Philharmonic Orchestra of the French Radio (O.R.T.F.) as well as the Icelandic Symphony Orchestra. Last season he led concerts by the Boston Philharmonia, the Springfield Symphony and the Minnesota Orchestra.

A series of concerts entitled 'Twentieth Century innovations', sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation, was organized and conducted by Schuller in New York City from 1963 through 1965. Also in New York, over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 11 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 12 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 15 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

SCHULLER — Museum piece

Rustic shimmerings
A play of sonorities (duets and trios)
Serenades
Canzon da sonar

SUZANNE CLEVERDON regal
RICHARD COOK cornetto
RAY CUTLER sackbut
SUSAN GILLESPIE viola da gamba
DAVID HART alto crumhorn, tenor crumhorn, lute, drum
ADRIENNE HARTZELL viola da gamba
NANCY JOYCE soprano, alto and tenor recorders, alto crumhorn, renaissance bass flute
GISELA KRAUSE sopranino, soprano and alto recorders
PHILIP LONG bass crumhorn, bass shawm, triangle
RAYMOND MASE cornetto
HENRY MOLLICONE harpsichord
KENNETH ROTH soprano and alto shawm, bass racket, sopranino recorder
ROBERT PAUL SULLIVAN lute
ELIZABETH STOLL viola da gamba
HENRY TERVO soprano and alto shawm, alto crumhorn

world première

in celebration of the centennial of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 10 1970

Steinberg conducts symphony

The tenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1970 at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director conducts the Orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut.

The program opens with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's Museum piece, commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their one-hundredth anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony no. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program includes Lopatnikoff's Festival overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

Thursday evening, Dec. 10 the Orchestra plays the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 10 1970

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 10 1970

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair of Friday -Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America - Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
DEC 5 1970

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, who won the Leventritt Award in 1969, is still in his early twenties. He made his successful debut in New York three years ago, and has since that time been engaged as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra and the orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Denver and New Haven. He has also signed a contract with RCA Records.

Born in Tel-Aviv in January 1946, Joseph Kalichstein won scholarships from the America – Israel Cultural Foundation to study with Joshua Shor at the Shor Conservatory. He came to New York in 1962 to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School. He studied later with Ilona Kabos. This season he appears on both sides of the Atlantic in recital and with orchestras. His first recording, on the Vanguard label and released in 1968, includes sonatas by Prokofiev and Bartók. Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

The musical composition that the Museum of Fine Arts commissioned Gunther Schuller, president of the financially ailing New England Conservatory of Music, to write for its centennial gets its premiere performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this weekend's concerts. It's the first time the museum, the conservatory and the orchestra ever got together on a joint venture.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 9 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Weekending will start with the Boston Symphony's premiere of Gunther Schuller's latest bit of composing — "Museum Piece" — which will stash into a reception line after the concert of the Museum of Fine Arts' International patrons who are also BSO subscribers (85 is the count to date). Schuller's home base, the New England BSO is making this its official 90th anniversary salute to the Museum's Centennial! Saturday subscribers will repeat the three-way gesture.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
DEC 10 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Symphony Orchestra Concerts Scheduled

The tenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
DEC 10 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
DEC 10 1970

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 10 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 11 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 12 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 15 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

SCHULLER Museum piece

Rustic shimmerings
A play of sonorities (duets and trios)
Serenades
Canzon da sonar

SUZANNE CLEVERDON regal
RICHARD COOK cornetto
RAY CUTLER sackbut
SUSAN GILLESPIE viola da gamba
DAVID HART alto crumhorn, tenor crumhorn, lute, drum
ADRIENNE HARTZELL viola da gamba
NANCY JOYCE soprano, alto and tenor recorders, alto crumhorn, renaissance bass flute
GISELA KRAUSE sopranino, soprano and alto recorders
PHILIP LONG bass crumhorn, bass shawm, triangle
RAYMOND MASE cornetto
HENRY MOLLICONE harpsichord
KENNETH ROTH soprano and alto shawm, bass racket, sopranino recorder
ROBERT PAUL SULLIVAN lute
ELIZABETH STOLL viola da gamba
HENRY TERVO soprano and alto shawm, alto crumhorn

world premiere

in celebration of the centennial of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair of Friday -Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
DEC 5 1970
GLOBE

Kalichstein won scholar
tion to study with Josh
New York in 1962 to School. He studied late both sides of the Atlant ing, on the Vanguard l Prokofiev and Bartók. Jo ton Symphony Orchestr

THE SOLOIST

-MINU
LEXIN

Department of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood from 1963 to 1965. In 1965, he was appointed Head of the Composition Department, succeeding Aaron Copland, and three years later Head of Contemporary Music Activities. He served on the faculty of Yale University as Associate Professor, a post he left to become President of the New England Conservatory.

His musico-analytical study of jazz, Early jazz: its roots and musical development, was published two years ago by Oxford University Press, the house which also published his book on Horn technique in 1962.

Gunther Schuller has been the recipient of such awards as a National Institute of Arts and Letters award in 1960, the Brandeis Creative Arts Award in 1960, and a Guggenheim Fellowship for two successive years. In 1967 he was elected a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and is a member of the Music Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. Earlier this year he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to the Commonwealth's Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Works by Gunther Schuller have been performed by the Boston Symphony in past seasons, and Erich Leinsdorf conducted the recording of Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee for RCA Records. Schuller has himself conducted the Orchestra in 1964, 1966, 1967 and 1970.

ERNST TOCH
Symphony no. 2 op. 73
Program note by John N. Burk and the composer

Toch was born in Vienna on December 7 1887; he died in Los Angeles on October 1 1964. He composed the Second symphony in Zürich in 1951. The first performance was given on January 11 1952 by the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Herbert Häfner, at the Grosser Musikvereins-Saal, Vienna. The Boston Symphony first played the Symphony on December 12 1952; Charles Munch conducted. Mr Munch repeated the work on February 18 and 19 1955.

The instrumentation: 2 flutes, piccolo, 2 oboes, english horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, 2 harps, piano (4 hands), timpani (2 players), organ and strings.

When this symphony had its first performance in Vienna the program bore a message from the composer, here translated by himself:

'For many years I had been moved profoundly by the figure of a man whom I had come to revere more than any of those who live today and equal only to a handful of those who lived in the past. This vital experience I sought to express in the words of my dedication:

'To the man who kindled this work in me
To the lonely seer in time of darkness
To the only victor in a world of victims

ALBERT SCHWEITZER

(Schweitzer and I have never met personally, and I had never in any way corresponded with him.)

... Gunther Schuller ... Metropolitan Opera Orches- ... to creative work.

SALEM, ORE.
OREGON STATESMAN
D. 35,000 S. 35,500
DEC 10 1970

Roths to Play With Boston Symphony

A Salem man and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Roth, will be two of the guest performers to appear with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday of this week and the following Tuesday. Kenneth, son of the Marvin Roths, and Nancy are working on their master's degrees in performance of early music at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

William Steinberg is conductor of the Symphony, which will perform a composition by Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory. The work is entitled "Concerto for Renaissance instruments and Symphony Orchestra. This will be the first public performance of the concerto.

Renaissance Instruments

Both Kenneth and Nancy play early Renaissance instruments, including the recorder, lute, racquette and baroque oboe. The latter will be played by Mr. Roth with the Symphony. They both performed each evening at the Shakespearean Festival in Ashland last summer and hope to return this coming season.

The Roths are planning to come West for Christmas and will visit in Salem at the Marvin Roth home and in Santa Barbara, Calif. with her parents. Mr. Roth played the oboe with the Salem Junior Symphony and the Salem Community Symphony before going East to school.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

Museum piece

Program note by the composer

Schuller was born in New York on November 22 1925. He completed Museum piece last month. The work was commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, in celebration of its centennial year.

The group of renaissance instruments includes 2 sopranino recorders, 2 soprano recorders, 2 alto recorders, tenor recorder, renaissance bass flute; 2 soprano shawms, 2 alto shawms, bass shawm (the shawm was the European precursor of the oboe); 3 alto crumhorns, tenor crumhorn, bass crumhorn (the crumhorn, another early member of the oboe family, has its reed covered by a pierced cap, so that its sound is as unchangeable as that of an organ reed); bass racket (another member of the oboe family, the racket is a short, thick cylinder of wood pierced lengthways by ten cylindrical channels connected to form a continuous tube); 2 cornetti (wooden instruments with cup-shaped mouthpieces); sackbut (the ancestor of the trombone); 3 viole da gamba; 2 lutes; harpsichord; regal (a portable reed organ); triangle and drum.

The instruments of the symphony orchestra required are 2 flutes, piccolo, alto flute, 2 oboes, english horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 2 trumpets, 2 trombones, tuba, timpani, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, snare drum, harp, celeste, piano and strings.

Museum piece is the fulfillment of a long-time desire to compose a work which would juxtapose the sonorities and special qualities of Renaissance instruments with the instruments of the modern symphony orchestra. I thought it particularly apt to write such a work on this occasion, since the Boston Museum of Fine Arts owns a fine collection of old instruments — some of which are being used in these performances — and further, it would enable three of Boston's most venerable institutions to collaborate on this project: the Museum through its commissioning of the work and permitting the use of its old instruments, the Boston Symphony for supplying the 'modern orchestra', the New England Conservatory for supplying the fifteen soloists, all members of the Conservatory's Collegium Musicum (Director: Daniel Pinkham).

The piece is in four movements. In the first of these, Rustic shimmerings, a very light, transparent, shimmering background in solo instruments of the orchestra sets off the one-by-one entrance of the Renaissance instruments: soprano and alto recorders, soprano shawm, alto and bass crumhorns, cornetto and sackbut. This initial flurry of sound leads to a sus-

CONTENTS

Program for December 11, 12 and 15 1970 586
Future programs
Friday-Saturday series 634
Tuesday A series 635
Program notes
Schuller – Museum piece by the composer 599
Toch – Symphony no. 2 op. 73 by John N. Burk and the composer 602
Chopin – Piano concerto no. 2 in F minor op. 21 by James Lyons 604
Wagner – Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg' by John N. Burk 620 Back Bay Boston: institutions and patrons by Diggory Venn 623
The soloist 628

Program Editor ANDREW RAEBURN

TOCH Symphony no. 2 op. 73

Allegro fanatico (like an incantation)
Very light, skimming, shadowy
Adagio
Allegro

intermission

CHOPIN Piano concerto no. 2 in F minor op.21

Maestoso
Larghetto
Allegro vivace

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN

WAGNER Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg' *

Friday's concert will end about 4 o'clock; Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.30

Joseph Kalichstein plays the Steinway piano

Many of the old instruments played in the performance of Museum piece belong to the Leslie Lindsey Mason Collection of Early Musical Instruments in the Museum of Fine Arts. They are used by kind permission of the Museum.

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair f Friday -Saturday concerts y the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 t 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 .m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 10 1970

Steinberg conducts symphony

The tenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1970 at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director conducts the Orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut.

The program opens with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's Museum piece, commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their one-hundredth anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony no. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program includes Lopatnikoff's Festival overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

Thursday evening, Dec. 10 the Orchestra plays the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 10 1970

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 10 1970

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, who won the Leventritt Award in 1969, is still in his early twenties. He made his successful debut in New York three years ago, and has since that time been engaged as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra and the orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Denver and New Haven. He has also signed a contract with RCA Records.

Born in Tel-Aviv in January 1946, Joseph Kalichstein won scholarships from the America – Israel Cultural Foundation to study with Joshua Shor at the Shor Conservatory. He came to New York in 1962 to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School. He studied later with Ilona Kabos. This season he appears on

Roths to Play With Boston Symphony

SALEM, ORE.
OREGON STATESMAN
D. 35,000 S. 35,500

DEC 10 1970

A Salem man and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Roth, will be two of the guest performers to appear with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday of this week and the following Tuesday. Kenneth, son of the Marvin Roths, and Nancy are working on their master's degrees in performance of early music at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

William Steinberg is conductor of the Symphony, which will perform a composition by Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory. The work is entitled "Concerto for Renaissance instruments and Symphony Orchestra. This will be the first public performance of the concerto.

Renaissance Instruments

Both Kenneth and Nancy play early Renaissance instruments, including the recorder, lute, racquette and baroque oboe. The latter will be played by Mr. Roth with the Symphony. They both performed each evening at the Shakespearean Festival in Ashland last summer and hope to return this coming season.

The Roths are planning to come West for Christmas and will visit in Salem at the Marvin Roth home and in Santa Barbara, Calif. with her parents. Mr. Roth played the oboe with the Salem Junior Symphony and the Salem Community Symphony before going East to school.

GUNTHER SCHULLER
Museum piece
Program note by the composer

Schuller was born in New York on November 22 1925. He completed Museum piece last month. The work was commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, in celebration of its centennial year.

The group of renaissance instruments includes 2 sopranino recorders, 2 soprano recorders, 2 alto recorders, tenor recorder, renaissance bass flute; 2 soprano shawms, 2 alto shawms, bass shawm (the shawm was the European precursor of the oboe); 3 alto crumhorns, tenor crumhorn, bass crumhorn (the crumhorn, another early member of the oboe family, has its reed covered by a pierced cap, so that its sound is as unchangeable as that of an organ reed); bass racket (another member of the oboe family, the racket is a short, thick cylinder of wood pierced lengthways by ten cylindrical channels connected to form a continuous tube); 2 cornetti (wooden instruments with cup-shaped mouthpieces); sackbut (the ancestor of the trombone); 3 viole da gamba; 2 lutes; harpsichord; regal (a portable reed organ); triangle and drum.

The instruments of the symphony orchestra required are 2 flutes, piccolo, alto flute, 2 oboes, english horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 2 trumpets, 2 trombones, tuba, timpani, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, snare drum, harp, celeste, piano and strings.

Museum piece is the fulfillment of a long-time desire to compose a work which would juxtapose the sonorities and special qualities of Renaissance instruments with the instruments of the modern symphony orchestra. I thought it particularly apt to write such a work on this occasion, since the Boston Museum of Fine Arts owns a fine collection of old instruments — some of which are being used in these performances — and further, it would enable three of Boston's most venerable institutions to collaborate on this project: the Museum through its commissioning of the work and permitting the use of its old instruments, the Boston Symphony for supplying the 'modern orchestra', the New England Conservatory for supplying the fifteen soloists, all members of the Conservatory's Collegium Musicum (Director: Daniel Pinkham).

The piece is in four movements. In the first of these, Rustic shimmerings, a very light, transparent, shimmering background in solo instruments of the orchestra sets off the one-by-one entrance of the Renaissance instruments: soprano and alto recorders, soprano shawm, alto and bass crumhorns, cornetto and sackbut. This initial flurry of sound leads to a sustained section in which three gambas and the regal (a small Renaissance reed organ) provide a 'pedal point' accompaniment for a recorder cadenza. A chatty Allegro for the full solo ensemble forms the main body of the movement, ending quietly with a lyric Renaissance bass flute solo, accompanied sparsely by lute and harpsichord.

By way of contrast, the second movement is a lively Scherzo titled A play of sonorities (duets and trios). As this title implies, various duet and trio combinations are played against each other, with a particular emphasis on alternating the 'ancient' and 'modern' counterparts. Thus, two flutes are juxtaposed with two recorders, two oboes with two shawms, two bassoons with bass shawm and a bass racket (an ancestor of the modern bassoon), two clarinets with two crumhorns. The three old 'brass' instruments — two cornetts and sackbut (N.B. the cornetts over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition

The musical composition that the Museum of Fine Arts commissioned Gunther Schuller, president of the financially ailing New England Conservatory of Music, to write for its centennial gets its premiere performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this weekend's concerts. It's the first time the museum, the conservatory and the orchestra ever got together on a joint venture.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

DEC 9 1970

CONTENTS

Program for December 11, 12 and 15 1970 586
Future programs
Friday-Saturday series
Tuesday A series 634
Program notes 635
Schuller – Museum piece

TOCH — Symphony no. 2 op. 73

Allegro fanatico (like an incantation)
Very light, skimming, shadowy
Adagio
Allegro

intermission

CHOPIN — Piano concerto no. 2 in F minor op.21

Maestoso
Larghetto
Allegro vivace

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN

WAGNER — Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg' *

Friday's concert will end about 4 o'clock; Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.30

Joseph Kalichstein plays the Steinway piano

Many of the old instruments played in the performance of Museum piece belong to the Leslie Lindsey Mason Collection of Early Musical Instruments in the Museum of Fine Arts. They are used by kind permission of the Museum.

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair f Friday -Saturday concerts y the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 t 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 .m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America - Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

DEC 5 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Weekending will start with the Boston Symphony's premiere of Gunther Schuller's latest bit of composing — "Museum Piece" — which will stash into a reception line after the concert of the Museum of Fine Arts' International patrons who are also BSO subscribers (85 is the count to date). Schuller's home base, the New England BSO is making this its official 90th anniversary salute to the Museum's Centennial! Saturday subscribers will repeat the three-way gesture.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

DEC 10 1970

Steinberg conducts symphony

The tenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1970 at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director conducts the Orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut.

The program opens with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's Museum piece, commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their one-hundredth anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony no. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program includes Lopatnikoff's Festival overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

Thursday evening, Dec. 10 the Orchestra plays the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

DEC 10 1970

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

DEC 10 1970

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, who won the Leventritt Award in 1969, is still in his early twenties. He made his successful debut in New York three years ago, and has since that time been engaged as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra and the orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Denver and New Haven. He has also signed a contract with RCA Records.

Born in Tel-Aviv in January 1946, Joseph Kalichstein won scholarships from the America – Israel Cultural Foundation to study with Joshua Shor at the Shor Conservatory. He came to New York in 1962 to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School. He studied later with Ilona Kabos. This season he appears on both sides of the Atlantic in recital and with orchestras. His first recording, on the Vanguard label and released in 1968, includes sonatas by Prokofiev and Bartók. Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975

DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Symphony Orchestra Concerts Scheduled

The tenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

DEC 10 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

DEC 10 1970

Roths to Play With Boston Symphony

SALEM, ORE.
OREGON STATESMAN
D. 35,000 S. 35,500
DEC 10 1970

A Salem man and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Roth, will be two of the guest performers to appear with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday of this week and the following Tuesday. Kenneth, son of the Marvin Roths, and Nancy are working on their master's degrees in performance of early music at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

William Steinberg is conductor of the Symphony, which will perform a composition by Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory. The work is entitled "Concerto for Renaissance instruments and Symphony Orchestra. This will be the first public performance of the concerto.

Renaissance Instruments

Both Kenneth and Nancy play early Renaissance instruments, including the recorder, lute, racquette and baroque oboe. The latter will be played by Mr. Roth with the Symphony. They both performed each evening at the Shakespearean Festival in Ashland last summer and hope to return this coming season.

The Roths are planning to come West for Christmas and will visit in Salem at the Marvin Roth home and in Santa Barbara, Calif. with her parents. Mr. Roth played the oboe with the Salem Junior Symphony and the Salem Community Symphony before going East to school.

GUNTHER SCHULLER
Museum piece
Program note by the composer

Schuller was born in New York on November 22 1925. He completed Museum piece last month. The work was commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, in celebration of its centennial year.

The group of renaissance instruments includes 2 sopranino recorders, 2 soprano recorders, 2 alto recorders, tenor recorder, renaissance bass flute; 2 soprano shawms, 2 alto shawms, bass shawm (the shawm was the European precursor of the oboe); 3 alto crumhorns, tenor crumhorn, bass crumhorn (the crumhorn, another early member of the oboe family, has its reed covered by a pierced cap, so that its sound is as unchangeable as that of an organ reed); bass racket (another member of the oboe family, the racket is a short, thick cylinder of wood pierced lengthways by ten cylindrical channels connected to form a continuous tube); 2 cornetti (wooden instruments with cup-shaped mouthpieces); sackbut (the ancestor of the trombone); 3 viole da gamba; 2 lutes; harpsichord; regal (a portable reed organ); triangle and drum.

The instruments of the symphony orchestra required are 2 flutes, piccolo, alto flute, 2 oboes, english horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 2 trumpets, 2 trombones, tuba, timpani, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, snare drum, harp, celeste, piano and strings.

Museum piece is the fulfillment of a long-time desire to compose a work which would juxtapose the sonorities and special qualities of Renaissance instruments with the instruments of the modern symphony orchestra. I thought it particularly apt to write such a work on this occasion, since the Boston Museum of Fine Arts owns a fine collection of old instruments — some of which are being used in these performances — and further, it would enable three of Boston's most venerable institutions to collaborate on this project: the Museum through its commissioning of the work and permitting the use of its old instruments, the Boston Symphony for supplying the 'modern orchestra', the New England Conservatory for supplying the fifteen soloists, all members of the Conservatory's Collegium Musicum (Director: Daniel Pinkham).

The piece is in four movements. In the first of these, Rustic shimmerings, a very light, transparent, shimmering background in solo instruments of the orchestra sets off the one-by-one entrance of the Renaissance instruments: soprano and alto recorders, soprano shawm, alto and bass crumhorns, cornetto and sackbut. This initial flurry of sound leads to a sustained section in which three gambas and the regal (a small Renaissance reed organ) provide a 'pedal point' accompaniment for a recorder cadenza. A chatty Allegro for the full solo ensemble forms the main body of the movement, ending quietly with a lyric Renaissance bass flute solo, accompanied sparsely by lute and harpsichord.

By way of contrast, the second movement is a lively Scherzo titled A play of sonorities (duets and trios). As this title implies, various duet and trio combinations are played against each other, with a particular emphasis on alternating the 'ancient' and 'modern' counterparts. Thus, two flutes are juxtaposed with two recorders, two oboes with two shawms, two bassoons with bass shawm and a bass racket (an ancestor of the modern bassoon), two clarinets with two crumhorns. The three old 'brass' instruments — two cornetts and sackbut (N.B. the cornetts over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition

The musical composition that the Museum of Fine Arts commissioned Gunther Schuller, president of the financially ailing New England Conservatory of Music, to write for its centennial gets its premiere performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this weekend's concerts. It's the first time the museum, the conservatory and the orchestra ever got together on a joint venture.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 9 1970

CONTENTS

Program for December 11, 12 and 15 1970 — 586
Future programs
Friday-Saturday series
Tuesday A series — 634
Program notes — 635
Schuller – Museum piece

TOCH	Symphony no. 2 op. 73
	Allegro fanatico (like an incantation)
	Very light, skimming, shadowy
	Adagio
	Allegro
intermission
CHOPIN	Piano concerto no. 2 in F minor op.21
	Maestoso
	Larghetto
	Allegro vivace
	JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN
WAGNER	Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg' *

Friday's concert will end about 4 o'clock; Saturday's and Tuesday's about 10.30

Joseph Kalichstein plays the Steinway piano

Many of the old instruments played in the performance of Museum piece belong to the Leslie Lindsey Mason Collection of Early Musical Instruments in the Museum of Fine Arts. They are used by kind permission of the Museum.

Kalichstein Will Debut With Boston Orchestra

BOSTON — The 10th pair f Friday -Saturday concerts y the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Dec. 11 t 2 p.m. and Dec. 12 at 8:30 .m.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director will conduct the orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein will make his debut.

The program will open with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's "Museum piece," commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their 100th anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony No. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto No. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America - Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series will take place Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg will conduct with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program will include Lopatnikoff's "Festival Overture," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

On Thursday night, the orchestra will play the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence, R.I.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
DEC 5 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,577
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Weekending will start with the Boston Symphony's premiere of Gunther Schuller's latest bit of composing — "Museum Piece" — which will stash into a reception line after the concert of the Museum of Fine Arts' International patrons who are also BSO subscribers (85 is the count to date). Schuller's home base, the New England BSO is making this its official 90th anniversary salute to the Museum's Centennial! Saturday subscribers will repeat the three-way gesture.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,500
DEC 10 1970

Steinberg conducts symphony

The tenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11, 1970 at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30. William Steinberg, the Orchestra's Music Director conducts the Orchestra, and piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut.

The program opens with the world premiere of Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's Museum piece, commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts on the occasion of their one-hundredth anniversary, followed by Toch's Symphony no. 2, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with soloist Joseph Kalichstein and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

Kalichstein, winner of the Leventritt Award in 1969, has appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra as well as the Chicago and Cleveland Orchestras. Born in Israel in 1946, he won scholarships from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation to study at the Shor Conservatory. In 1962 he came to New York to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist. The program includes Lopatnikoff's Festival overture, Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

Thursday evening, Dec. 10 the Orchestra plays the second concert of the Providence Series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 10 1970

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 10 1970

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, who won the Leventritt Award in 1969, is still in his early twenties. He made his successful debut in New York three years ago, and has since that time been engaged as soloist with the New York Philharmonic, the Minnesota Orchestra and the orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Buffalo, Denver and New Haven. He has also signed a contract with RCA Records.

Born in Tel-Aviv in January 1946, Joseph Kalichstein won scholarships from the America – Israel Cultural Foundation to study with Joshua Shor at the Shor Conservatory. He came to New York in 1962 to study with Edward Steuermann at the Juilliard School. He studied later with Ilona Kabos. This season he appears on both sides of the Atlantic in recital and with orchestras. His first recording, on the Vanguard label and released in 1968, includes sonatas by Prokofiev and Bartók. Joseph Kalichstein makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

Symphony Orchestra Concerts Scheduled

The tenth pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra take place Friday afternoon, Dec. 11 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 at 8:30 p.m.

The third concert of the Cambridge Series takes place Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
DEC 10 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
DEC 10 1970

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY
DEC 10 1970
New England Newsclip

14

Symphony: 'Museum Piece'

By HARRY NEVILLE

To help celebrate its centennial year the Boston Museum of Fine Arts commissioned a commemorative work from Gunther Schuller, and the result, "Museum Piece," was played for the first time at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. William Steinberg conducted and the work will be repeated at tonight's and Tuesday night's performances.

Schuller's happy and quite appropriate idea was to write a work "which would juxtapose the sonorities and special qualities of Renaissance instruments with the instruments of the modern symphony orchestra." For this purpose he employed a slightly reduced symphony orchestra and an assortment of old instruments that includes recorders, shawms, crumhorns, sackbut, cornetti, lutes, harpsichord, regal, viole da gamba, etc. These were played by 15 members of the New England Conservatory Collegium Musicum, whose vivid costumes (which I took to be Elizabethan) lent yet another exotic touch to the occasion.

LASTING ABOUT 20 minutes, "Museum Piece" is in four movements, the titles of which — "Rustic Shimmerings," "A Play of Sonorities (Duets and Trios)," "Serenades" and "Canzon da Sonar" — accurately suggest the moods and impressions created by the music. My own favorite was the second movement, a scherzo in which there is much playful contrasting of a particular kind of ancient instrument with its modern descendant — shawms, for example, against oboes.

The orchestration is characterized by immense skill and resourcefulness, and the overall musical effect is one of extreme restraint and delicacy. Festive but not pompously so. In all, as tasteful a commemorative tribute as the Museum could have wished.

JOSEPH KALICHSTEIN, winner of the 1969 Leventritt Award, was the soloist of the afternoon. In his first Boston appearance he performed Chopin's Second Piano Concerto and showed himself to be an artist of unusual capabilities. In fact, I've heard few performances of this concerto that were as forceful, lyric and poetic as this one. Kalichstein has a really convincing style of rubato playing. He takes quite a bit of liberty with tempo but never loses the basic pulse, and his phrases breathe with utter naturalness. I hope we may hear him again soon.

Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 2 is a pleasant enough work, and yet the most it does for this listener is to arouse admiration for its author's craftsmanship. There is too little that is vivid and distinctive in the writing, with the result that the music leaves a neutral impression. One would almost prefer to be annoyed.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 12 1970 New England Newscap

BSO premieres Schuller's 'Museum'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

"Museum Piece," which had its first performance at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, William Steinberg conducting, is Gunther Schuller's response to a commission offered by the Museum of Fine Arts in celebration of its centennial. To make that response topical, Schuller gave "Museum Piece" a texture something like that of a concerto grosso, with a group of renaissance and baroque instruments, of which the Museum has a fine collection, taking the soloistic role. The performance itself reached out into another part of Schuller's life in that the old instruments were played by 15 members of the Collegium Musicum at the New England Conservatory, where he is president.

Schuller's music has sometimes been thin as to interior compositional substance — I would say that also of "Museum Piece" — but he has often been successful in presenting an interesting surface, particularly when stimulated by specifically instrumental problems and situations. The combination with modern symphony orchestra of an ensemble of cornetti, sackbut, recorders, lute, regal, shawms, crumhorns, gambas, and so forth, is a difficult challenge, but, disappointingly, it seems largely unmet in this curiously unresolved "Museum Piece." Much in it is adroitly done — the balances work, there is attractive exploitation of the sonorities of at least some of the instruments, there is some engaging dialogue across the generations (shawms and bassoons, lute and harp, old and new keyboards, etc.), the confrontations and liaisons of the two orchestras occur in nice variety — but I was left feeling that Schuller had not quite made up his mind what sort of work he really wanted to write.

Sometimes the old instruments live in Schuller's normal contemporary style, while at other moments they seem to play, just a little archly, as though in quotations. That unease, I think is where the main problem of "Museum Piece" is to be found. That part of the stylistic uncertainty of "Museum Piece" was underlined by having the Collegium Musicum in period costume, presenting them as decorative props rather than as participants in a genuine musical experience. The performance of the four-movement work, which takes about 18 minutes, seemed careful and skilled.

After the Schuller, Steinberg conducted the Symphony No. 2 (1951) by Ernst Toch, Viennese by birth, living in Germany until coming to this country in 1935, dying in Los Angeles six years ago. His 2nd Symphony bears a dedication to Albert Schweitzer ("the lonely seer in time of darkness, the only victor in a world of victims") and, as epigraph, the words of Jacob to the Angel, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me."

I do not know how specifically to relate the music to either piece of nonmusical information; I do know that it conveyed to me an extraordinarily compelling sense of having something to say. Its language is Mahler-plus, its gestures are broad and anguished, its exterior is almost aggressively unruly and inelegant. There are post-Romantic cliches and there are moments of great originality, particularly in scoring. This, too, is music in some respects unresolved, but I found the sense of the man behind the music and of the need for this music to be written strong and moving. The performance was lively, but not always ideally neat.

The music after intermission was Chopin's F minor Piano Concerto, with watery playing of the solo by Joseph Kalichstein, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 10 1970 New England Newscap

BMFA commission scored for old instruments

BSO to premiere Schuller's 'Museum Piece'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg will present the world premiere of Gunther Schuller's "Museum Piece" in three concerts tomorrow, Dec. 12, and 15.

The performances will be given at 2 p.m. on Friday, 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, and 8:30 p.m. on Tuesday.

Commissioned by the Museum of Fine Arts for its centennial celebrations, the new work is scored for reduced symphony orchestra and Renaissance instruments. Fifteen soloists from the New England Conservatory Collegium Musicum will perform on the old instruments which include recorders, shawns, crumhorns, sackbut, lutes, and violas da gamba.

According to Schuller — who is president of the Conservatory and who has received commissions from the New York Philharmonic, New York City Ballet and the Hamburg State Opera — the four-movement piece provided the opportunity to realize several long-standing ambitions. These were to "utilize the wonderful collection of old instruments at the Fine Arts Museum and the performance skills of N.E.C. Collegium students."

"The title 'Museum Piece' is not meant tongue-in-cheek," Schuller continued. As indicated in the symphony's accompanying program notes, the pitting of old and new instruments against one another symbolizes the tradition and innovation which characterize the three participating insitutitions which were founded in 1867, 1870 and 1881.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 14 1970 New England Newscap

BSO 'Museum Piece' is and maybe isn't one

By Louis Snyder

Gunther Schuller's "Museum Piece" had its first hearings anywhere in weekend performances by the Boston Symphony, conducted by William Steinberg. The title, let it be added, is factual rather than inferential.

In a cultural triple-play unusual for Boston, the Museum of Fine Arts, in celebration of its centennial, commissioned a work to be played by its musical counterpart, the BSO, from composer Schuller, president of another venerable local institution, the New England Conservatory of Music. The museum has a rare ancient instruments collection, the NEC has a group of 15 youthful experts (the Collegium Musicum) to play some of them, and Symphony has its famous sound to frame them all. With these highly valuable ingredients, Mr. Schuller set to work. The result—"Museum Piece."

The four-movement work, subtitled "Rustic Shimmerings," "Play of Sonorities," Serenades, and Canzon da Sonar, employs the ancient instruments in various combinations with one another and with their more "modern" counterparts in the main orchestra. As might be expected, there are sounds intriguing, unusual, and in a few cases barely audible from recorders, sackbuts, shawms, rackets, lutes, and a regal (reed organ), to name a few. Mr. Steinberg, and the young playing the old, and the older playing the newer instruments performed knowingly and diligently.

No doubt Mr. Schuller will make revisions so that "Museum Piece" will work with the brilliance of the idea which motivated it. As it is, the combinations and contrasts, which are the raison d'être of the piece, leave much to the imagination, and such a special effect as prescribed for the Serenades — dividing the Collegium into three groups, onstage, and offstage left and right — came off not at all. Neither placement nor content suggested any reason for this arrangement. However, the duets and trios of the second movement, and the beginning of the finale demonstrated how viable the work can be, and how useful to other orchestras with similar companies of Renaissance players in the offing.

The program was not without its other commanding interests. Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 2, played by the orchestra for the first time since 1955, is a work of decided individuality and consequent appeal. Dedicated to Albert Schweitzer (whom the late composer "never met personally" and with whom he "never in any way corresponded") the symphony holds its own, for the most part, as a forthright personal musical statement, dignified, kindly, and unsentimental.

After intermission came Joseph Kalichstein, 1969 Leventritt Award winner, in his BSO debut. Still in his 20's, this tall, substantial young man breezed through Chopin's Second Piano Concerto with airborne flexibility and a well-gauged touch, which provided another happy indication that the feeling for Chopin and the requirements for playing his works are not lost to the now generation. Contemporaries, and old-timers who must have heard quite a few legendary Chopin exponents in Symphony Hall, gave him a great reception.

The concert ended with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which, on this program, replaced the usual lengthier symphonic tour de force as a display for the orchestra's sound and skills. This served the same purpose, however, and both Mr. Steinberg and his musicians seemed to enjoy cutting loose after their earlier concentrated tasks. To no one's surprise, Wagner seems to continue to become them all.

Tomorrow evening at 8:30 the program will be repeated at Symphony Hall.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 12 1970 New England Newscap

'Museum piece' proves nice afte rnoon

By Marjorie Sherman
Globe Staff

"Such a nice afternoon," said 96-year-old Mrs. Ward Thoron waving cheerful thanks as Boston Symphony staffers helped her from her wheelchair into her car after the premiere of Gunther Schuller's "Museum Piece" at yesterday's concert.

She's been listening to musical firsts for more than 70 years and still enjoys the three B's of symphonydom—Brahms, Beethoven and Bach.

The applause was polite for the newest work of the New England Conservatory president, commissioned by the museum as its centennial present for the BSO 90th. It brought the museum's international patrons (who are also BSO subscribers) together for a post-concert sherry and a commemorative scroll of the Schuller opus.

The John Whites, the Peter Seamans, Mrs. Paul Bernat talking with Mrs. Richard Ehrlich about the museum's Mayan tour in February, Mrs. Richard Thompson, and the BSO's two women trustees, Mrs. James H. Perkins and Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock, Mrs. David Bernstein, whose husband is a member of the board of overseers for Symphony were among the chosen half a hundred, along with Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John Grandin Jr., co-chairmen of the Council of Friends.

Most fun of the afternoon, the Kenneth Rosses, in Boston from Germany with two "musts" on their brief first stay here. One was achieved when the Symphony box office "felt sure" they would be able to dig up three tickets for the Mahler next Friday (the Rosses have their daughter with them). The other best-of-Boston hope is three tickets for the Bruins, and yes, they just want to be able to buy them.

Steinberg conducts BSO in Mahler's 7th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Mahler's 7th Symphony was introduced to Boston by Koussevitzky in 1948 (40 years after its premiere!), and William Steinberg's performance of it at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was the first here since then.

This work, whose performances remain so rare even in this time of Mahler discovery, is a problematic one indeed. There are five movements, perceived as a triptych, with pieces on a large scale and of enormous weight on the outsides, and in the middle a set of three that are lighter in texture, individually shorter, though large enough when taken together to provide the triptych with a very spacious central panel. Lots of contrast is built into this scheme. The first movement, for example, is predominantly tragic; the finale, on the other hand, seems like a picture of Mahler stuck on a desert island without a score of "Meistersinger," trying to remember how the overture goes and becoming enraged because he can't. The three movements in the middle are, respectively, pastoral (ruminant?), sinister (or somewhere in a triangle defined by sinister, spooky, and grotesque) and serenade-like.

It is one of Mahler's most adventurous pieces, in the originality of its over-all form, in the harmony as it is worked out both in its largest dimensions as well as in many piquant details, and perhaps most so in the orchestral writing. The delicate, quasi chamber-musical textures of the two "night musics" and the scherzo, with their cowbells, the "Bartok pizzicati" that are so violent that the string snaps back against the fingerboard, the sounds of mandolin and guitar, are particularly fresh and special.

It seemed to me, though, that the 7th is a work that a lot of the time engages mainly what one might call Mahler's gift as an arranger. As a show of how to do it, it is always fascinating, but real musical, compositional, expressive urgency was something I sensed only in the Adagio introduction (and its recurrences) of the first movement, that tenebrous scherzo, and the amorous and charmingly fanciful fourth movement.

Mahler is a composer who asks his listeners not only for attention, but for sympathy, commitment, identification, and it may be that though I think of myself as someone who is really into Mahler, that yesterday just was not a day on which I could find the right wave length and hear what Mahler was saying, and that there is the reason I was inclined to react with so many reservations. I also suspect, though, that the performance had something to do with it. There were surely good points to it: it had energy, though mostly of a burly sort rather than the fiery kind that was also needed; the big tempo relationships were coherently worked out, which is anything other than easy in so diffuse a work; and it was resolutely anti-hysterical.

But perhaps Steinberg's anti-hysteria went too far. Not that you want a performance in which the music is swamped under a layer of gratuitous conductorial hysteria (as in some of Bernstein's and Solti's Mahler performances), but you do want one that conveys a sense of the madness in Mahler. Steinberg's reading, with its glossing over disruptive caesuras, its conversion of shrill, fortissimo woodwinds to passages played forte and with beautiful tone, its reduction of extremes altogether, normalized the music too much. it was as though Mahler had gone through a successful analysis and had talked all the conflicts and dissonances and bizarre fancies and juxta-positions out on Dr. Freud's couch rather than putting them into his symphonies.

The most damaging decision Steinberg made about performing the Mahler was to put the intermission between the first and second movements, the first having been preceded by Mozart's Linz Symphony. Mahler's first movement offers a possible, temporary ending, but the exchanges among solo winds in the second movement are not any possible kind of beginning. Then, given Mahler's special requirements from his audience, the disruption of atmosphere with an intermezzo all full of tobacco smoke and its counterpart in probably equally nonnutritive (not to say poisonous) conversation has a disastrous effect. Why not make a program of just the Mahler? It is, heaven knows, long enough and dense enough, and except for some beautifully finished playing, there was nothing in that terribly safe, ever so classical and respectful lumber through the Linz that made a strong plea for its inclusion.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (
(S) 566,377

DEC 19 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 18 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 19 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 36 in C K.425 'Linz'*
Adagio – allegro spiritoso
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Presto

MAHLER — Symphony no. 7
Langsam (adagio) – allegro con fuoco

intermission

Nachtmusik: allegro moderato
Schattenhaft: fliessend, aber nicht schnell
(Shadowy: flowing, but not fast)
Nachtmusik: andante amoroso
Rondo-finale: allegro ordinario

Revival of a schoolroom exile

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Giovanni Battista Viotti, whose Violin Concerto No.22 in A minor Joseph Silverstein played at last night's Boston Symphony concert, has at this point been pretty effectively exiled to the schoolroom. A couple of generations back, his concertos, particularly the 22d, used to be produced as company fare — Kreiser played this one with the Boston Symphony in three different seasons between 1913 and 1920 — and in his own day, or for part of it at least, Viotti was held in high regard as a violin virtuoso and as a composer.

A slightly older contemporary of Beethoven, Viotti spent less time in his native country than in France, where he was a special pet of Marie Antoinette's, a theater manager, and ameember of the National Guard; in England, where he conducted opera and failed as a wine merchant, and in Germany, where he mainly taught and composed. He was a prolific composer, not only for his own instrument, and the best of his music is commandingly serious even though lacking something in tightness and originality.

Perhaps one could say that he is half a composer, and that is the half that has to do with inventing attractive melodies and the occasional, colorful harmonic detail that really works effectively. Less good at knowing what to do with his material, he is apt to make forms that are stiff and excessively symmetrical. It is, for that matter, even a weakness of his most pleasing tunes that they rhyme rather too regularly, and if the Adagio of his 22d Concerto seems freer in that respect than the other two movements, that may be because its slower-moving phrases permit more elasticity within their own length.

At any rate, Viotti is worth a revival every so often, and I was delighted to have a chance to hear the Concerto No. 22. It is hard music to play much as Gluck's is, wanting somehow to be dignified and fiery at the same time. Joseph Silverstein went a considerable way toward giving the work what it needed: The fiddling as such was elegant, there was rigorous avoidance of that borscht style that is so completely inapplicable to this music, there was yric grace, and there were some effective embellishments and cadenzas of his own invention. What was lacking in the performance was a certain sense of freedom and fun as well as a truly fine ensemble with Michael Tilson Thomas and the orchestra. I don't imaine that the preparation of a Viotti concerto played by the concertmaster in one of the odd subscription series stands high in priority when it comes to the allocation of rehearsal time: I certainly had the feeling that the ensemble was the result more of expertness and good will than of careful planning.

The other works on the program—Haydn's Symphony No. 97 and the 5th Symphony of Carl Nielsen—were repeats from earlier Boston Symphony concerts this season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

DEC 30 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening December 29 1970 at 7.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
Adagio – vivace
Adagio ma non troppo
Menuetto & trio: allegretto
Presto assai

VIOTTI — Violin concerto no. 22 in A minor
Moderato
Adagio
Agitato assai
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

DEC 19 1970

Mozart, Mahler in Double Bill

By HARRY NEVILLE

Mozart and Mahler formed the double bill conducted by William Steinberg at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. The program opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 36 ("Linz"), of which Steinberg gave an unusually lyrical, smooth flowing performance.

My personal preference is for a tauter, more sharply pointed reading than Steinberg's, especially in the outer movements where slightly faster tempos and better inflected rhythms would have highlighted some of the score's underlying wit and humor. Though not by any means devoid of force the reading was one that emphasized grace and geniality and Steinberg made an altogether convincing case for this approach. The warm, luminous playing of the strings and woodwinds was an especial pleasure of the afternoon.

THE SEVENTH Symphony is one of Mahler's least played scores, partly no doubt because of its enormous technical and interpretive difficulties. These are no greater, however, than those found in some of the more popular Mahler symphonies, and perhaps the truth of the matter is that for most people the Seventh lacks the force of any of the others. In any event, the performance was the first by the Boston Symphony since Serge Koussevitzky led the work in 1948.

Steinberg, who conducted without score, obviously knows the work inside out. His handling of the many difficult transitions of tempo was masterful, and I thought too that he was successful for the most part in solving the overwhelming problems of orchestral balance. Nevertheless, the performance struck this listener as a much needed final rehearsal a performance in which the players were insufficiently free of the notes to cope adequately with the music.

THE FIRST MOVEMENT of the Seventh is my least favorite of Mahler's symphonic creations. There are only a few moments when its substance seems equal to its rhetoric, and the music as a whole does not convey an impression of natural, organic growth. That reservation, however, did not make me react favorably to having this movement isolated (with the Mozart) on the first half of the program.

A great deal of the second movement's dramatic impact is destroyed if it is delayed until after intermission. It seems a strange view indeed that the work's length can be tolerated only at the expense of its musical unity.

Boston Symphony weekend concert

BOSTON — Willia mSteinberg conducts the 11th pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Dec. 18 at 2 p.m and Saturday evening, Dec. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, conducts Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony.

The fifth concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Tuesday evening December 15 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program opens with Gunther Schuller's Museum Piece, followed by Toch's Second Symphony, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program concludes with Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940

DEC 10 1970

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Steinberg conducts BSO in Mahler's 7th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Mahler's 7th Symphony was introduced to Boston by Koussevitzky in 1948 (40 years after its premiere!), and William Steinberg's performance of it at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was the first here since then.

This work, whose performances remain so rare even in this time of Mahler discovery, is a problematic one indeed. There are five movements, perceived as a triptych, with pieces on a large scale and of enormous weight on the outsides, and in the middle a set of three that are lighter in texture, individually shorter, though large enough when taken together to provide the triptych with a very spacious central panel. Lots of contrast is built into this scheme. The first movement, for example, is predominantly tragic; the finale, on the other hand, seems like a picture of Mahler stuck on a desert island without a score of "Meistersinger," trying to remember how the overture goes and becoming enraged because he can't. The three movements in the middle are, respectively, pastoral (ruminant?), sinister (or somewhere in a triangle defined by sinister, spooky, and grotesque) and serenade-like.

It is one of Mahler's most adventurous pieces, in the originality of its over-all form, in the harmony as it is worked out both in its largest dimensions as well as in many piquant details, and perhaps most so in the orchestral writing. The delicate, quasi chamber-musical textures of the two "night musics" and the scherzo, with their cowbells, the "Bartok pizzicati" that are so violent that the string snaps back against the fingerboard, the sounds of mandolin and guitar, are particularly fresh and special.

It seemed to me, though, that the 7th is a work that a lot of the time engages mainly what one might call Mahler's gift as an arranger. As a show of how to do it, it is always fascinating, but real musical, compositional, expressive urgency was something I sensed only in the Adagio introduction (and its recurrences) of the first movement, that tenebrous scherzo, and the amorous and charmingly fanciful fourth movement.

Mahler is a composer who asks his listeners not only for attention, but for sympathy, commitment, identification, and it may be that though I think of myself as someone who is really into Mahler, that yesterday just was not a day on which I could find the right wave length and hear what Mahler was saying, and that there is the reason I was inclined to react with so many reservations. I also suspect, though, that the performance had something to do with it. There were surely good points to it: it had energy, though mostly of a burly sort rather than the fiery kind that was also needed; the big tempo relationships were coherently worked out, which is anything other than easy in so diffuse a work; and it was resolutely anti-hysterical.

But perhaps Steinberg's anti-hysteria went too far. Not that you want a performance in which the music is swamped under a layer of gratuitous conductorial hysteria (as in some of Bernstein's and Solti's Mahler performances), but you do want one that conveys a sense of the madness in Mahler. Steinberg's reading, with its glossing over disruptive caesuras, its conversion of shrill, fortissimo woodwinds to passages played forte and with beautiful tone, its reduction of extremes altogether, normalized the music too much. it was as though Mahler had gone through a successful analysis and had talked all the conflicts and dissonances and bizarre fancies and juxta-positions out on Dr. Freud's couch rather than putting them into his symphonies.

The most damaging decision Steinberg made about performing the Mahler was to put the intermission between the first and second movements, the first having been preceded by Mozart's Linz Symphony. Mahler's first movement offers a possible, temporary ending, but the exchanges among solo winds in the second movement are not any possible kind of beginning. Then, given Mahler's special requirements from his audience, the disruption of atmosphere with an intermezzo all full of tobacco smoke and its counterpart in probably equally nonnutritive (not to say poisonous) conversation has a disastrous effect. Why not make a program of just the Mahler? It is, heaven knows, long enough and dense enough, and except for some beautifully finished playing, there was nothing in that terribly safe, ever so classical and respectful lumber through the Linz that made a strong plea for its inclusion.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

DEC 19 1970

Revival of a schoolroom exile

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Giovanni Battista Viotti, whose Violin Concerto No.22 in A minor Joseph Silverstein played at last night's Boston Symphony concert, has at this point been pretty effectively exiled to the schoolroom. A couple of generations back, his concertos, particularly the 22d, used to be produced as company fare — Kreiser played this one with the Boston Symphony in three different seasons between 1913 and 1920 — and in his own day, or for part of it at least, Viotti was held in high regard as a violin virtuoso and as a composer.

A slightly older contemporary of Beethoven, Viotti spent less time in his native country than in France, where he was a special pet of Marie Antoinette's, a theater manager, and ambassador of the National Guard; in England, where he conducted opera and failed as a wine merchant, and in Germany, where he mainly taught and composed. He was a prolific composer, not only for his own instrument, and the best of his music is commandingly serious even though lacking something in tightness and originality.

Perhaps one could say that he is half a composer, and that is the half that has to do with inventing attractive melodies and the occasional, colorful harmonic detail that really works effectively. Less good at knowing what to do with his material, he is apt to make forms that are stiff and excessively symmetrical. It is, for that matter, even a weakness of his most pleasing tunes that they rhyme rather too regularly, and if the Adagio of his 22d Concerto seems freer in that respect than the other two movements, that may be because its slower-moving phrases permit more [illegible] within their own [illegible]

At any rate, [illegible] worth a revival [illegible] often, and I wa[illegible] to have a chan[illegible] the Concerto N[illegible] hard music to pl[illegible] Gluck's is wan[illegible] how to be dig[illegible] fiery at the same time. Joseph Silverstein went a considerable way toward giving the work what it needed: The fiddling as such was elegant, there was rigorous avoidance of that borscht style that is so completely inapplicable to this music, there was yric grace, and there were some effective embellishments and cadenzas of his own invention. What was lacking in the performance was a certain sense of freedom [illegible]

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

DEC 30 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

DEC 19 1970

Mozart, Mahler in Double Bi[illegible]

By HARRY NEVILLE

Mozart and Mahler formed the double bill conducted by William Steinberg at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. The program opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 36 ("Linz"), of which Steinberg gave an unusually lyrical, smooth flowing performance.

My personal preference is for a tauter, more sharply pointed reading than Steinberg's, especially in the outer movements where slightly faster tempos and better inflected rhythms would have highlighted some of the score's underlying wit and humor. Though not by any means devoid of force the reading was one that emphasized grace and geniality and Steinberg made an altogether convincing case for this approach. The warm, luminous playing of the strings and woodwinds was an especial pleasure of the afternoon.

THE SEVENTH Symphony is one of Mahler's least played scores, partly no doubt because of its enormous technical and interpretive difficulties. These are no greater, however, than those found in some of the more popular Mahler symphonies, and perhaps the truth of the matter is that for most people the Seventh lacks the force of any of the others. In any event, the performance was the first by the Boston Symphony since Serge Koussevitzky led the work in 1948.

Steinberg, who conducted without score, obviously knows the work inside out. His handling of the many difficult transitions of tempo was masterful, and I thought too that he was successful for the most part in solving the overwhelming problems of orchestral balance. Nevertheless, the performance struck this listener as a much needed final rehearsal a performance in which the players were insufficiently free of the notes to cope adequately with the music.

THE FIRST MOVEMENT of the Seventh is my least favorite of Mahler's symphonic creations. There are only a few moments when its substance seems equal to its rhetoric, and the music as a whole does not conve[illegible] pression of natural [illegible] growth. That re[illegible] however, did not [illegible] react favorably to h[illegible] movement isolated [illegible] Mozart) on the fir[illegible] the program.

A great deal of th[illegible] movement's dramati[illegible] is destroyed if it is [illegible] until after interm[illegible] seems a strange wa[illegible] that the work's leng[illegible] tolerated only at the [illegible] of its musical unity.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940

DEC 10 1970

Boston Symphony weekend concert

BOSTON — Willia mSteinberg conducts the 11th pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra . Friday afternoon, Dec. 18 at 2 p.m and Saturday evening, Dec. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, conducts Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony.

The fifth concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Tuesday evening December 15 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program opens with Gunther Schuller's Museum Piece, followed by Toch's Second Symphony, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program concludes with Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 18 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 19 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 36 in C K.425 'Linz'*
Adagio – allegro spiritoso
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Presto

MAHLER — Symphony no. 7
Langsam (adagio) – allegro con fuoco

intermission

Nachtmusik: allegro moderato
Schattenhaft: fliessend, aber nicht schnell
(Shadowy: flowing, but not fast)
Nachtmusik: andante amoroso
Rondo-finale: allegro ordinario

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR CRIPPLED CHILD[illegible]
241 ST. BOTOLPH STREET • BOSTON

Provides For The Handicapped Ch[illegible]
In A Free, Private, Day School

A 12 Year Academic Program
Vocational Training • Recr[illegible]
Health Program • Transpo[illegible]

The Industrial School for Crippled C[illegible] solicits funds for its operation either t[illegible] Bequests, Annuities or Life Insuranc[illegible]

In case of a life agreement a donor [illegible] capital to the Industrial School for [illegible] Children and in return receives inco[illegible] life.

Donors are invited to discuss these [illegible] with the Treasurer.

Treasurer, CHARLES E. COTTING, 10 Post Office Square, B[illegible]

CHARLES H. TAYLOR
President

MRS. CHARLES E. COTT[illegible]
Chairman Ladies Commit[illegible]

[illegible]HE SOLOIST

[illegible]SEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the [illegible]ston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, [illegible]ned the Orchestra seven years earlier at [illegible] age of twenty-three, the youngest mem[illegible]r at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied [illegible] the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and [illegible]er with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mis[illegible]cakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 [illegible]een Elisabeth of Belgium International [illegible]mpetition, and a year later won the [illegible]umberg Foundation Award. Before com[illegible] to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and [illegible]iladelphia.

[illegible]eph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist [illegible] as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he [illegible] their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and in 1969 [illegible]our to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has [illegible]rformed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which [illegible] has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, [illegible]oenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold [illegible]kowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During [illegible] 1970 Berkshire Festival he was soloist with the Boston Symphony [illegible] Stravinsky's Violin concerto in D.

[illegible] is violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio and first violinist of [illegible] Boston Symphony String Quartet, and as violinist of the Boston [illegible]nphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein has made many record[illegible]s of chamber music both for RCA and Deutsche Grammophon. Chair[illegible]n of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, he [illegible] teaches privately. Last year he received an honorary Doctorate of [illegible]sic from Tufts University. During the 1969-1970 season he made his [illegible]but as conductor with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops [illegible]chestras.

The House of Quality
Since 1858
Kakas

Steinberg conducts BSO in Mahler's 7th

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Mahler's 7th Symphony was introduced to Boston by Koussevitzky in 1948 (40 years after its premiere!), and William Steinberg's performance of it at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was the first here since then.

This work, whose performances remain so rare even in this time of Mahler discovery, is a problematic one indeed. There are five movements, perceived as a triptych, with pieces on a large scale and of enormous weight on the outsides, and in the middle a set of three that are lighter in texture, individually shorter, though large enough when taken together to provide the triptych with a very spacious central panel. Lots of contrast is built into this scheme. The first movement, for example, is predominantly tragic; the finale, on the other hand, seems like a picture of Mahler stuck on a desert island without a score of "Meistersinger," trying to remember how the overture goes and becoming enraged because he can't. The three movements in the middle are, respectively, pastoral (ruminant?), sinister (or somewhere in a triangle defined by sinister, spooky, and grotesque) and serenade-like.

It is one of Mahler's most adventurous pieces, in the originality of its over-all form, in the harmony as it is worked out both in its largest dimensions as well as in many piquant details, and perhaps most so in the orchestral writing. The delicate, quasi chamber-musical textures of the two "night musics" and the scherzo, with their cowbells, the "Bartok pizzicati" that are so violent that the string snaps back against the fingerboard, the sounds of mandolin and guitar, are particularly fresh and special.

It seemed to me, though, that the 7th is a work that a lot of the time engages mainly what one might call Mahler's gift as an arranger. As a show of how to do it, it is always fascinating, but real musical, compositional, expressive urgency was something I sensed only in the Adagio introduction (and its recurrences) of the first movement, that tenebrous scherzo, and the amorous and charmingly fanciful fourth movement.

Mahler is a composer who asks his listeners not only for attention, but for sympathy, commitment, identification, and it may be that though I think of myself as someone who is really into Mahler, that yesterday just was not a day on which I could find the right wave length and hear what Mahler was saying, and that there is the reason I was inclined to react with so many reservations. I also suspect, though, that the performance had something to do with it. There were surely good points to it: it had energy, though mostly of a burly sort rather than the fiery kind that was also needed; the big tempo relationships were coherently worked out, which is anything other than easy in so diffuse a work; and it was resolutely anti-hysterical.

But perhaps Steinberg's anti-hysteria went too far. Not that you want a performance in which the music is swamped under a layer of gratuitous conductorial hysteria (as in some of Bernstein's and Solti's Mahler performances), but you do want one that conveys a sense of the madness in Mahler. Steinberg's reading, with its glossing over disruptive caesuras, its conversion of shrill, fortissimo woodwinds to passages played forte and with beautiful tone, its reduction of extremes altogether, normalized the music too much. it was as though Mahler had gone through a successful analysis and had talked all the conflicts and dissonances and bizarre fancies and juxta-positions out on Dr. Freud's couch rather than putting them into his symphonies.

The most damaging decision Steinberg made about performing the Mahler was to put the intermission between the first and second movements, the first having been preceded by Mozart's Linz Symphony. Mahler's first movement offers a possible, temporary ending, but the exchanges among solo winds in the second movement are not any possible kind of beginning. Then, given Mahler's special requirements from his audience, the disruption of atmosphere with an intermezzo all full of tobacco smoke and its counterpart in probably equally nonnutritive (not to say poisonous) conversation has a disastrous effect. Why not make a program of just the Mahler? It is, heaven knows, long enough and dense enough, and except for some beautifully finished playing, there was nothing in that terribly safe, ever so classical and respectful lumber through the Linz that made a strong plea for its inclusion.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 565,377
DEC 19 1970

Revival of a schoolroom exile

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Giovanni Battista Viotti, whose Violin Concerto No.22 in A minor Joseph Silverstein played at last night's Boston Symphony concert, has at this point been pretty effectively exiled to the schoolroom. A couple of generations back, his concertos, particularly the 22d, used to be produced as company fare — Kreiser played this one with the Boston Symphony in three different seasons between 1913 and 1920 — and in his own day, or for part of it at least, Viotti was held in high regard as a violin virtuoso and as a composer.

A slightly older contemporary of Beethoven, Viotti spent less time in his native country than in France, where he was a special pet of Marie Antoinette's, a theater manager, and ameember of the National Guard; in England, where he conducted opera and failed as a wine merchant, and in Germany, where he mainly taught and composed. He was a prolific composer, not only for his own instrument, and the best of his music is commandingly serious even though lacking something in tightness and originality.

Perhaps one could say that he is half a composer, and that is the half that has to do with inventing attractive melodies and the occasional, colorful harmonic detail that really works effectively. Less good at knowing what to do with his material, he is apt to make forms that are stiff and excessively symmetrical. It is, for that matter, even a weakness of his most pleasing tunes that they rhyme rather too regularly, and if the Adagio of his 22d Concerto seems freer in that respect than the other two movements, that may be because its slower-moving phrases permit more elasticity within their own length.

At any rate, Viotti is worth a revival every so often, and I was delighted to have a chance to hear the Concerto No. 22. It is hard music to play much as Gluck's is, wanting somehow to be dignified and fiery at the same time. Joseph Silverstein went a considerable way toward giving the work what it needed: The fiddling as such was elegant, there was rigorous avoidance of that borscht style that is so completely inapplicable to this music, there was yric grace, and there were some effective embellishments and cadenzas of his own invention. What was lacking in the performance was a certain sense of freedom and fun as well as a truly fine ensemble with Michael Tilson Thomas and the orchestra. I don't imaine that the preparation of a Viotti concerto played by the concertmaster in one of the odd subscription series stands high in priority when it comes to the allocation of rehearsal time: I certainly had the feeling that the ensemble was the result more of expertness and good will than of careful planning.

The other works on the program—Haydn's Symphony No. 97 and the 5th Symphony of Carl Nielsen—were repeats from earlier Boston Symphony concerts this season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 565,377
DEC 19 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)
DEC 19 1970

Mozart, Mahler in Double Bill

By HARRY NEVILLE

Mozart and Mahler formed the double bill conducted by William Steinberg at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. The program opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 36 ("Linz"), of which Steinberg gave an unusually lyrical, smooth flowing performance.

My personal preference is for a tauter, more sharply pointed reading than Steinberg's, especially in the outer movements where slightly faster tempos and better inflected rhythms would have highlighted some of the score's underlying wit and humor. Though not by any means devoid of force the reading was one that emphasized grace and geniality and Steinberg made an altogether convincing case for this approach. The warm, luminous playing of the strings and woodwinds was an especial pleasure of the afternoon.

THE SEVENTH Symphony is one of Mahler's least played scores, partly no doubt because of its enormous technical and interpretive difficulties. These are no greater, however, than those found in some of the more popular Mahler symphonies, and perhaps the truth of the matter is that for most people the Seventh lacks the force of any of the others. In any event, the performance was the first by the Boston Symphony since Serge Koussevitzky led the work in 1948.

Steinberg, who conducted without score, obviously knows the work inside out. His handling of the many difficult transitions of tempo was masterful, and I thought too that he was successful for the most part in solving the overwhelming problems of orchestral balance. Nevertheless, the performance struck this listener as a much needed final rehearsal a performance in which the players were insufficiently free of the notes to cope adequately with the music.

THE FIRST MOVEMENT of the Seventh is my least favorite of Mahler's symphonic creations. There are only a few moments when its substance seems equal to its rhetoric, and the music as a whole does not convey an impression of natural, organic growth. That reservation, however, did not make me react favorably to having this movement isolated (with the Mozart) on the first half of the program.

A great deal of the second movement's dramatic impact is destroyed if it is delayed until after intermission. It seems a strange view indeed that the work's length can be tolerated only at the expense of its musical unity.

Boston Symphony weekend concert

BOSTON — Willia mSteinberg conducts the 11th pair of Friday Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, Dec. 18 at 2 p.m and Saturday evening, Dec. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, conducts Mozart's Symphony no. 36 and Mahler's Seventh symphony.

The fifth concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Tuesday evening December 15 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program opens with Gunther Schuller's Museum Piece, followed by Tech's Second Symphony, Chopin's Piano concerto no. 2 with piano soloist Joseph Kalichstein. The program concludes with Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,940
DEC 10 1970

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon December 18 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 19 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 36 in C K.425 'Linz'*
Adagio – allegro spiritoso
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Presto

MAHLER — Symphony no. 7
Langsam (adagio) – allegro con fuoco

intermission

Nachtmusik: allegro moderato
Schattenhaft: fliessend, aber nicht schnell
(Shadowy: flowing, but not fast)
Nachtmusik: andante amoroso
Rondo-finale: allegro ordinario

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening December 29 1970 at 7.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
Adagio – vivace
Adagio ma non troppo
Menuetto & trio: allegretto
Presto assai

VIOTTI — Violin concerto no. 22 in A minor
Moderato
Adagio
Agitato assai
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

16

THE SOLOIST

Twenty-seven year old HARVEY PITTEL first became interested in the saxophone as an undergraduate at the University of Southern California. While earning his Master of Music degree at Northwestern University, he took part in a three-month cultural exchange tour of the Far East as a member of the Northwestern University Saxophone Quartet. In 1966 he began advanced studies at the Juilliard School, playing in the United States Military Academy Band. Two years later Harvey Pittel was elected to a five-person executive board for the 1970 World Saxophone Congress. Last September he won second prize among saxophonists in the Concours international d'execution musicale in Geneva. Harvey Pittel teaches at three California universities, is director of the Los Angeles Saxophone Quartet, and is a clinician for the Selmer Instrument Company. He appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these performances.

In praise of Michael Tilson Thomas

Michael Tilson Thomas, who at 26 is associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a young man who proves that opportunity can knock even in the highly competitive world of serious music. You may recall that last season, because of the illness of William Steinberg, musical director of the orchestra, Thomas was required to substitute for Steinberg on the podium in a concert in New York. The result made musical history; Thomas was hailed by the tough New York critics as a conductor of unusual gifts.

For the remainder of last season, Thomas performed yeoman service as a substitute — so successfully, in fact, that he was promoted to his present post. Since his overnight success, I have watched young Thomas conduct on several occasions. Last week, however, at Symphony Hall, in the fourth program of the orchestra's Tuesday B Series, I thought that Thomas accomplished the most impressive conducting that I have yet heard and seen him do. His program — Haydn's "Symphony No. 97," Viotti's "Violin Concerto No. 22," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Nielsen's "Symphony No. 5" — was led with assurance, with a nice sense of the fundamental architecture of each work, with lucidity and crispness of phrasing — in short, with first-rate musicianship. I left Symphony Hall convinced that in Thomas, the Boston Symphony has a "find," indeed — a young man who, with more experience, may very well become one of the outstanding conductors of our time.

Yes, opportunity does knock in the world of music — but when it knocks, one must be ready, in talent and determination, to make the most of it. Thomas obviously has risen admirably to the occasion.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

JAN 3 1971

New Engle News

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 7 1971

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: NEW YEAR'S SAMPLER

One had the feeling that there were more persons on the stage than in the seats on New Year's afternoon. The exiguousness of the Symphony Hall population did not seem to inhibit some excellent music making in Mr. Thomas' potpourri that consisted of Webern's Six pieces for orchestra, Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G, Dahl's Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orhestra, with Harvey Pittell as soloist in its first Boston performance and Debussy's "Images" pour orchestra.

Webern, who has influenced the direction of present day music perhaps as much as any composer, has finally become a fixture in local programs. Of his works none is more representative than the historic Six pieces in the total degree of organization, of dissonance, of the absence of melodic outline, and in the exquisite quality of the musical jewels adduced by this exercise in serial pointillisme. Yet for all that is so marvelously wrought into this composition—and the same could be said for just about everything that he wrote ever after—there remains not a whit of profile, of some handle of recognition for the beholder. Indeed, I could give good odds that if the Six pieces were to be served up as the latest effort of the young and fictitious contemporary composer, almost nobody whether player, listener or critic, would distinguish it, the prototype, from the countless modern works subsequently created in its image.

The Bach was performed quite literally as chamber music. There were only 11 players, and they sounded somewhat eerie and just a little rough in the vastness of the semi-empty auditorium. The strength of the Brandenburgs is such, however, that its magic was not long in taking over. As so often happens in a presentation of the Third, there was a formula designed to insert a slow movement in lieu of those two adagio chords that are the stumps between the two pulsating allegro movements in the regular version. Sometimes the formula works, sometimes it can prove catastrophic, as witness the one that old Dr. Koussevitsky used ceaselessly to perpetrate in his era. Mr. Thomas, following suggestions of the musicologist and harpsichordist Thurston Dart, tried as the Largo the slow movement from the seldom played violin in G (S.102). The more puristically inclined may have found that the anachonistic overshadowed the beauty, but here is one aye vote for the Dart arrangement and another for the superb execution of it by Messrs. Silverstein and Eskin.

Still another aye vote for execution goes to Harvey Pittell for his heroic exhibition in Ingmar Dahl's concerto. Beauty there was not, for this is a commodity distinctly remote from a saxophone. Debussy wrote a rhapsody and Ravel a concerto for the instrument, and now comes Dahl, a composer heard a good deal around here recently, in a composition much stronger than either. But a saxophone is something best rendered unto Guy Lombardo and left there. If anybody could salvage expressiveness from such a horn it was young Mr. Pittell; his control seemed infinite, his tone firm and straight, and his technique quite dazzling. The Dahl Concerto is decidedly more than a mere show case for an offbeat instrument. It has strength, assertiveness and personality and it was certainly performed with love. The limitation attributable to a sow's ears remains what it is, nevertheless.

It is some measure of Michael Tilson Thomas's nerve and verve that he took on the "Images." For a man could be forgiven a screen memory from Charles Munch's reign and post regency that it showed up every few concerts. A man might further expect the piece to be given a leave of absence for a decade or so. Back it was, though, trailing its touchingly evocative if uneven treatment of Scottish folk airsin the Gigue section, its distillation of Spanish scenes more limpidly set down than perhaps any native Spaniard succeeded in doing in the Iberia section, and the simultaneous joy and melancholy of French children set out in the Rondes de printemps. The conducting was sensitive and firmly controlled, and the shade of le beau Charles clearly will have to look to its laurels.

A full measure of nerve and verve will be in order this week-end when Mr. Thomas will give BSO audiences their first application of Karlheinz Stockhausen, whose art will be represented by his Punkte. Also Mr. Thomas' own arrangement of the Sederunt principles by the 18th century composer Perotin and Robert Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 1 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 2 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 5 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

BACH — Brandenburg concerto no. 3 in G S. 1048
- Allegro
- Largo (S. 1021)
- Allegro

DAHL — Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra
- Recitative
- Adagio (passacaglia)
- Rondo alla marcia: allegro brioso

HARVEY PITTEL

first performance in Boston

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
- Gigues
- Ibéria
  - Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
  - Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
  - Le matin d'un jour de fête (The morning of a festival day)
- Rondes de printemps (Spring round)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

JAN 2 1971

Uncommonly lively concert

BSO performs Dahl, Webern

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Given the makeup of the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony audience, I would suppose it to be snow rather than hangovers that caused Symphony Hall to be less than half filled for the concert on New Year's Day. It's impressive what that kind of reduction of the audience does to eliminate the coughers, gabbers, bracelet ringers, and early leavers. For those interested and amibitious enough, Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony gave a concert that for all but a few minutes was uncommonly lively and pleasing. Thomas had put together a program with characteristically unexpected juxtapositions, beginning with Webern's Six Pieces, Op. 6, in which a large orchestra is used as a pool from which to draw diverse kinds and sizes of ensemble, moving then to a Bach Brandenburg Concerto with just 10 strings and harpsichord, then to Ingolf Dahl's Alto Saxophone Concerto, in which the solo instrument is surrounded by winds, basses, and percussion, and finally to what in context seemed the "normal" full-orchestra writing of Debussy's three "Images."

Dahl's Concerto, which had not been played in Boston before, was a special pleasure. Dahl, of Swedish parentage, born in Germany, trained there and in Switzerland, and long a resident of the United States, died last summer at 58, and as a composer, conductor, pianist, musicologist, teacher, and a man who brought life wherever he went, he was one of the finest musicians ever to enrich this country. He was close to Stravinsky, and that closeness is to be heard often in the harmonies and the chord-spacings of the Saxophone Concerto he wrote in 1949 and revised four years later. Yet the Concerto is Stravinskian in only this most superficial sense, and what it says is quite remote from any expressive world Stravinsky's music has inhabited.

A forceful work, broadly laid out, and speaking through quite massive sonorities, it begins with a grandly dramatic recitative that subsides eventually into an eloquent passacaglia in Adagio. The finale is a rondo in march style, which returns toward the end to the cadenza-like gestures of the opening. It is a virtuoso piece of the most demanding sort, but the virtuosity is organic rather than self-serving, and Dahl's writing for the solo instrument is liberated from cliche and something like a fresh discovery really of the saxophone with its flexibility and glowing, penetrating sound. The soloist was Harvey Pittel, a 27-year-old player from California and, like Thomas, a Dahl pupil. He is a superb musician and instrumentalist, with an elegant sense of phrase, vast technical resources, and a beautiful, firmly centered tone that is far removed from the lachrymose and wobbly squall served up by most saxophonists.

Of both the Webern Six Pieces (done in the 1928 revised edition) and the Debussy "Images," Thomas and the orchestra gave lucidly defined, transparent, flexible, and beautifully flowing performances. What did not work at all was the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto, burdened by an extraneous and unnecessary slow movement (from the G major Sonata for violin and figured bass) that introduced a disturbing change of texture, but really killed by the elephantine basses, slow tempi, tumbling rhythms, and porridgy sound. Ironically, the one part that was nicely played was the alien Largo, with Joseph Silverstein (violin) and Robert Levin (harpsichord). I suspect anyway that the 3rd Brandenburg is a piece that really doesn't want a conductor at all.

Photography Incorporated

Saxophonist

Harvey Pittel will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony on Jan. 1 and 2, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the late Ingolf Dahl's Saxophone Concerto.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 26 1970

THE SOLOIST

Twenty-seven year old HARVEY PITTEL first became interested in the saxophone as an undergraduate at the University of Southern California. While earning his Master of Music degree at Northwestern University, he took part in a three-month cultural exchange tour of the Far East as a member of the Northwestern University Saxophone Quartet. In 1966 he began advanced studies at the Juilliard School, playing in the United States Military Academy Band. Two years later Harvey Pittel was elected to a five-person executive board for the 1970 World Saxophone Congress. Last September he won second prize among saxophonists in the Concours international d'execution musicale in Geneva. Harvey Pittel teaches at three California universities, is director of the Los Angeles Saxophone Quartet, and is a clinician for the Selmer Instrument Company. He appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these performances.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

JAN 2 1971

Uncommonly lively concert

BSO performs Dahl, Webern

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Given the makeup of the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony audience, I would suppose it to be snow rather than hangovers that caused Symphony Hall to be less than half filled for the concert on New Year's Day. It's impressive what that kind of reduction of the audience does to eliminate the coughers, gabbers, bracelet ringers, and early leavers. For those interested and amibitious enough, Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony gave a concert that for all but a few minutes was uncommonly lively and pleasing. Thomas had put together a program with characteristically unexpected juxtapositions, beginning with Webern's Six Pieces, Op. 6, in which a large orchestra is used as a pool from which to draw diverse kinds and sizes of ensemble, moving then to a Bach Brandenburg Concerto with just 10 strings and harpsichord, then to Ingolf Dahl's Alto Saxophone Concerto, in which the solo instrument is surrounded by winds, basses, and percussion, and finally to what in context seemed the "normal" full-orchestra writing of Debussy's three "Images."

Dahl's Concerto, which had not been played in Boston before, was a special pleasure. Dahl, of Swedish parentage, born in Germany, trained there and in Switzerland, and long a resident of the United States, died last summer at 58, and as a composer, conductor, pianist, musicologist, teacher, and a man who brought life wherever he went, he was one of the finest musicians ever to enrich this country. He was close to Stravinsky, and that closeness is to be heard often in the harmonies and the chord-spacings of the Saxophone Concerto he wrote in 1949 and revised four years later. Yet the Concerto is Stravinskian in only this most superficial sense, and what it says is quite remote from any expressive world Stravinsky's music has inhabited.

A forceful work, broadly laid out, and speaking through quite massive sonorities, it begins with a grandly dramatic recitative that subsides eventually into an eloquent passacaglia in Adagio. The finale is a rondo in march style, which returns toward the end to the cadenza-like gestures of the opening. It is a virtuoso piece of the most demanding sort, but the virtuosity is organic rather than self-serving, and Dahl's writing for the solo instrument is liberated from cliche and something like a fresh discovery really of the saxophone with its flexibility and glowing, penetrating sound. The soloist was Harvey Pittel, a 27-year-old player from California and, like Thomas, a Dahl pupil. He is a superb musician and instrumentalist, with an elegant sense of phrase, vast technical resources, and a beautiful, firmly centered tone that is far removed from the lachrymose and wobbly squall served up by most saxophonists.

Of both the Webern Six Pieces (done in the 1928 revised edition) and the Debussy "Images," Thomas and the orchestra gave lucidly defined, transparent, flexible, and beautifully flowing performances. What did not work at all was the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto, burdened by an extraneous and unnecessary slow movement (from the G major Sonata for violin and figured bass) that introduced a disturbing change of texture, but really killed by the elephantine basses, slow tempi, tumbling rhythms, and porridgy sound. Ironically, the one part that was nicely played was the alien Largo, with Joseph Silverstein (violin) and Robert Levin (harpsichord). I suspect anyway that the 3rd Brandenburg is a piece that really doesn't want a conductor at all.

In praise of Michael Tilson Thomas

Michael Tilson Thomas, who at 26 is associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a young man who proves that opportunity can knock even in the highly competitive world of serious music. You may recall that last season, because of the illness of William Steinberg, musical director of the orchestra, Thomas was required to substitute for Steinberg on the podium in a concert in New York. The result made musical history; Thomas was hailed by the tough New York critics as a conductor of unusual gifts.

For the remainder of last season, Thomas performed yeoman service as a substitute — so successfully, in fact, that he was promoted to his present post. Since his overnight success, I have watched young Thomas conduct on several occasions. Last week, however, at Symphony Hall, in the fourth program of the orchestra's Tuesday B Series, I thought that Thomas accomplished the most impressive conducting that I have yet heard and seen him do. His program — Haydn's "Symphony No. 97," Viotti's "Violin Concerto No. 22," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Nielsen's "Symphony No. 5" — was led with assurance, with a nice sense of the fundamental architecture of each work, with lucidity and crispness of phrasing — in short, with first-rate musicianship. I left Symphony Hall convinced that in Thomas, the Boston Symphony has a "find," indeed — a young man who, with more experience, may very well become one of the outstanding conductors of our time.

Yes, opportunity does knock in the world of music — but when it knocks, one must be ready, in talent and determination, to make the most of it. Thomas obviously has risen admirably to the occasion.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 7 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 1 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 2 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 5 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

BACH — Brandenburg concerto no. 3 in G S. 1048
- Allegro
- Largo (S. 1021)
- Allegro

DAHL — Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra
- Recitative
- Adagio (passacaglia)
- Rondo alla marcia: allegro brioso

HARVEY PITTEL

first performance in Boston

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
- Gigues
- Ibéria
  - Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
  - Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
  - Le matin d'un jour de fête (The morning of a festival day)
- Rondes de printemps (Spring round)

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: NEW YEAR'S SAMPLER

One had the feeling that there were more persons on the stage than in the seats on New Year's afternoon. The exiguousness of the Symphony Hall population did not seem to inhibit some excellent music making in Mr. Thomas' potpourri that consisted of Webern's Six pieces for orchestra, Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G, Dahl's Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orhestra, with Harvey Pittell as soloist in its first Boston performance and Debussy's "Images" pour orchestra.

Webern, who has influenced the direction of present day music perhaps as much as any composer, has finally become a fixture in local programs. Of his works none is more representative than the historic Six pieces in the total degree of organization, of dissonance, of the absence of melodic outline, and in the exquisite quality of the musical jewels adduced by this exercise in serial pointillisme. Yet for all that is so marvelously wrought into this composition—and the same could be said for just about everything that he wrote ever after—there remains not a whit of profile, of some handle of recognition for the beholder. Indeed, I could give good odds that if the Six pieces were to be served up as the latest effort of the young and fictitious contemporary composer, almost nobody whether player, listener or critic, would distinguish it, the prototype, from the countless modern works subsequently created in its image.

The Bach was performed quite literally as chamber music. There were only 11 players, and they sounded somewhat eerie and just a little rough in the vastness of the semi-empty auditorium. The strength of the Brandenburgs is such, however, that its magic was not long in taking over. As so often happens in a presentation of the Third, there was a formula designed to insert a slow movement in lieu of those two adagio chords that are the stumps between the two pulsating allegro movements in the regular version. Sometimes the formula works, sometimes it can prove catastrophic, as witness the one that old Dr. Koussevitsky used ceaselessly to perpetrate in his era. Mr. Thomas, following suggestions of the musicologist and harpsichordist Thurston Dart, tried as the Largo the slow movement from the seldom played violin in G (S.102). The more puristically inclined may have found that the anachonistic overshadowed the beauty, but here is one aye vote for the Dart arrangement and another for the superb execution of it by Messrs. Silverstein and Eskin.

Still another aye vote for execution goes to Harvey Pittell for his heroic exhibition in Ingmar Dahl's concerto. Beauty there was not, for this is a commodity distinctly remote from a saxophone. Debussy wrote a rhapsody and Ravel a concerto for the instrument, and now comes Dahl, a composer heard a good deal around here recently, in a composition much stronger than either. But a saxophone is something best rendered unto Guy Lombardo and left there. If anybody could salvage expressiveness from such a horn it was young Mr. Pittell; his control seemed infinite, his tone firm and straight, and his technique quite dazzling. The Dahl Concerto is decidedly more than a mere show case for an offbeat instrument. It has strength, assertiveness and personality and it was certainly performed with love. The limitation attributable to a sow's ears remains what it is, nevertheless.

It is some measure of Michael Tilson Thomas's nerve and verve that he took on the "Images." For a man could be forgiven a screen memory from Charles Munch's reign and post regency that it showed up every few concerts. A man might further expect the piece to be given a leave of absence for a decade or so. Back it was, though, trailing its touchingly evocative if uneven treatment of Scottish folk airsin the Gigue section, its distillation of Spanish scenes more limpidly set down than perhaps any native Spaniard succeeded in doing in the Iberia section, and the simultaneous joy and melancholy of French children set out in the Rondes de printemps. The conducting was sensitive and firmly controlled, and the shade of le beau Charles clearly will have to look to its laurels.

A full measure of nerve and verve will be in order this week-end when Mr. Thomas will give BSO audiences their first application of Karlheinz Stockhausen, whose art will be represented by his Punkte. Also Mr. Thomas' own arrangement of the Sederunt principles by the 13th century composer Perotin and Robert Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony.

Photography Incorporated

Saxophonist

Harvey Pittel will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony on Jan. 1 and 2, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the late Ingolf Dahl's Saxophone Concerto.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 28 1970

INFORMATION OBSCURED

17

THE SOLOIST

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations. During the 1970 Berkshire Festival he was soloist with the Orchestra in Dvořák's concerto.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-19

Thursday evening January 7 1971 at 8.30 pm

Jacqueline du Pré, who was to have played the Cello concerto by Haydn, unfortunately has grave illness in her family, and has had to return to England. Her place is taken, at short notice, by Jules Eskin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

HAYDN — Cello concerto in C
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

JULES ESKIN

intermission

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 8 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 9 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

PÉROTIN — Sederunt principes

HARVARD GLEE CLUB
F. John Adams conductor

STOCKHAUSEN — Punkte
first performance in Boston

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
- Lebhaft (vivace)
- Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
- Nicht schnell (moderato)
- Lebhaft (vivace)

Jules Eskin

The Boston Symphony's first cellist will be soloist with the orchestra tomorrow, Thursday, evening, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the Haydn Cello Concerto in C. Mr. Eskin replaces Jacqueline Du Pré, who has canceled her present tour because of family illness in England.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 6 1971

Wireless Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas' program for last weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts looked very interesting in advance, and I regret that I could not get to hear them directly, having been confined at home with a rampaging catarrh that would have competed with the musicians' output had I ventured to Symphony Hall. So, consoling mystelf with my stash, I caught the Friday-Saturday pair by means of WGBH and WCRB; the impressions that I got from their mercilessly super-clear and larger-than-life transmissions are the basis for this review.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1928), the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, the late Ingolf Dahl's Concerto for Alto Saxophone and the three orchestral Images by Debussy were a pretty fair sampling of Thomas' catholic interests, and also, I'm relieved to say, of the sort of thing that he can do well. The cobwebby institution of the subscription concert really justified itself this time; what was played was worth playing, something unfamiliar got some well-deserved exposure, and the execution was sound enough to let you listen to content and design without distraction. (Maybe my physical distance from the uncongenial Symphony Hall ambience and the invisibility of Thomas' sometimes hectic and non-functional podium behavior account for my encomiastic tendencies this week. But the evidence that reached my ear-trumpet and counterpane suggests that they were in good form.)

The BSO's way with the concentrated and epigrammatic Webern pieces was fluid, clear, and balanced, altogether different from the resentful incomprehension that is still the norm for most major orchestras' treatment of this music. The Brandenburg came off least well, having been perhaps the least rehearsed. It was a pretty glutinous affair, and not even harpsichordist Robert Levin's contributions (he can often propel an ensemble like a first-rate rhythm section) were much help.

What followed, the Dahl Saxophone Concerto, was the concert's novelty and hard news. This piece, written in 1949, has something of the harmonic language and sonorous textures of the pre-serial Stravinsky, but Dahl was obviously his own man, and the energy, unabashed virtuosity, and a sort of self-critical voluptuousness, among other qualities displayed in this music, suggest an original musical personality that would regard prolonged acquaintance. The Concerto was a vehicle, though not merely that, for some ravishing playing from soloist Harvey Pittel. It reminded me how dismal the standards of symphonic saxophone playing generally are.

The Debussy Images got a strikingly unMunchlike performance, in which textural clarity, rhythmic accuracy and an absence of hysteria predominated, all in all more thoughtful than infectious. Thomas was an unobtrusive mediator throughout, and I was impressed — by Debussy.

These concerts were untypical of my experiences with the BSO this season. Perhaps, when I attend future concerts, I should, as a good child of McLuhan, equip myself with transistor FM and headset, tune in to the Symphony broadcast, and compare the orchestra's two personae, the corporeal and the electronic.

—RICHARD BUELL

MICHAEL Tilson Thomas will conduct BSO and the Harvard Glee Club in a performance of Perotin's "Sederunt Principes" in concerts Jan. 8 and 9.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 3 1971

Thomas Leads the Bostonian In Two Works by Stockhaus

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall into dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 18 1971

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JAN 12 1971

THE CHORUS

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB, which first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1917, has sung with the Orchestra on more than 100 occasions since. During their long and successful history the chorus has toured in many parts of the world, often with the Radcliffe Choral Society, has sung several premières, including that of Stravinsky's Oedipus rex in 1931, and has appeared with other major American orchestras, among them the Philadelphia, the Cleveland and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras. The Club has also taken part in many recordings by the Boston Symphony of choral works for RCA. Their conductor, F. John Adams, succeeded Elliot Forbes at the beginning of this season.

Thomas Conducts

BSO in Challenging Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

About 1200 A.D. when Notre Dame was still a-building in a Paris that had become a great center of business and learning, the composer, Perotin, dominated the music of cathedral and choir school with the most adventurous music of the late Middle Ages. The humanism of troubadour and folk music was making inroads in the other-worldly tradition of Gregorian chant, adding the physical incitement of dance rhythms and the exciting play of extra voices working against basic tune (counterpoint).

Michael Tilson Thomas made an arrangement of Perotin's Sederunt principes, adding winds, organ and bells, contriving an echo effect, as if in the Gothic vaults of a great cathedral, and called on the Harvard Glee Club to be the choir of Notre Dame.

The result was fascinating—the early day counterpoint alive with passing dissonance and compulsive rhythm, all supported on a drone base. We still have same in bagpipes — also out of the Middle Ages, in a simpler form of drone and melody. Here the fifths of the drone changed level every once in a while (we'd say, changed key) which shifted the tension, and the interaction of voices was sophisticated. Passages of plainsong kept one foot in the traditional past—these beautifully sung with their word-movement of subtle rhythm and melodic shaping.

Mr. Thomas then thrust into far-out modern Stockhausen's Punkte (points). I don't know what the title means except, perhaps, that each instrument of the orchestra had a separate part that injected bits of sound into the entanglement of the total assault. There is nothing to cling to: instruments are forced to sound like anything but themselves; no rhythm settles down and no shapes — though Mr. Thomas discerns a sequence of unrelated passages of different emphasis. A listener merely survives, irrationally stimulated by arbitrary sounds of a monotonous power only equalled by amplified Rock — or perhaps electronic noises. Stockhausen's usual 'stock-in-trade. It would be interesting to hear all three versions (1952, 1964, 1966) and see if the difference is appreciable to anyone but the composer. I was proud of the supporting applause of the Friday afternoon audience, trained by Koussevitzky to withhold judgment and pay attention, and now appreciative of the extraordinary effort of the performers among whom Thomas seemed to be in clear command.

Last word: any important experience leaves one with something to remember. I cannot remember a single bit of Punkte.

Schumann's No. 3 ('Rhenish') brought us back to the middle adventure of romantic creation (1850). Mr. Thomas is as good with this music as with more esoteric stuff, recapturing the pulse and color of a piece that belongs with Brahms and Wagner, at least in the heroic first movement and in the solemn brass of the fourth movement interlude.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 14 1971

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

11 1971

Stockhausen

'Punkte' premiere . . .

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Over the past few weeks, associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have turned Symphony Hall into a kind of musical version of a Revere Beach fun house—full of unexpected surprises and harmless jolts, and really quite invigorating. No sooner does the tonal floor seem comfortably firm under foot than one is plunged onto a tilting, spinning, rippling plane of sound, unfamiliar maybe, but curiosity-provoking. Beats the old merry-go-round anytime, and makes for fewer nodding heads and early departures.

The weekend concerts last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were similarly intriguing. With acoustical effects devised electronically by Mr. Thomas and radio producer Richard L. Kaye, Mr. Thomas, using the Harvard Glee Club and a small ensemble of BSO musicians, performed the "Sederunt Principes," a chant composed by Pérotin-le-grand and sung at Notre Dame de Paris circa 1199. It was re-created here with a reverberation, we are told, that "closely approximates" the cathedral's sound in that year. Accuracy aside, the ring of this engaging Pérotin organum was impressive and strong, its performance well knit and atmospheric.

After such a cheerful, basic listening adventure the listener was plunged (unsuspectingly only if he hadn't read his program notes) into the centrifugal aural whirl of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte," in its first performance here. This, like the Perilous Platter, doesn't operate under the traditional rules of balance, so it's something of a struggle to remain upright.

Despite the formidable Stockhausen reputation for obfuscation, the mass of non sequiturs that "Punkte" ("Points") consists of was generally encompassed without too much protest or anguish. It seemed possible to wend one's way, albeit slippery, among the field of sonic stalactites and stalagmites, each tuned in its own fashion, and to admire the stark individualities of these separate sounds, rigid and unrelated as they appeared to be. After getting the fundamental stance—and Mr. Stockhausen is nothing if not explicit about his intentions—it became a question of self-disciplined acclimatizing, divorced even from the primitive vocabulary Pérotin used 700-or-so years earlier, to maintain an even keel.

Surprisingly enough, the much-maligned Friday afternoon audience took "Punkte" in its stride by paying attention, and rewarding both conductor and musicians for what one feels must have been an accurate, and certainly was a splendidly conveyed account of this craggy score. In any case, no one appeared the worse for a breathtaking dive down the shoot-the-chutes.

Like the fun house, there was provided a refreshing slide down to normalcy in the form of Schumann's Third Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish"). Familiar sights and sounds took shape again in this solid performance, and suddenly everyone was back in Symphony Hall again, with quite a different kind of outing to reminisce about to the less adventurous.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE SOLOIST

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations. During the 1970 Berkshire Festival he was soloist with the Orchestra in Dvořák's concerto.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 8 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-19

Thursday evening January 7 1971 at 8.30 pm

Jacqueline du Pré, who was to have played the Cello concerto by Haydn, unfortunately has grave illness in her family, and has had to return to England. Her place is taken, at short notice, by Jules Eskin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

HAYDN — Cello concerto in C
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

JULES ESKIN

intermission

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 8 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 9 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

PÉROTIN — Sederunt principes
HARVARD GLEE CLUB
F. John Adams conductor

STOCKHAUSEN — Punkte
first performance in Boston

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
- Lebhaft (vivace)
- Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
- Nicht schnell (moderato)
- Lebhaft (vivace)

Jules Eskin

The Boston Symphony's first cellist will be soloist with the orchestra tomorrow, Thursday, evening, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the Haydn Cello Concerto in C. Mr. Eskin replaces Jacqueline Du Pré, who has canceled her present tour because of family illness in England.

Wireless Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas' program for last weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts looked very interesting in advance, and I regret that I could not get to hear them directly, having been confined at home with a rampaging catarrh that would have competed with the musicians' output had I ventured to Symphony Hall. So, consoling myself with my stash, I caught the Friday-Saturday pair by means of WGBH and WCRB; the impressions that I got from their mercilessly super-clear and larger-than-life transmissions are the basis for this review.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1928), the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, the late Ingolf Dahl's Concerto for Alto Saxophone and the three orchestral Images by Debussy were a pretty fair sampling of Thomas' catholic interests, and also, I'm relieved to say, of the sort of thing that he can do well. The cobwebby institution of the subscription concert really justified itself this time; what was played was worth playing, something unfamiliar got some well-deserved exposure, and the execution was sound enough to let you listen to content and design without distraction. (Maybe my physical distance from the uncongenial Symphony Hall ambience and the invisibility of Thomas' sometimes hectic and non-functional podium behavior account for my encomiastic tendencies this week. But the evidence that reached my ear-trumpet and counterpane suggests that they were in good form.)

The BSO's way with the concentrated and epigrammatic Webern pieces was fluid, clear, and balanced, altogether different from the resentful incomprehension that is still the norm for most major orchestras' treatment of this music. The Brandenburg came off least well, having been perhaps the least rehearsed. It was a pretty glutinous affair, and not even harpsichordist Robert Levin's contributions (he can often propel an ensemble like a first-rate rhythm section) were much help.

What followed, the Dahl Saxophone Concerto, was the concert's novelty and hard news. This piece, written in 1949, has something of the harmonic language and sonorous textures of the pre-serial Stravinsky, but Dahl was obviously his own man, and the energy, unabashed virtuosity, and a sort of self-critical voluptuousness, among other qualities displayed in this music, suggest an original musical personality that would regard prolonged acquaintance. The Concerto was a vehicle, though not merely that, for some ravishing playing from soloist Harvey Pittel. It reminded me how dismal the standards of symphonic saxophone playing generally are.

The Debussy Images got a strikingly unMunchlike performance, in which textural clarity, rhythmic accuracy and an absence of hysteria predominated, all in all more thoughtful than infectious. Thomas was an unobtrusive mediator throughout, and I was impressed — by Debussy.

These concerts were untypical of my experiences with the BSO this season. Perhaps, when I attend future concerts, I should, as a good child of McLuhan, equip myself with transistor FM and headset, tune in to the Symphony broadcast, and compare the orchestra's two personae, the corporeal and the electronic.

—RICHARD BUELL

MICHAEL Tilson Thomas will conduct BSO and the Harvard Glee Club in a performance of Perotin's "Sederunt Principes" in concerts Jan. 8 and 9.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 3 1971

THE CHORUS

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB, which first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1917, has sung with the Orchestra on more than 100 occasions since. During their long and successful history the chorus has toured in many parts of the world, often with the Radcliffe Choral Society, has sung several premières, including that of Stravinsky's Oedipus rex in 1931, and has appeared with other major American orchestras, among them the Philadelphia, the Cleveland and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras. The Club has also taken part in many recordings by the Boston Symphony of choral works for RCA. Their conductor, F. John Adams, succeeded Elliot Forbes at the beginning of this season.

Thomas Leads the Bostonian In Two Works by Stockhaus

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall into dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

*

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 14 1971

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 18 1971

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JAN 12 1971

Thomas Conducts

BSO in Challenging Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

About 1200 A.D. when Notre Dame was still a-building in a Paris that had become a great center of business and learning, the composer, Perotin, dominated the music of cathedral and choir school with the most adventurous music of the late Middle Ages. The humanism of troubadour and folk music was making inroads in the other-worldly tradition of Gregorian chant, adding the physical incitement of dance rhythms and the exciting play of extra voices working against basic tune (counterpoint).

Michael Tilson Thomas made an arrangement of Perotin's Sederunt principes, adding winds, organ and bells, contriving an echo effect, as if in the Gothic vaults of a great cathedral, and called on the Harvard Glee Club to be the choir of Notre Dame.

The result was fascinating—the early day counterpoint alive with passing dissonance and compulsive rhythm, all supported on a drone base. We still have same in bagpipes — also out of the Middle Ages, in a simpler form of drone and melody. Here the fifths of the drone changed level every once in a while (we'd say, changed key) which shifted the tension, and the interaction of voices was sophisticated. Passages of plainsong kept one foot in the traditional past—these beautifully sung with their word-movement of subtle rhythm and melodic shaping.

Mr. Thomas then thrust into far-out modern Stockhausen's Punkte (points). I don't know what the title means except, perhaps, that each instrument of the orchestra had a separate part that injected bits of sound into the entanglement of the total assault. There is nothing to cling to: instruments are forced to sound like anything but themselves; no rhythm settles down and no shapes — though Mr. Thomas discerns a sequence of unrelated passages of different emphasis. A listener merely survives, irrationally stimulated by arbitrary sounds of a monotonous power only equalled by amplified Rock — or perhaps electronic noises. Stockhausen's usual stock-in-trade. It would be interesting to hear all three versions (1952, 1964, 1966) and see if the difference is appreciable to anyone but the composer. I was proud of the supporting applause of the Friday afternoon audience, trained by Koussevitzky to withhold judgment and pay attention, and now appreciative of the extraordinary effort of the performers among whom Thomas seemed to be in clear command.

Last word: any important experience leaves one with something to remember. I cannot remember a single bit of Punkte.

Schumann's No. 3 ('Rhenish') brought us back to the middle adventure of romantic creation (1850). Mr. Thomas is as good with this music as with more esoteric stuff, recapturing the pulse and color of a piece that belongs with Brahms and Wagner, at least in the heroic first movement and in the solemn brass of the fourth movement interlude.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

Stockhausen

'Punkte' premiere . . .

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Over the past few weeks, associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have turned Symphony Hall into a kind of musical version of a Revere Beach fun house—full of unexpected surprises and harmless jolts, and really quite invigorating. No sooner does the tonal floor seem comfortably firm under foot than one is plunged onto a tilting, spinning, rippling plane of sound, unfamiliar maybe, but curiosity-provoking. Beats the old merry-go-round anytime, and makes for fewer nodding heads and early departures.

The weekend concerts last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were similarly intriguing. With acoustical effects devised electronically by Mr. Thomas and radio producer Richard L. Kaye, Mr. Thomas, using the Harvard Glee Club and a small ensemble of BSO musicians, performed the "Sederunt Principes," a chant composed by Pérotin-le-grand and sung at Notre Dame de Paris circa 1199. It was re-created here with a reverberation, we are told, that "closely approximates" the cathedral's sound in that year. Accuracy aside, the ring of this engaging Pérotin organum was impressive and strong, its performance well knit and atmospheric.

After such a cheerful, basic listening adventure the listener was plunged (unsuspectingly only if he hadn't read his program notes) into the centrifugal aural whirl of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte," in its first performance here. This, like the Perilous Platter, doesn't operate under the traditional rules of balance, so it's something of a struggle to remain upright.

Despite the formidable Stockhausen reputation for obfuscation, the mass of non sequiturs that "Punkte" ("Points") consists of was generally encompassed without too much protest or anguish. It seemed possible to wend one's way, albeit slippery, among the field of sonic stalactites and stalagmites, each tuned in its own fashion, and to admire the stark individualities of these separate sounds, rigid and unrelated as they appeared to be. After getting the fundamental stance—and Mr. Stockhausen is nothing if not explicit about his intentions—it became a question of self-disciplined acclimatizing, divorced even from the primitive vocabulary Pérotin used 700-or-so years earlier, to maintain an even keel.

Surprisingly enough, the much-maligned Friday afternoon audience took "Punkte" in its stride by paying attention, and rewarding both conductor and musicians for what one feels must have been an accurate, and certainly was a splendidly conveyed account of this craggy score. In any case, no one appeared the worse for a breathtaking dive down the shoot-the-chutes.

Like the fun house, there was provided a refreshing slide down to normalcy in the form of Schumann's Third Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish"). Familiar sights and sounds took shape again in this solid performance, and suddenly everyone was back in Symphony Hall again, with quite a different kind of outing to reminisce about to the less adventurous.

THE SOLOIST

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations. During the 1970 Berkshire Festival he was soloist with the Orchestra in Dvořák's concerto.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 6 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-19

Thursday evening January 7 1971 at 8.30 pm

Jacqueline du Pré, who was to have played the Cello concerto by Haydn, unfortunately has grave illness in her family, and has had to return to England. Her place is taken, at short notice, by Jules Eskin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

HAYDN — Cello concerto in C
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

JULES ESKIN

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
- Gigues
- Ibéria
  - Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
  - Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
  - Le matin d'un jour de fête (The morning of a festival day)
- Rondes de printemps (Spring rounds)

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
- Lebhaft (vivace)
- Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
- Nicht schnell (moderato)
- Lebhaft (vivace)

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN
241 ST. BOTOLPH STREET • BOSTON
Provides For The Handicapped Child In A Free, Private, Day School

A 12 Year Academic Program
Vocational Training • Recreation
Health Program • Transportation
The Industrial School for Crippled Children solicits funds for its operation either through Bequests, Annuities or Life Insurance.
In case of a life agreement a donor gives capital to the Industrial School for Crippled

Jules Eskin

The Boston Symphony's first cellist will be soloist with the orchestra tomorrow, Thursday, evening, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the Haydn Cello Concerto in C. Mr. Eskin replaces Jacqueline Du Pré, who has canceled her present tour because of family illness in England.

Wireless Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas' program for last weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts looked very interesting in advance, and I regret that I could not get to hear them directly, having been confined at home with a rampaging catarrh that would have competed with the musicians' output had I ventured to Symphony Hall. So, consoling myself with my stash, I caught the Friday-Saturday pair by means of WGBH and WCRB; the impressions that I got from their mercilessly super-clear and larger-than-life transmissions are the basis for this review.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1928), the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, the late Ingolf Dahl's Concerto for Alto Saxophone and the three orchestral Images by Debussy were a pretty fair sampling of Thomas' catholic interests, and also, I'm relieved to say, of the sort of thing that he can do well. The cobwebby institution of the subscription concert really justified itself this time; what was played was worth playing, something unfamiliar got some well-deserved exposure, and the execution was sound enough to let you listen to content and design without distraction. (Maybe my physical distance from the uncongenial Symphony Hall ambience and the invisibility of Thomas' sometimes hectic and non-functional podium behavior account for my encomiastic tendencies this week. But the evidence that reached my ear-trumpet and counterpane suggests that they were in good form.)

The BSO's way with the concentrated and epigrammatic Webern pieces was fluid, clear, and balanced, altogether different from the resentful incomprehension that is still the norm for most major orchestras' treatment of this music. The Brandenburg came off least well, having been perhaps the least rehearsed. It was a pretty glutinous affair, and not even harpsichordist Robert Levin's contributions (he can often propel an ensemble like a first-rate rhythm section) were much help.

What followed, the Dahl Saxophone Concerto, was the concert's novelty and hard news. This piece, written in 1949, has something of the harmonic language and sonorous textures of the pre-serial Stravinsky, but Dahl was obviously his own man, and the energy, unabashed virtuosity, and a sort of self-critical voluptuousness, among other qualities displayed in this music, suggest an original musical personality that would regard prolonged acquaintance. The Concerto was a vehicle, though not merely that, for some ravishing playing from soloist Harvey Pittel. It reminded me how dismal the standards of symphonic saxophone playing generally are.

The Debussy Images got a strikingly unMunchlike performance, in which textural clarity, rhythmic accuracy and an absence of hysteria predominated, all in all more thoughtful than infectious. Thomas was an unobtrusive mediator throughout, and I was impressed — by Debussy.

These concerts were untypical of my experiences with the BSO this season. Perhaps, when I attend future concerts, I should, as a good child of McLuhan, equip myself with transistor FM and headset, tune in to the Symphony broadcast, and compare the orchestra's two personae, the corporeal and the electronic.

—RICHARD BUELL

MICHAEL Tilson Thomas will conduct BSO and the Harvard Glee Club in a performance of Perotin's "Sederunt Principes" in concerts Jan. 8 and 9.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 3 1971

THE CHORUS

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB, which first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1917, has sung with the Orchestra on more than 100 occasions since. During their long and successful history the chorus has toured in many parts of the world, often with the Radcliffe Choral Society, has sung several premières, including that of Stravinsky's Oedipus rex in 1931, and has appeared with other major American orchestras, among them the Philadelphia, the Cleveland and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras. The Club has also taken part in many recordings by the Boston Symphony of choral works for RCA. Their conductor, F. John Adams, succeeded Elliot Forbes at the beginning of this season.

Thomas Leads the Bostonian In Two Works by Stockhaus

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall into dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 18 1971

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JAN 12 1971

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 14 1971

Thomas Conducts

BSO in Challenging Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

About 1200 A.D. when Notre Dame was still a-building in a Paris that had become a great center of business and learning, the composer, Perotin, dominated the music of cathedral and choir school with the most adventurous music of the late Middle Ages. The humanism of troubadour and folk music was making inroads in the other-worldly tradition of Gregorian chant, adding the physical incitement of dance rhythms and the exciting play of extra voices working against basic tune (counterpoint).

Michael Tilson Thomas made an arrangement of Perotin's Sederunt principes, adding winds, organ and bells, contriving an echo effect, as if in the Gothic vaults of a great cathedral, and called on the Harvard Glee Club to be the choir of Notre Dame.

The result was fascinating—the early day counterpoint alive with passing dissonance and compulsive rhythm, all supported on a drone base. We still have same in bagpipes — also out of the Middle Ages, in a simpler form of drone and melody. Here the fifths of the drone changed level every once in a while (we'd say, changed key) which shifted the tension, and the interaction of voices was sophisticated. Passages of plainsong kept one foot in the traditional past—these beautifully sung with their word-movement of subtle rhythm and melodic shaping.

Mr. Thomas then thrust into far-out modern Stockhausen's Punkte (points). I don't know what the title means except, perhaps, that each instrument of the orchestra had a separate part that injected bits of sound into the entanglement of the total assault. There is nothing to cling to: instruments are forced to sound like anything but themselves; no rhythm settles down and no shapes — though Mr. Thomas discerns a sequence of unrelated passages of different emphasis. A listener merely survives, irrationally stimulated by arbitrary sounds of a monotonous power only equalled by amplified Rock — or perhaps electronic noises, Stockhausen's usual stock-in-trade. It would be interesting to hear all three versions (1952, 1964, 1966) and see if the difference is appreciable to anyone but the composer. I was proud of the supporting applause of the Friday afternoon audience, trained by Koussevitzky to withhold judgment and pay attention, and now appreciative of the extraordinary effort of the performers among whom Thomas seemed to be in clear command.

Last word: any important experience leaves one with something to remember. I cannot remember a single bit of Punkte.

Schumann's No. 3 ('Rhenish') brought us back to the middle adventure of romantic creation (1850). Mr. Thomas is as good with this music as with more esoteric stuff, recapturing the pulse and color of a piece that belongs with Brahms and Wagner, at least in the heroic first movement and in the solemn brass of the fourth movement interlude.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

11 1971

Stockhausen

'Punkte' premiere . . .

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Over the past few weeks, associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have turned Symphony Hall into a kind of musical version of a Revere Beach fun house—full of unexpected surprises and harmless jolts, and really quite invigorating. No sooner does the tonal floor seem comfortably firm under foot than one is plunged onto a tilting, spinning, rippling plane of sound, unfamiliar maybe, but curiosity-provoking. Beats the old merry-go-round anytime, and makes for fewer nodding heads and early departures.

The weekend concerts last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were similarly intriguing. With acoustical effects devised electronically by Mr. Thomas and radio producer Richard L. Kaye, Mr. Thomas, using the Harvard Glee Club and a small ensemble of BSO musicians, performed the "Sederunt Principes," a chant composed by Pérotin-le-grand and sung at Notre Dame de Paris circa 1199. It was re-created here with a reverberation, we are told, that "closely approximates" the cathedral's sound in that year. Accuracy aside, the ring of this engaging Pérotin organum was impressive and strong, its performance well knit and atmospheric.

After such a cheerful, basic listening adventure the listener was plunged (unsuspectingly only if he hadn't read his program notes) into the centrifugal aural whirl of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte," in its first performance here. This, like the Perilous Platter, doesn't operate under the traditional rules of balance, so it's something of a struggle to remain upright.

Despite the formidable Stockhausen reputation for obfuscation, the mass of non sequiturs that "Punkte" ("Points") consists of was generally encompassed without too much protest or anguish. It seemed possible to wend one's way, albeit slippery, among the field of sonic stalactites and stalagmites, each tuned in its own fashion, and to admire the stark individualities of these separate sounds, rigid and unrelated as they appeared to be. After getting the fundamental stance—and Mr. Stockhausen is nothing if not explicit about his intentions—it became a question of self-disciplined acclimatizing, divorced even from the primitive vocabulary Pérotin used 700-or-so years earlier, to maintain an even keel.

Surprisingly enough, the much-maligned Friday afternoon audience took "Punkte" in its stride by paying attention, and rewarding both conductor and musicians for what one feels must have been an accurate, and certainly was a splendidly conveyed account of this craggy score. In any case, no one appeared the worse for a breathtaking dive down the shoot-the-chutes.

Like the fun house, there was provided a refreshing slide down to normalcy in the form of Schumann's Third Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish"). Familiar sights and sounds took shape again in this solid performance, and suddenly everyone was back in Symphony Hall again, with quite a different kind of outing to reminisce about to the less adventurous.

THE SOLOIST

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969 and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations. During the 1970 Berkshire Festival he was soloist with the Orchestra in Dvořák's concerto.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 6 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening January 7 1971 at 8.30 pm

Jacqueline du Pré, who was to have played the Cello concerto by Haydn, unfortunately has grave illness in her family, and has had to return to England. Her place is taken, at short notice, by Jules Eskin.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
- Langsam (Slowly)
- Bewegt (With movement)
- Mässig (Moderately)
- Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
- Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
- Langsam (Slowly)

HAYDN — Cello concerto in C
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro molto

JULES ESKIN

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
- Gigues
- Ibéria
  - Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
  - Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
  - Le matin d'un jour de fête (The morning of a festival day)
- Rondes de printemps (Spring rounds)

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
- Lebhaft (vivace)
- Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
- Nicht schnell (moderato)
- Lebhaft (vivace)

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN
241 ST. BOTOLPH STREET • BOSTON

Provides For The Handicapped Child In A Free, Private, Day School

A 12 Year Academic Program
Vocational Training • Recreation
Health Program • Transportation

The Industrial School for Crippled Children solicits funds for its operation either through Bequests, Annuities or Life Insurance.

In case of a life agreement a donor gives capital to the Industrial School for Crippled

Jules Eskin

The Boston Symphony's first cellist will be soloist with the orchestra tomorrow, Thursday, evening, under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction, in the Haydn Cello Concerto in C. Mr. Eskin replaces Jacqueline Du Pré, who has canceled her present tour because of family illness in England.

Wireless Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas' program for last weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts looked very interesting in advance, and I regret that I could not get to hear them directly, having been confined at home with a rampaging catarrh that would have competed with the musicians' output had I ventured to Symphony Hall. So, consoling myself with my stash, I caught the Friday-Saturday pair by means of WGBH and WCRB; the impressions that I got from their mercilessly super-clear and larger-than-life transmissions are the basis for this review.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1928), the 3rd Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, the late Ingolf Dahl's Concerto for Alto Saxophone and the three orchestral Images by Debussy were a pretty fair sampling of Thomas' catholic interests, and also, I'm relieved to say, of the sort of thing that he can do well. The cobwebby institution of the subscription concert really justified itself this time; what was played was worth playing, something unfamiliar got some well-deserved exposure, and the execution was sound enough to let you listen to content and design without distraction. (Maybe my physical distance from the uncongenial Symphony Hall ambience and the invisibility of Thomas' sometimes hectic and non-functional podium behavior account for my encomiastic tendencies this week. But the evidence that reached my ear-trumpet and counterpane suggests that they were in good form.)

The BSO's way with the concentrated and epigrammatic Webern pieces was fluid, clear, and balanced, altogether different from the resentful incomprehension that is still the norm for most major orchestras' treatment of this music. The Brandenburg came off least well, having been perhaps the least rehearsed. It was a pretty glutinous affair, and not even harpsichordist Robert Levin's contributions (he can often propel an ensemble like a first-rate rhythm section) were much help.

What followed, the Dahl Saxophone Concerto, was the concert's novelty and hard news. This piece, written in 1949, has something of the harmonic language and sonorous textures of the pre-serial Stravinsky, but Dahl was obviously his own man, and the energy, unabashed virtuosity, and a sort of self-critical voluptuousness, among other qualities displayed in this music, suggest an original musical personality that would regard prolonged acquaintance. The Concerto was a vehicle, though not merely that, for some ravishing playing from soloist Harvey Pittel. It reminded me how dismal the standards of symphonic saxophone playing generally are.

The Debussy Images got a strikingly unMunchlike performance, in which textural clarity, rhythmic accuracy and an absence of hysteria predominated, all in all more thoughtful than infectious. Thomas was an unobtrusive mediator throughout, and I was impressed — by Debussy.

These concerts were untypical of my experiences with the BSO this season. Perhaps, when I attend future concerts, I should, as a good child of McLuhan, equip myself with transistor FM and headset, tune in to the Symphony broadcast, and compare the orchestra's two personae, the corporeal and the electronic.

—RICHARD BUELL

MICHAEL Tilson Thomas will conduct BSO and the Harvard Glee Club in a performance of Perotin's "Sederunt Principes" in concerts Jan. 8 and 9.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 3 1971

THE CHORUS

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB, which first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1917, has sung with the Orchestra on more than 100 occasions since. During their long and successful history the chorus has toured in many parts of the world, often with the Radcliffe Choral Society, has sung several premières, including that of Stravinsky's Oedipus rex in 1931, and has appeared with other major American orchestras, among them the Philadelphia, the Cleveland and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras. The Club has also taken part in many recordings by the Boston Symphony of choral works for RCA. Their conductor, F. John Adams, succeeded Elliot Forbes at the beginning of this season.

Thomas Leads the Bostonian In Two Works by Stockhaus

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall into dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 18 1971

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JAN 12 1971

Thomas Conducts

BSO in Challenging Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

About 1200 A.D. when Notre Dame was still a-building in a Paris that had become a great center of business and learning, the composer, Perotin, dominated the music of cathedral and choir school with the most adventurous music of the late Middle Ages. The humanism of troubadour and folk music was making inroads in the other-worldly tradition of Gregorian chant, adding the physical incitement of dance rhythms and the exciting play of extra voices working against basic tune (counterpoint).

Michael Tilson Thomas made an arrangement of Perotin's Sederunt principes, adding winds, organ and bells, contriving an echo effect, as if in the Gothic vaults of a great cathedral, and called on the Harvard Glee Club to be the choir of Notre Dame.

The result was fascinating—the early day counterpoint alive with passing dissonance and compulsive rhythm, all supported on a drone base. We still have same in bagpipes — also out of the Middle Ages, in a simpler form of drone and melody. Here the fifths of the drone changed level every once in a while (we'd say, changed key) which shifted the tension, and the interaction of voices was sophisticated. Passages of plainsong kept one foot in the traditional past—these beautifully sung with their word-movement of subtle rhythm and melodic shaping.

Mr. Thomas then thrust into far-out modern Stockhausen's Punkte (points). I don't know what the title means except, perhaps, that each instrument of the orchestra had a separate part that injected bits of sound into the entanglement of the total assault. There is nothing to cling to: instruments are forced to sound like anything but themselves; no rhythm settles down and no shapes — though Mr. Thomas discerns a sequence of unrelated passages of different emphasis. A listener merely survives, irrationally stimulated by arbitrary sounds of a monotonous power only equalled by amplified Rock — or perhaps electronic noises. Stockhausen's usual stock-in-trade. It would be interesting to hear all three versions (1952, 1964, 1966) and see if the difference is appreciable to anyone but the composer. I was proud of the supporting applause of the Friday afternoon audience, trained by Koussevitzky to withhold judgment and pay attention, and now appreciative of the extraordinary effort of the performers among whom Thomas seemed to be in clear command.

Last word: any important experience leaves one with something to remember. I cannot remember a single bit of Punkte.

Schumann's No. 3 ('Rhenish') brought us back to the middle adventure of romantic creation (1850). Mr. Thomas is as good with this music as with more esoteric stuff, recapturing the pulse and color of a piece that belongs with Brahms and Wagner, at least in the heroic first movement and in the solemn brass of the fourth movement interlude.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 14 1971

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

11 1971

Stockhausen

'Punkte' premiere . . .

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Over the past few weeks, associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony have turned Symphony Hall into a kind of musical version of a Revere Beach fun house—full of unexpected surprises and harmless jolts, and really quite invigorating. No sooner does the tonal floor seem comfortably firm under foot than one is plunged onto a tilting, spinning, rippling plane of sound, unfamiliar maybe, but curiosity-provoking. Beats the old merry-go-round anytime, and makes for fewer nodding heads and early departures.

The weekend concerts last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were similarly intriguing. With acoustical effects devised electronically by Mr. Thomas and radio producer Richard L. Kaye, Mr. Thomas, using the Harvard Glee Club and a small ensemble of BSO musicians, performed the "Sederunt Principes," a chant composed by Pérotin-le-grand and sung at Notre Dame de Paris circa 1199. It was re-created here with a reverberation, we are told, that "closely approximates" the cathedral's sound in that year. Accuracy aside, the ring of this engaging Pérotin organum was impressive and strong, its performance well knit and atmospheric.

After such a cheerful, basic listening adventure the listener was plunged (unsuspectingly only if he hadn't read his program notes) into the centrifugal aural whirl of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte," in its first performance here. This, like the Perilous Platter, doesn't operate under the traditional rules of balance, so it's something of a struggle to remain upright.

Despite the formidable Stockhausen reputation for obfuscation, the mass of non sequiturs that "Punkte" ("Points") consists of was generally encompassed without too much protest or anguish. It seemed possible to wend one's way, albeit slippery, among the field of sonic stalactites and stalagmites, each tuned in its own fashion, and to admire the stark individualities of these separate sounds, rigid and unrelated as they appeared to be. After getting the fundamental stance—and Mr. Stockhausen is nothing if not explicit about his intentions—it became a question of self-disciplined acclimatizing, divorced even from the primitive vocabulary Pérotin used 700-or-so years earlier, to maintain an even keel.

Surprisingly enough, the much-maligned Friday afternoon audience took "Punkte" in its stride by paying attention, and rewarding both conductor and musicians for what one feels must have been an accurate, and certainly was a splendidly conveyed account of this craggy score. In any case, no one appeared the worse for a breathtaking dive down the shoot-the-chutes.

Like the fun house, there was provided a refreshing slide down to normalcy in the form of Schumann's Third Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish"). Familiar sights and sounds took shape again in this solid performance, and suddenly everyone was back in Symphony Hall again, with quite a different kind of outing to reminisce about to the less adventurous.

18

Symphony: Thomas Conducts Karlheinz Stockhausen's Ultra Far Out 'Punkte'

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some drugs are said to be capable of profoundly altering one's aesthetic perceptions. With the help of certain hallucinogens one can, for example, find incredible beauty in an ash tray of cigarette butts.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

JAN 9 1971

I don't for a moment wish to equate the artistic appeal of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte" with that of cigarette butts, but I couldn't help thinking that the people hearing it at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert might have benefitted from some kind of artifically expanded consciousness.

IN ANY EVENT, the BSO management would have risked no greater offense by offering "joints" to its patrons than it did by offering them Stockhausen's 22 minutes of ultra far out music.

As rock musicians are fond of saying after playing in what they like to think of as the local citadel of squareness, "Symphony Hall will never be the same again."

Descriptions of modern music tend to sound as much alike as the music itself, and I can do no better for "Punkte" ("Points") than to say that it is scored for large orchestra, that it makes much use of tone clusters and related effects, and that it gives the impression of an extreme density of events. Hostile listeners might describe it as "music of the snap-crackle-pop variety," or words to that effect. Here is how Lawrence Morton, a sympathetic listener described it:

"It was written . . . as a piece originating not in silence upon which sounds would be imposed, but as a literally solid mass of sound from which extraneous material would be excised, leaving only the desired sounds and silences. This was a sculptural idea, like the chiseling of a previsioned form from a block of marble."

NEEDLESS TO SAY, "Punkte" is exceedingly heavy going for the listener (though not so for the performer, I'm told), but almost as off-putting as the music itself is the kind of propaganda effort that nearly always accompanies music of this kind — assurances that because a composer is bright his music deserves to be taken seriously, and suggestions that — as happened with late Bethoven quartets — [illegible] of this music is reserved to some future date.

MARGOT KIDDER stars with Gene Wilder in the new comedy-romance, "Gene Wilder is Quacksser Fortune." Shot on location in Dublin, the film is currently at the Exeter Street Theater.

This listener's slender enjoyment of the work was of the kind one gets from watching changing cloud formations — a pleasurable enough activity, but not what I want from a concert experience. And having acknowledged that prejudice, I suppose it is superfluous to add that I thought "Punkte" about five times too long.

Michael Tilson Thomas opened the program by conducting the Harvard Glee Club in his own arrangement of "Sederunt Principes," by Perotin, a French composer of the 12th century. "Sederunt" turns out to be an extraordinarily beautiful work, austere and severe even in its dance-like fast sections.

Something of the reverberating effect of a cathedral performance was captured by an electronic set-up between the stage and the hall's second-floor art gallery. The latter served as a resonating chamber from which the music was fed back into onstage speakers, thus creating an echo effect.

Concluding the afternoon was an unsentimental, clean and highly pleasurable performance of Schumann's Third ("Rhenish") Symphony.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening January 19 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

PÉROTIN — Sederunt principes
HARVARD GLEE CLUB
F. John Adams conductor

DAHL — Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra
Recitative
Adagio (passacaglia)
Rondo alla marcia: allegro brioso
HARVEY PITTEL

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
Gigues
Ibéria
Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
Le matin d'un jour de fête (The morning of a festival day)
Rondes de printemps (Spring rounds)

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening January 21 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon January 22 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 23 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 9 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 16 1971 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Serenade no. 9 in D K. 320 'Posthorn'
Marcia (K. 335)
Adagio maestoso – allegro con spirito
Concertante: andante grazioso
Menuetto: allegretto
Rondeau: allegro ma non troppo
Andantino
Menuetto
Finale: presto
ARMANDO GHITALLA posthorn

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (original version of 1911)*
The Shrove – tide fair
Petrushka's cell
The Moor's cell
The fair (towards evening)
NEWTON WAYLAND piano

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony, returns for the second consecutive season as guest conductor of the Orchestra. During his tenure of seven years he made a significant contribution to American musical life. Under his leadership the Orchestra presented many premières, and restored many works to the repertoire. Among the latter were Schumann's Faust, the original versions of Beethoven's Fidelio and Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, and the Piano concerto no. 1 of Xaver Scharwenka, while among the numerous world and American premières were Britten's War requiem and Cello symphony, the piano concertos of Samuel Barber and Elliott Carter, Gunther Schuller's Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony no. 8. As Head of the Berkshire Music Center, he worked intensively with the young musicians who came to Tanglewood, and conducted many performances, including Schoenberg's Die glücklische Hand and Berg's Wozzeck. Erich Leinsdorf also made a large number of recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA, among them the nine symphonies and five piano concertos of Beethoven, the latter with Artur Rubinstein as soloist, many of Prokofiev's works for orchestra, symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Bruckner and Mahler, Verdi's Requiem and Wagner's Lohengrin.

Despite his heavy schedule during the winter season in Boston and at Tanglewood, where he led the majority of the Festival concerts in addition to heading the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, Erich Leinsdorf found time to make several guest conducting tours with European orchestras, and to record operas for RCA, among them Mozart's Così fan tutte, a Grammy award winner, Verdi's Un ballo in maschera and Salome of Strauss.

During the months since he last conducted the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf had led concerts with major European orchestras in Amsterdam, Milan, London, Helsinki, Hamburg, Rotterdam, Lucerne, Cologne, Düsseldorf, Zürich, Paris, Copenhagen and Lisbon. After his appearance with the Boston Symphony here and in New York, he will conduct the Chicago Symphony and Cleveland Orchestras, then will go to Europe for engagements in Madrid, Paris, Berlin, Munich, Frankfurt, Lausanne and London, conducting among others, L'Orchestre de Paris, the Berlin Philharmonic and the New Philharmonia. Apart from his many recordings for RCA, Erich Leinsdorf has also conducted for the Angel, Capitol, London, Westminster, Odyssey, Seraphim and Pickwick labels.

Symphony: Erich Leinsdorf Returns to Boston as Guest Conductor

By HARRY NEVILLE

On Thursday evening, Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium of Symphony Hall to guest-conduct the orchestra he had served as music director for seven years. The audience greeted him cordially and Leinsdorf for his part beamed appreciation from the stage.

He seemed genuinely pleased once again to be working with and before old friends and colleagues, and it would be nice to be able to report that the reunion resulted in some spirited music-making. Unfortunately, Thursday's concert of the Boston Symphony was one of the most lackluster of the season.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

JAN 23 1971

The program, repeated yesterday and to be played again tonight as well as Feb. 9 and 16, consisted of Mozart's Serenade No. 9 ("Posthorn") and Stravinsky's "Petrushka" in the original version of 1911. Leinsdorf prefaced the former work with a charming march, K. 335, which, as the program notes stated, is believed by scholars to have been played in conjunction with the serenade.

If I had to choose three words to sum up both performances, I think I would say that they were "gentle and relaxed," which isn't a bad thing for the serenade to be during much of its course, but which becomes a bit of a bore when sustained through eight movements.

Needless to say, this kind of treatment is totally wrong for "Petrushka," which requires all manner of sharp rhythmic, dynamic and textural contrasts if its dramatic points are to come across vividly. Despite many instances of good solo playing, it was quite obvious that Leinsdorf had in no way ignited the orchestra.

18

Symphony: Thomas Conducts Karlheinz Stockhausen's Ultra Far Out 'Punkte'

By HARRY NEVILLE

Some drugs are said to be capable of profoundly altering one's aesthetic perceptions. With the help of certain hallucinogens one can, for example, find incredible beauty in an ash tray of cigarette butts.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

JAN 9 1971

I don't for a moment wish to equate the artistic appeal of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Punkte" with that of cigarette butts, but I couldn't help thinking that the people hearing it at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert might have benefitted from some kind of artifically expanded consciousness.

IN ANY EVENT, the BSO management would have risked no greater offense by offering "joints" to its patrons than it did by offering them Stockhausen's 22 minutes of ultra far out music.

As rock musicians are fond of saying after playing in what they like to think of as the local citadel of squareness, "Symphony Hall will never be the same again."

Descriptions of modern music tend to sound as much alike as the music itself, and I can do no better for "Punkte" ("Points") than to say that it is scored for large orchestra, that it makes much use of tone clusters and related effects, and that it gives the impression of an extreme density of events. Hostile listeners might describe it as "music of the snap-crackle-pop variety," or words to that effect. Here is how Lawrence Morton, a sympathetic listener described it:

"It was written . . . as a piece originating not in silence upon which sounds would be imposed, but as a literally solid mass of sound from which extraneous material would be excised, leaving only the desired sounds and silences. This was a sculptural idea, like the chiseling of a previsioned form from a block of marble."

NEEDLESS TO SAY, "Punkte" is exceedingly heavy going for the listener (though not so for the performer, I'm told), but almost as off-putting as the music itself is the kind of propaganda effort that nearly always accompanies music of this kind — assurances that because a composer is bright his music deserves to be taken seriously, and suggestions that — as happened with late Bethoven quartets — [illegible] of this music is reserved to some future date.

This listener's slender enjoyment of the work was of the kind one gets from watching changing cloud formations — a pleasurable enough activity, but not what I want from a concert experience. And having acknowledged that prejudice, I suppose it is superfluous to add that I thought "Punkte" about five times too long.

Michael Tilson Thomas opened the program by conducting the Harvard Glee Club in his own arrangement of "Sederunt Principes," by Perotin, a French composer of the 12th century. "Sederunt" turns out to be an extraordinarily beautiful work, austere and severe even in its dance-like fast sections.

Something of the reverberating effect of a cathedral performance was captured by an electronic set-up between the stage and the hall's second-floor art gallery. The latter served as a resonating chamber from which the music was fed back into on-stage speakers, thus creating an echo effect.

Concluding the afternoon was an unsentimental, clean and highly pleasurable performance of Schumann's Third ("Rhenish") Symphony.

MARGOT KIDDER stars with Gene Wilder in the new comedy-romance, "Gene Wilder is Quacksser Fortune." Shot on location in Dublin, the film is currently at the Exeter Street Theater.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening January 19 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

PÉROTIN — Sederunt principes
HARVARD GLEE CLUB
F. John Adams conductor

DAHL — Concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra
Recitative
Adagio (passacaglia)
Rondo alla marcia: allegro brioso
HARVEY PITTEL

intermission

DEBUSSY — 'Images' pour orchestre*
Gigues
Ibéria
Par les rues et par les chemins
(In the streets and byways)
Les parfums de la nuit
(The fragrance of the night)
Le matin d'un jour de fête
(The morning of a festival day)
Rondes de printemps (Spring rounds)

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening January 21 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon January 22 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 23 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 9 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 16 1971 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Serenade no. 9 in D K. 320 'Posthorn'
Marcia (K. 335)
Adagio maestoso – allegro con spirito
Concertante: andante grazioso
Menuetto: allegretto
Rondeau: allegro ma non troppo
Andantino
Menuetto
Finale: presto
ARMANDO GHITALLA posthorn

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (original version of 1911)*
The Shrove – tide fair
Petrushka's cell
The Moor's cell
The fair (towards evening)
NEWTON WAYLAND piano

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF, former Music Director of the Boston Symphony, returns for the second consecutive season as guest conductor of the Orchestra. During his tenure of seven years he made a significant contribution to American musical life. Under his leadership the Orchestra presented many premières, and restored many works to the repertoire. Among the latter were Schumann's Faust, the original versions of Beethoven's Fidelio and Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, and the Piano concerto no. 1 of Xaver Scharwenka, while among the numerous world and American premières were Britten's War requiem and Cello symphony, the piano concertos of Samuel Barber and Elliott Carter, Gunther Schuller's Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony no. 8. As Head of the Berkshire Music Center, he worked intensively with the young musicians who came to Tanglewood, and conducted many performances, including Schoenberg's Die glücklische Hand and Berg's Wozzeck. Erich Leinsdorf also made a large number of recordings with the Boston Symphony for RCA, among them the nine symphonies and five piano concertos of Beethoven, the latter with Artur Rubinstein as soloist, many of Prokofiev's works for orchestra, symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Bruckner and Mahler, Verdi's Requiem and Wagner's Lohengrin.

Despite his heavy schedule during the winter season in Boston and at Tanglewood, where he led the majority of the Festival concerts in addition to heading the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, Erich Leinsdorf found time to make several guest conducting tours with European orchestras, and to record operas for RCA, among them Mozart's Così fan tutte, a Grammy award winner, Verdi's Un ballo in maschera and Salome of Strauss.

During the months since he last conducted the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf had led concerts with major European orchestras in Amsterdam, Milan, London, Helsinki, Hamburg, Rotterdam, Lucerne, Cologne, Düsseldorf, Zürich, Paris, Copenhagen and Lisbon. After his appearance with the Boston Symphony here and in New York, he will conduct the Chicago Symphony and Cleveland Orchestras, then will go to Europe for engagements in Madrid, Paris, Berlin, Munich, Frankfurt, Lausanne and London, conducting among others, L'Orchestre de Paris, the Berlin Philharmonic and the New Philharmonia. Apart from his many recordings for RCA, Erich Leinsdorf has also conducted for the Angel, Capitol, London, Westminster, Odyssey, Seraphim and Pickwick labels.

Symphony: Erich Leinsdorf Returns to Boston as Guest Conductor

By HARRY NEVILLE

On Thursday evening, Erich Leinsdorf returned to the podium of Symphony Hall to guest-conduct the orchestra he had served as music director for seven years. The audience greeted him cordially and Leinsdorf for his part beamed appreciation from the stage.

He seemed genuinely pleased once again to be working with and before old friends and colleagues, and it would be nice to be able to report that the reunion resulted in some spirited music-making. Unfortunately, Thursday's concert of the Boston Symphony was one of the most lackluster of the season.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

JAN 23 1971

The program, repeated yesterday and to be played again tonight as well as Feb. 9 and 16, consisted of Mozart's Serenade No. 9 ("Posthorn") and Stravinsky's "Petrushka" in the original version of 1911. Leinsdorf prefaced the former work with a charming march, K. 335, which, as the program notes stated, is believed by scholars to have been played in conjunction with the serenade.

If I had to choose three words to sum up both performances, I think I would say that they were "gentle and relaxed," which isn't a bad thing for the serenade to be during much of its course, but which becomes a bit of a bore when sustained through eight movements.

Needless to say, this kind of treatment is totally wrong for "Petrushka," which requires all manner of sharp rhythmic, dynamic and textural contrasts if its dramatic points are to come across vividly. Despite many instances of good solo playing, it was quite obvious that Leinsdorf had in no way ignited the orchestra.

Leinsdorf conducts symphony

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 506,277
JAN 1971

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Erich Leinsdorf, in the second year of his and the Boston Symphony's liberation from each other, returned to the orchestra as a guest conductor this week with a program consisting of Mozart's Posthorn Serenade and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

ERICH LEINSDORF
. . . guest appearance

The most rewarding thing about the concert was the possibility it presented of hearing "Petrushka" in the original version of 1911. During the 1940s, Stravinsky made new editions of several of his early works, mainly to bring them under copyright protection, but at the same time giving at least some of them a leaner sound more consonant with that of his more recent compositions. Very few conductors of "Firebird" prefer the 1945 edition to one of the earlier ones, but with "Petrushka," oddly enough, the 1946 score seems almost completely to have replaced the 1911 one.

The revised "Petrushka" is enormously interesting as the 64-year-old composer's rather severe commentary on the work of his 28-year-old self and it is, of course, as elegantly done and fine-sounding as you would expect. Nevertheless, there is a strong case to be made for the 1911 "Petrushka" as preferable because it's truer, because its ample, richly glowing, colorful sound is so exactly the right one for the material. The late Ernest Ansermet used to cite the accompaniment in the Wet-Nurses' Dance as an example, the smooth and swirling lines of a quartet of bassoons in 1911 as against the staccato clarinets and bassoons with popping trumpets in the revision. Ansermet in his later years was something of a Bircher on many musical issues, but on "Petrushka" I think he was right.

The "Petrushka" performance yesterday afternoon, though perhaps a little under-characterized and sometimes on the slow side, was on the whole an engaging and effective statement of the wonderful, incredibly fresh score. Excellent solo playing by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Chester Schmitz, tuba, and Newton Wayland, piano.

The introductory march to the "Posthorn" Serenade and the first movement proper were played with energy, but most of what happened during the remainder of that long piece was unbreathing and rhythmically on the slids. Leinsdorf reversed the order of the second and third movements — not a good idea, I would think, because it separates the two G major "concertante" movements which Mozart meant to have in succession, and because it upsets the pleasant symmetry that puts one minuet right after the first movement and the other just before the finale.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 20 1971

Erich Leinsdorf

The former music director of the Boston Symphony returns to conduct the orchestra tomorrow evening and on Friday afternoon, Jan. 22, and Saturday evening, Jan. 23, at Symphony Hall, in a program of works by Mozart and Stravinsky.

Leinsdorf, Mozart, Stravinsky

By Louis Snyder

Two sizable pieces of music, neither of which was originally conceived to stand by itself orchestrally, formed the program which brought Erich Leinsdorf back to conduct this weekend's concerts by the Boston Symphony, of which he is the former music director. Both works—Mozart's "Posthorn" Serenade (No. 9 in D, K. 320), and Stravinsky's "Petrushka" ballet score, complete in its original 1911 version—are good listening at any time, but a little supplementary use of the imagination to envision the reasons for their being composed makes them even better.

The Serenade, commissioned of Mozart as a lengthy accompaniment to an evening party (eating, drinking, dancing, conversation, entertainment) is in seven movements (a related March (K. 333) was added at the beginning by Mr. Leinsdorf), each of which was once undoubtedly separated from the other by pauses of varying length as breathers for the musicians and concessions to the maneuvering of guests. It was, in other words, a kind of Salzburgian Muzak, and as one sits solemly before it nowadays, it does no harm to superpose in one's imagination the laughter, the clatter, and the whispered nothings that must have accompanied it back in 1779, when Mozart, aged 23, composed it. It somehow needs something, not because Mozart is ever lacking, but having been perceptive socially, he knew his audience and what to expect of it. Surely, it wasn't unwavering attention.

In "Petrushka," Stravinsky is able to give the listener more pictorial help as to what's happening, if indeed the score is to be heard without the dancing and the bizarre show that it so wonderfully complements. Here, as in the Mozart, the interplay of the BSO's instrumental soloists and orchestral forces brought alive aurally, if not visually, the circumstances that inspired the composers. Purely as music, and especially as played by the Boston Symphony, "Petrushka" is an exhilarating experience, but there is no doubt that it takes on new dimensions and colors with the presence of the tragic puppet, the Ballerina, the Moor, the Charlatan, and the whole motley cast, if only in the mind.

Thursday's performance found Mr. Leinsdorf seeming to need to urge on his former charges, but by tonight's performance, and the repetitions of Feb. 9 and 16, they should be used to one another again.

Leinsdorf returns

BY L. P. KATZENSTEIN

There was much nostalgia in the air last weekend as one of the BSO's most distinguished alumni returned: Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted the BSO from 1962 until 1969.

What can you say about an era that died? That it saw the BSO regain some of the discipline it had lost under Charles Munch, that it gave pleasure to a great many music lovers and somewhat less to most of the critics, who would have liked a bit more excitement. Saturday's concert brought back memories of those years.

Leinsdorf chose Mozart's "Posthorn" Serenade and Stravinsky's Petrushka for his homecoming. I love Petrushka and think I shall never tire hearing it, and hearing something new each time. Leinsdorf conducted the original 1911 version rather than Stravinsky's 1947 revision —a happy choice. I prefer the original version not because the orchestration is so radically different, but because the 1947 revision omits the scene of Petrushka's death which for me contains the most touching music of the entire score—Petrushka's ghost trumpeting its anguish, a last view of the old puppet-master.

Saturday's Petrushka was one of the most exciting I have heard, recorded or live. It had color, verve, fine ensemble and impeccable solo work. Many Petrushka's are too sober, but this one was sheer fun.

Mozart's Serenade K. 320 fared less well. It is not soul-searching Mozart but very funny Mozart, buoyant with youthful spirits. I thought its performance was rather lackluster. There was almost no dynamic contrast and the piece came out sounding stern and humorless.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500
FEB 2 1971

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
JAN 21 1971

Leinsdorf to lead Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the fourteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Jan. 22, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan 23 at 8:30 p.m. The concert consists of Mozart's Serenade no. 9, "Posthorn," and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1962 to 1969, Leinsdorf last conducted the Orchestra as Music Director at Tanglewood during the summer of 1969 in a performance of Beethoven's 9th symphony. Under his direction, the Orchestra presented many premieres and revived many neglected masterpieces. Among the latter were the complete Schumann "Faust," the original concert-opera versions of Beethoven's "Fidelio," Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" and the Scharwenka Piano concerto. Among the American and world premieres were Britten's "War Requiem" and Cello symphony and Piston's Symphony no. 8. During the summer of 1969, Leinsdorf conducted members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and vocal fellows in Berg's "Wozzeck," During his tenure as Music Director, Leinsdorf and the Orchestra toured the length and breadth of the United States.

Leinsdorf conducts the fourth concert of the Thursday "A" series Thursday evening, Jan. 21 at 8:30 p.m. The concert is Mozart's Serenade no. 9, "Posthorn," and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 23 1971

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
FEB 10 1971

The Sound of Music

The Leinsdorf Inheritance

By Peter M. Knapp

It may be that orchestra conductors, like university presidents, should move on every few years instead of holding long tenure with one orchestra.

But still it was disturbing to reflect, as the familiar figure of Erich Leinsdorf took the podium last night for one of his guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, that the question of his successor has not yet been settled.

Since the former music director's departure, there have been many guest appearances and no real permanent conductor. In fact, Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas — whom the BSO is fortunate to have — has led the orchestra as much as anyone else during the last two years. And now it is choosing time again as William Steinberg — who hasn't beeen here that much — has made it clear that next year will be his last as nominal head of the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf, somewhat heavier and clad in a blue suit instead of the usual formal tails, was warmly welcomed back to Symphony Hall and his program well applauded. There were only two pieces — Mozart's "Posthorn" Serenade, No. 9 in D, K. 320, and the original 1911 version of Stravinsky's "Petrushka".

Leinsdorf conducted both from memory, and if he seemed to forego the zip and bounce of the old days, the music-making had the familiar Leinsdorf air of assured authority and calm control.

The Mozart serenade, prefaced by the jaunty March, K. 335, which some musicologists believe was played with the serenade, had the customary Leinsdorf lean string sound, the care in balance and neatly-modeled details.

In execution, not all was scrupulously precise (consider, for example, the previous day's recording session of Scriabin and Tschaikovsky with Claudio Abbado as one example of how orchestra musicians must rapidly adjust to different leaders and different music) and there were moments when it sounded emotionally antiseptic. But there also were noteworthy solo contributions in the concertante movements by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe, as well as by Armando Ghitalla on the posthorn.

"Petruskhka", too, had the benefit of many vivid details, sober tempi (nothing out of shape here), and the piquant accents of Stravinsky's genius for orchestral color. And the conclusion, with Petrushka's demise, was presented with touching poignancy.

Leinsdorf To Conduct Symphony

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654
JAN 13 1971

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the 14th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon, Jan. 22 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan. 23 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert consists of Mozart's Serenade No. 9, "Posthorn," and Stravinsky's Petrushka.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950
JAN 17 1971

Erich Leinsdorf returns this week to conduct three performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,30
JAN 17 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening January 26 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
Adagio – vivace
Adagio ma non troppo
Menuetto & trio: allegretto
Presto assai

VIOTTI — Violin concerto no. 22 in A minor
Moderato
Adagio
Agitato assai
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
Lebhaft (vivace)
Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
Nicht schnell (moderato)
Feierlich (maestoso) – Lebhaft (vivace)

Symphony: Falla, Ravel

By HARRY NEVILLE

Rafael Frubeck de Burgos made his local conducting debut at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony. His program contained some of the most brilliant-sounding music in the orchestral literature—Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and Suite from "The Thre-Cornered Hat," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

Yet, despite its surface brilliance, this is music that does not play itself. It is, in fact, quite difficult to bring off effectively, and Frubeck should be given full credit for his achievement, which was to get some marvelously viviid and exciting playing from the BSO.

FOR THOSE who like to explain musical abilities along nationalistic lines, it might be interesting to note that Frubeck, who is musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, is a product of two distinct cultural strains. His parents were German and an important part of his training took place in Munich. He was born and reared, however, in Spain, where he also studied at conservatories in Bilbao and Madrid.

One might conjecture that his Teutonic heritage accounts for his precision and discipline, and that his Spanish environment explains his brilliant feeling for Falla's music. (The performances yesterday were quite the best I've heard of this composer's works. Even "Ritual Fire Dance" seemed alive and fresh once more.) But such conjecture does nothing to explain his equal sureness with Ravel.

CHRISTOPH Eschenback was the soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto, of which he gave a sweeping performance, big-toned and effulgent yet lyrical and infused with warmth. His use of tempo fluctuations as an expensive device was unfailingly compelling for the listener. I should think though that it might pose problems for a conductor. In any event, coordination yesterday was somewhat erratic at several points, particularly at the conclusion.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 2
JAN 30 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 29 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 30 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 2 1971 at 7.30

RAFAEL FRÜHBECK DE BURGOS conductor

FALLA — 'El amor brujo', ballet-pantomime
Introduction and scene – The gypsies' cave (evening) – Song of sorrowful love – The return of the specter – Dance of terror – The magic circle (narrative of the fisherman) – Midnight (sorcery) – Ritual dance of fire (to exorcise the evil spirits) – Scene – Song of the will-o'-the-wisp – Pantomime – Dance of the game of love – Finale (bells of morning)
EUNICE ALBERTS mezzo-soprano

FALLA — Suite from the ballet 'El sombrero de tres picos' (The three-cornered hat)
Introduction; afternoon – Dance of the miller's wife (Fandango) – The Corregidor – The grapes – The neighbors – Dance of the miller (Farruca) – Final dance

intermission

SCHUMANN — Piano concerto in A minor op. 54
Allegro affettuoso
Intermezzo: andantino grazioso
Allegro vivace
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*†
Lever du jour (Daybreak)
Pantomime (Mime)
Danse générale (General dance)

BSO debut

De Burgos, Eschenbach

By Louis Snyder

Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos made his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony over last weekend, and quite understandably programmed some of his native Spain's headier music for the orchestra to play. With him were the young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, also making his Boston debut with the BSO in the Schumann Concerto, (he played at Tanglewood in 1969 and 1970), and contralto Eunice Alberts, who sang the three gypsy songs in Falla's "El Amor Brujo," which opened the concerts.

Neither "El Amor Brujo" nor the Suite from Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" has been played by the orchestra within the last 10 to 15 years, so these re-creations of the scores are quite definitely the conductor's own. They were full of vigor, color, and rhythmic pulse, directed by Mr. de Burgos with quasi-balletic energy, which brought forth crisp orchestral playing. Miss Alberts too added her sultry voice to the first of the two scores, which generates more excitement than the more calculated "Sombrero."

Mr. Eschenbach, whose Mozart in the Berkshire has been delectable on two occasions, made a dazzling entry into Symphony Hall with a superromantic performance of the Schumann. His ideas (or maybe Mr. de Burgos's ideas) revealed some unaccustomed contrasts in tempi, particularly in the opening Allegro, which slowed down almost to a halt at one point, but the brilliance of his playing, and the obvious perception which infused it, allowed for surprises in interpretation of the work as a whole. Soloist, conductor, and orchestra received a rousing reception.

To top off his debut, Mr. de Burgos offered the second of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloé" Suites. It must have seemed quite different to those who remember the more refined exuberance of Koussevitzky or Munch, but the explosive Latin conception of Mr. de Burgos made its effect, too, what with the vigorous cooperation of the musicians, and some predictably lovely sound from the flute of Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
FEB 1 1971

Spanish conduc to lead Symphon

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this Friday in a concert featuring pianist Christoph Eschenbach and contralto Eunice Alberts as soloists.

Miss Alberts will perform the solo part in Falla's "El Amor Brujo;" Eschenbach will play the Schumann piano concerto.

Also on the prog
peated Saturday
Falla's Suite fro
Cornered Hat"
"Daphnis and Ch
2.

The program fo evening features
Joseph Silverstein
Viotti's Violin Co
Michael Tilson
ducts. Other works to be heard are Schumann's Third and Haydn's 97th symphonies.

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

RAFAEL FRÜHBECK DE BURGOS, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts, was born in Spain of German parents. After studies at the Bilbao and Madrid Conservatories, he completed his musical training at the Hochschule für Musik in Munich, where he graduated summa cum laude and was awarded the Richard Strauss prize by the City. In 1959, still in his mid-twenties, he became musical director of the Bilbao Symphony. Three years later he became musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, a post he still holds, although much of his time is now spent guest conducting outside Spain. During recent years he has conducted many of the world's major orchestras, among them the London Symphony, the New Philharmonia, the London Philharmonic, the Orchestre Nationale in Paris, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Stuttgart Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony. He has also appeared at many of the European music festivals. Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos has made many recordings on the Angel and London labels.

THE SOLOISTS

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Festivals of 1969 and 1970, makes his debut with the Orchestra in Boston at these concerts. Born in Breslau in 1940, he began to study piano with his mother at the age of eight. Two years later the family moved to Hamburg, where the boy's musical talent was recognized by Eugen Jochum, who brought him to study with Eliza Hansen, a former protegée of Artur Schnabel and Edwin Fischer. He later continued his studies in Cologne, then returned to Hamburg for further work with Mme Hansen. He graduated from the Hamburg Music Academy with highest honors, meanwhile having won the Steinway Young Pianists' competition in 1951 and 1952, and in 1959 the Deutscher Hochschulen competition. Later he won the Munich International Music competition and the Concours Clara Haskil in Lucerne.

Christoph Eschenbach has appeared with leading orchestras of Europe and North America, among them the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, the Cleveland, the Chicago Symphony, the Montreal Symphony and the Toronto Symphony, and has also given solo recitals in many parts of the world. He was the only artist chosen to represent West Germany at Montreal's Expo '67. He has made several recordings for Deutsche Grammophon.

Symphony: Falla, Ravel

By HARRY NEVILLE

Rafael Frubeck de Burgos made his local conducting debut at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony. His program contained some of the most brilliant-sounding music in the orchestral literature—Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and Suite from "The Thre-Cornered Hat," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

Yet, despite its surface brilliance, this is music that does not play itself. It is, in fact, quite difficult to bring off effectively, and Frubeck should be given full credit for his achievement, which was to get some marvelously viviid and exciting playing from the BSO.

FOR THOSE who like to explain musical abilities along nationalistic lines, it might be interesting to note that Frubeck, who is musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, is a product of two distinct cultural strains. His parents were German and an important part of his training took place in Munich. He was born and reared, however, in Spain, where he also studied at conservatories in Bilbao and Madrid.

One might conjecture that his Teutonic heritage accounts for his precision and discipline, and that his Spanish environment explains his brilliant feeling for Falla's music. (The performances yesterday were quite the best I've heard of this composer's works. Even "Ritual Fire Dance" seemed alive and fresh once more.) But such conjecture does nothing to explain his equal sureness with Ravel.

CHRISTOPH Eschenback was the soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto, of which he gave a sweeping performance, big-toned and effulgent yet lyrical and infused with warmth. His use of tempo fluctuations as an expensive device was unfailingly compelling for the listener. I should think though that it might pose problems for a conductor. In any event, coordination yesterday was somewhat erratic at several points, particularly at the conclusion.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 2

JAN 30 1971

bach

alculated "Som-
Mozart in the able on two oc-entry into Symomantic perforideas (or maybe vealed some un-npi, particularly ch slowed down
nt, but the bril-
he obvious per-llowed for sur-
the work as a and orchestra on.
Mr. de Burgos
s "Daphnis and e seemed quite mber the more oussevitzky or atin conception ffect, too, what on of the muy lovely sound ony Dwyer.

Spanish conductor to lead Symphony

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this Friday in a concert featuring pianist Christoph Eschenbach and contralto Eunice Alberts as soloists.

Miss Alberts will perform the solo part in Falla's "El Amor Brujo;" Eschenbach will play the Schumann piano concerto.

Also on the program, to be repeated Saturday night, are Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

The program for this Tuesday evening features concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Other works to be heard are Schumann's Third and Haydn's 97th symphonies.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 2

JAN 24 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 29 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 30 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 2 1971 at 7.30

RAFAEL FRÜHBECK DE BURGOS conductor

FALLA — 'El amor brujo', ballet-pantomime

Introduction and scene – The gypsies' cave (evening) – Song of sorrowful love – The return of the specter – Dance of terror – The magic circle (narrative of the fisherman) – Midnight (sorcery) – Ritual dance of fire (to exorcise the evil spirits) – Scene – Song of the will-o'-the-wisp – Pantomime – Dance of the game of love – Finale (bells of morning)

EUNICE ALBERTS mezzo-soprano

FALLA — Suite from the ballet 'El sombrero de tres picos' (The three-cornered hat)

Introduction; afternoon – Dance of the miller's wife (Fandango) – The Corregidor – The grapes – The neighbors – Dance of the miller (Farruca) – Final dance

intermission

SCHUMANN — Piano concerto in A minor op. 54

Allegro affettuoso
Intermezzo: andantino grazioso
Allegro vivace

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*†

Lever du jour (Daybreak)
Pantomime (Mime)
Danse générale (General dance)

EUNICE ALBERTS, who made her professional debut with the Boston Symphony after graduating from the New England Conservatory of Music, was born in Boston. Her mother was the noted singer Adele Alberts, who taught her daughter to sing almost as soon as she could talk. During her career Eunice Alberts has performed with all the major orchestras in the country, among them the New York Philharmonic, the Washington National Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Buffalo, Cincinnati and Dallas Symphonies. For several years she has been principal contralto of the Opera Company of Boston, and she has taken leading roles in productions of Verdi's Falstaff, Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel, Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov, Gounod's Faust and Stravinsky's The rake's progress. She has made recordings on the RCA, Music Guild and CRI labels. Eunice Alberts most recently appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance last summer at Tanglewood of Beethoven's Symphony no. 9.

APPEARANCES BY A MEMBER OF THE ORCHESTRA

LUIS LEGUIA, a cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give several recitals during the coming weeks with pianist Robert Freeman. On January 31st they play at Wesleyan University, Connecticut, then a few days later, on February 3rd, for WGBH, Boston. On February 8th they appear at MIT's Kresge Auditorium, on the 10th at the OAS Pan American Union in Washington, DC, and on the 20th at Town Hall, New York. Their repertoire will include works by Beethoven, Kodály, Schubert and Elliott Carter.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the Friday-Saturday series are available by mail to those wishing to buy a subscription. The programs are mailed on the Friday of each pair of concerts. Subscription prices for the 1970-1971 season are $12.50 (first class mail) and $10 (third class mail). Subscription requests should be addressed to PROGRAM OFFICE, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS 02115.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Tuesday evening January 26 1971 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 97 in C
- Adagio – vivace
- Adagio ma non troppo
- Menuetto & trio: allegretto
- Presto assai

VIOTTI — Violin concerto no. 22 in A minor
- Moderato
- Adagio
- Agitato assai

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 97 'Rhenish'*
- Lebhaft (vivace)
- Scherzo: sehr mässig (molto moderato)
- Nicht schnell (moderato)
- Feierlich (maestoso) – Lebhaft (vivace)

Symphony: Falla, Ravel

By HARRY NEVILLE

Rafael Frubeck de Burgos made his local conducting debut at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony. His program contained some of the most brilliant-sounding music in the orchestral literature—Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and Suite from "The Thre-Cornered Hat," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

Yet, despite its surface brilliance, this is music that does not play itself. It is, in fact, quite difficult to bring off effectively, and Frubeck should be given full credit for his achievement, which was to get some marvelously viviid and exciting playing from the BSO.

FOR THOSE who like to explain musical abilities along nationalistic lines, it might be interesting to note that Frubeck, who is musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, is a product of two distinct cultural strains. His parents were German and an important part of his training took place in Munich. He was born and reared, however, in Spain, where he also studied at conservatories in Bilbao and Madrid.

One might conjecture that his Teutonic heritage accounts for his precision and discipline, and that his Spanish environment explains his brilliant feeling for Falla's music. (The performances yesterday were quite the best I've heard of this composer's works. Even "Ritual Fire Dance" seemed alive and fresh once more.) But such conjecture does nothing to explain his equal sureness with Ravel.

CHRISTOPH Eschenback was the soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto, of which he gave a sweeping performance, big-toned and effulgent yet lyrical and infused with warmth. His use of tempo fluctuations as an expensive device was unfailingly compelling for the listener. I should think though that it might pose problems for a conductor. In any event, coordination yesterday was somewhat erratic at several points, particularly at the conclusion.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 2

JAN 30 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon January 29 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 30 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 2 1971 at 7.30

RAFAEL FRÜHBECK DE BURGOS conductor

FALLA — 'El amor brujo', ballet-pantomime
- Introduction and scene – The gypsies' cave (evening) – Song of sorrowful love – The return of the specter – Dance of terror – The magic circle (narrative of the fisherman) – Midnight (sorcery) – Ritual dance of fire (to exorcise the evil spirits) – Scene – Song of the will-o'-the-wisp – Pantomime – Dance of the game of love – Finale (bells of morning)

EUNICE ALBERTS mezzo-soprano

FALLA — Suite from the ballet 'El sombrero de tres picos' (The three-cornered hat)
- Introduction; afternoon – Dance of the miller's wife (Fandango) – The Corregidor – The grapes – The neighbors – Dance of the miller (Farruca) – Final dance

intermission

SCHUMANN — Piano concerto in A minor op. 54
- Allegro affettuoso
- Intermezzo: andantino grazioso
- Allegro vivace

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*†
- Lever du jour (Daybreak)
- Pantomime (Mime)
- Danse générale (General dance)

EUNICE ALBERTS, who made her sional debut with the Boston Sy after graduating from the New Conservatory of Music, was born ton. Her mother was the noted
Adele Alberts, who taught her daug sing almost as soon as she could tal ing her career Eunice Alberts has per with all the major orchestras in the try, among them the New York
monic, the Washington Na
Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Buffalo, Cincinn
Dallas Symphonies. For several years she has been principal co of the Opera Company of Boston, and she has taken leading productions of Verdi's Falstaff, Humperdinck's Hänsel und Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov, Gounod's Faust and Stravinsky's The progress. She has made recordings on the RCA, Music Guild a labels. Eunice Alberts most recently appeared with the Bostor phony Orchestra in the performance last summer at Tanglew Beethoven's Symphony no. 9.

APPEARANCES BY A MEMBER OF THE ORCHE

LUIS LEGUIA, a cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will gi eral recitals during the coming weeks with pianist Robert Freem January 31st they play at Wesleyan University, Connecticut, ther days later, on February 3rd, for WGBH, Boston. On February 8 appear at MIT's Kresge Auditorium, on the 10th at the OAS Pan A Union in Washington, DC, and on the 20th at Town Hall, Nev Their repertoire will include works by Beethoven, Kodály, S and Elliott Carter.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for the Friday-Saturday are available by mail to those wishing to buy a subscription. T grams are mailed on the Friday of each pair of concerts. Subsc prices for the 1970-1971 season are $12.50 (first class mail) a (third class mail). Subscription requests should be addressed t
PROGRAM OFFICE, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SYMP
HALL, BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS 02115.

BSO debut

De Burgos, Eschenbach

By Louis Snyder

Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos made his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony over last weekend, and quite understandably programmed some of his native Spain's headier music for the orchestra to play. With him were the young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, also making his Boston debut with the BSO in the Schumann Concerto, (he played at Tanglewood in 1969 and 1970), and contralto Eunice Alberts, who sang the three gypsy songs in Falla's "El Amor Brujo," which opened the concerts.

Neither "El Amor Brujo" nor the Suite from Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" has been played by the orchestra within the last 10 to 15 years, so these re-creations of the scores are quite definitely the conductor's own. They were full of vigor, color, and rhythmic pulse, directed by Mr. de Burgos with quasi-balletic energy, which brought forth crisp orchestral playing. Miss Alberts too added her sultry voice to the first of the two scores, which generates more excitement than the more calculated "Sombrero."

Mr. Eschenbach, whose Mozart in the Berkshire has been delectable on two occasions, made a dazzling entry into Symphony Hall with a superromantic performance of the Schumann. His ideas (or maybe Mr. de Burgos's ideas) revealed some unaccustomed contrasts in tempi, particularly in the opening Allegro, which slowed down almost to a halt at one point, but the brilliance of his playing, and the obvious perception which infused it, allowed for surprises in interpretation of the work as a whole. Soloist, conductor, and orchestra received a rousing reception.

To top off his debut, Mr. de Burgos offered the second of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloé" Suites. It must have seemed quite different to those who remember the more refined exuberance of Koussevitzky or Munch, but the explosive Latin conception of Mr. de Burgos made its effect, too, what with the vigorous cooperation of the musicians, and some predictably lovely sound from the flute of Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,856

FEB 1 1971

Spanish conductor to lead Symphony

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this Friday in a concert featuring pianist Christoph Eschenbach and contralto Eunice Alberts as soloists.

Miss Alberts will perform the solo part in Falla's "El Amor Brujo;" Eschenbach will play the Schumann piano concerto.

Also on the program, to be repeated Saturday night, are Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

The program for this Tuesday evening features concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Other works to be heard are Schumann's Third and Haydn's 97th symphonies.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 2

JAN 24 1971

Conductor Fruehbeck makes debut with Boston Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The program for Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert included Falla's "El amor brujo" and a suite from "El sombrero de tres picos," Schumann's Piano Concerto, and the annual performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suit No. 2. Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos conducted, and Christoph Eschenbach was the soloist. Fruehbeck, in his thirties, is a Spanish-born German conductor who looks like ten Germans, conducts Spanish music with great flair, and is music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. Illness kept him from his scheduled Boston Symphony debut at Tanglewood last summer. Eschenbach, 30, played Mozart concertos at Tanglewood the last two summers, but for him, too, this was the first concert in Boston.

About Fruehbeck, Friday's concert showed that he conducts certain kinds of dance music deftly, with unusual lightness, grace, and flexibility (all that surprisingly produced with what looks like a bandmaster's beat — large, slashing, angular motions defined by a very long stick at the end of a very long arm). The Spanish and French music all went well, especially the full-of-beans "Three-cornered Hat." Eunice Alberts was the largely inaudible contralto soloist in "El amor brujo," the problem I think being that while her voice is rich and ample, it lacks the raucousness and cutting edge, that Spanish cafe-singer sound, that Falla must have had in mind.

Something else that Fruehbeck achieved was somehow to appeal to the orchestra. Their playing all afternoon was awake, engaged, and beautiful-sounding. The other thing the concert revealed about Fruehbeck was that he rather lacks sense and taste in program-making. That was a very narcissistic show he put together. It was inconsiderate to Schumann, who really cannot stand being swamped in all that Frenchified glitter, and ultimately it was self-defeating in that a surfeit of Falla is a condition rather easily attained — he is elegant and attractive, but limited — and even the sure-fire Ravel would have made a more brilliant impression had there not been so much fireworks already.

It may be that the unsympathetic context made the Schumann performance slightly disappointing, and surely Eschenbach's idiosyncratic approach to the piece had a lot to do with it. He is a thoughtful, sensitive musician as well as an impressively resourceful instrumentalist, and his extremely articulated playing presented a fascinating series of beautifully wrought details. It did, however, tend to get lost in the details. Sometimes things got unbelievably slow — in the A flat section of the first movement, which was no flowing Andante but a real Adagio, and again in the Intermezzo — so much so that I began to hear it as a tour-de-force of seeing just how slowly and softly it could be done at all. On a purely local level it worked surprisingly well, so beautiful were phrasing and tone, but I lost all sense that those reveries were part of a larger statement.

The delicacy with which it was projected went a long way toward justifying a sentimental interpretation, and for myself I would say that for all that I found the performance as a whole not quite convincing I did find it thoroughly absorbing and even compelling. Not everyone did, I think: there was warm applause afterwards, but there was considerable restlessness during the performance, and I saw how, as the upbeats in the second movement became longer and longer and more and more soulful, one rear-echelon violinist quietly succumbed to hysterical laughter (con sordino). Except for a couple of pages of the finale, Fruehbeck and the orchestra provided finely integrated, attentive collaboration.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 30 1971

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 25 1971

Boston debut

Spanish conductor Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos will appear with the Boston Symphony for the first time in concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 29 and 30, and Tuesday, Feb. 2, directing works by Falla, Schumann, and Ravel. He will also conduct the BSO's Providence concert on Jan. 28.

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will make his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 15th pair of Friday Saturday concerts, this week in Symphony Hall. Soloists on the program are Christoph Eschenbac, pianist and Eunice Alberts, contralto.

The concert will include Falla, "El amor brujo" and the Suite from "Three-Cornered Hat"; Schumann, Piano Concerto in A-minor; and Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 26 1971

Guest Conductor

De Burgos Leads Boston Symphony

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, music director of the Madrid Symphony, led the Boston Symphony in a brilliant program: Falla's ballet-pantomime music for El amor brujo and Suite from the ballet: El sombrero de tres picos; Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor, opus 54, and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 by Ravel. The first two and last are sure-fire music, grateful baggage for any traveling maestro, but worth hearing when fired by de Burgos' skill from the BSO gun. The Schumann would have been pallid in comparison except for the intervening intermission and the combination of the conductor and Christoph Eschenbach at the piano. De Burgos is elegant and dynamic, his gestures effectively appropriate to the moment—and with the clearest beat in the business.

One often hears the Ritual Dance of Fire from El Amor (to exorcise the evil spirits) but the gypsy idiom also infuses the other dances and songs to fine effect. Eunice Albert's rich mezzo did justice to the vocal passages—she even contrives a special voice, flatly harsh with tension for the Song of Sorrowful Love episode.

The Three Cornered Hat Suite is a bit more sophisticated to suit a humorous story in a style appropriate to the Diaghilev stable (Picasso, Massine, et al). International Paris cultured an artistic refinement of play in the postwar (No. 1) years never duplicated. De Burgos takes everything up to the hilt—phrasing, rhythm, dynamics, pace—always stylishly.

The Schumann still rides on its first movement, originally a Fantasie by itself, later built out with an Intermezzo and an Allegro vivace. Clara Schumann, who had 'always wanted a great bravura piece by him' was always happy playing the concerto and would have approved the musicianly way Eschenbach and the orchestra wove a subtle web. The Intermezzo is still slight, even with the best treatment, and the Vivace relies more on repetitions of its sprightly opening theme than on solid development. Let us be thankful for any blessings. The de Burgos concern for every facet of interest made good listening.

With the Ravel Suite there was no question. From the liquid arpeggios of the woodwinds to the final ecstatic drive of the dance every nuance was effective — melting harmony, lifting line, incisive rhythm—magnificent.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

FEB 13 1971

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 4 1971

Conductor, or bandmaster?

I was pleased that Michael Steinberg reviewed (Jan. 30) Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos's debut with the B.S.O., but was displeased that he seemed to understate, skirt (or whatever) what was, for me, the singularly essential issue of the performance — it's grossness.

I felt that Fruehbeck with his "large, slashing, angular motions defined by a very long stick at the end of a very long arm," not only succeeded in looking like a bandmaster, as Mr. Steinberg suggests, but that he managed to make the B.S.O. sound like a band.

I would doubt that there is any justification in the texts of the music played that afternoon — in the scores of Ravel, Falla and Schumann for generally garish playing, brassy crescendos, and militant finales. And yet, so far as I'm concerned, this is what happened in Symphony Hall. . . . The time might as well have been spent in a bandstand with a facsimile of John Philip Sousa. . . .

About the soloists. Anyone attending the concerts knows that there were definite problems with hearing . . . Compared with other instruments, the vocal instrument is not after all among the most powerful. Projection problems with singers, then, are not unknown — particularly in very large halls with very large orchestras. Perhaps Eunice Alberts was "largely inaudible" because of a particular problem she, personally, may have with the projection of her vocal instrument. (Fruehbeck can't be blamed for everything, after all.)

However, when Christoph Eschenbach began work on his instrument, a strapping Steinway, I experienced a nearly similar situation. From the second balcony (and everyone knows that in a hall which reverberates at a period of exactly 2.31 seconds where you sit shouldn't matter), all but the unorchestrated passages of the concerto were "largely inaudible." The piano sounds seemed mere smudges on the brass. Could it have been that a little more sensitivity on the part of the conductor might have helped the soloists? Or, to put it more in the blatant spirit of Fruehbeck himself, perhaps Sousa should have toned down his band.

MARJORY MARTIN
North Andover

De Burgos Conductor For Boston Symphony

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at the 15th pair of Friday - Saturday concerts, January 29-30 at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Soloists are Christoph Eschenbach, pianist and Eunice Alberts, contralto. The program opens with two pieces by Falla: "El Amor Brujo" and the Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Contralto Miss Alberts is soloist in "El Amor Brujo."

Following intermission, Eschenbach is soloist in Schumann's Piano Concerto. The program closes with Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, has conducted many of the world's leading orchestras including the London, Vienna and Los Angeles Philharmonics, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. He was born in Spain of German parents and received his musical education in Spain and Germany.

German - born Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concerts of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Chicago and Toronto Symphonies. His most recent appearance with the Orchestra was at Tanglewood during the summer of 1970 in a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 19.

Miss Alberts, a graduate of the Berkshire Music Center, made her professional debut with the Boston Symphony after graduating from the New England Conservatory. She has performed with major American orchestras and opera companies and most recently with the Boston Symphony during the summer of 1970 at Tanglewood in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The seventh concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Jan. 26 at 8:30 p.m. The program is conducted by Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas with soloist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 97, Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3.

The third and final concert of the Providence series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium takes place Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m. The concert is conducted by Fruhbeck de Burgos with soloist Eschenbach, piano and Miss Alberts, contralto. Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts Falla's "El Amor Brujo," with Miss Alberts as soloist, and the Suite, from "The Three - Cornered Hat," followed by Schumann's Piano concerto in A Minor with soloist Eschenbach. The concert closes with Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JAN 23 1971

Spanish conductor leads Boston Symphony

There is a proverb that states, "It takes a Spaniard to know a Spaniard." There are also proverbs that begin, "It takes an Italian . . ." "It takes an Irishman . . ." "It takes a Greek . . ." and so on, infinitum. But what of that? Last week, in the fifth program of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday "B" Series, the truth of the proverb was proved (in whatever form you desire it) by guest-conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of Spain's National Orchestra of Madrid.

For part of his program, de Burgos chose two works (both ballet scores) by the noted Spanish composer, Manuel de Falla, — "El Amor Brujo" and "The Three-Cornered Hat." The results were delightful. Symphony Hall rocked with the contagious, flamenco-like Gypsy rhythms of the music, with the subtle dynamic variations of both scores. The Spanish-born de Burgos obviously has an affinity for the music of his native land; I have never heard de Falla played better.

The concert also offered the German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, as soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto. Eschenbach is a long-haired, frail-looking young man — but there is nothing frail or fragile about his keyboard technique. He has pianistic power, a good variety of tone quality, and the right romantic approach for this alternately dramatic and lyrical work.

De Burgos concluded the concert with another sure-fire audience pleaser, Ravel's masterpiece, the "Daphnis and Chloe Suite, No. 2." As everyone knows, the orchestration of this work is nothing short of brilliant, from the impressionistic opening depicting the dawning of the day to the lush texture of the final dance, thrilling in sound and haunting in melody. The Boston musicians worked hard and well for de Burgos, conveying the sonorities of the piece in true virtuoso style. The concert was, in short, one of the highlights of the current Series — one that brought much-needed warmth to what was a cold and goose flesh-making night on the outside.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will return to the Symphony Hall podium in the final program of the Series on Feb. 28.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,00

FEB 7 1971

Conductor Fruehbeck makes debut with Boston Symphony

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The program for Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert included Falla's "El amor brujo" and a suite from "El sombrero de tres picos," Schumann's Piano Concerto, and the annual performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suit No. 2. Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos conducted, and Christoph Eschenbach was the soloist. Fruehbeck, in his thirties, is a Spanish-born German conductor who looks like ten Germans, conducts Spanish music with great flair, and is music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. Illness kept him from his scheduled Boston Symphony debut at Tanglewood last summer. Eschenbach, 30, played Mozart concertos at Tanglewood the last two summers, but for him, too, this was the first concert in Boston.

About Fruehbeck, Friday's concert showed that he conducts certain kinds of dance music deftly, with unusual lightness, grace, and flexibility (all that surprisingly produced with what looks like a bandmaster's beat — large, slashing, angular motions defined by a very long stick at the end of a very long arm). The Spanish and French music all went well, especially the full-of-beans "Three-cornered Hat." Eunice Alberts was the largely inaudible contralto soloist in "El amor brujo," the problem I think being that while her voice is rich and ample, it lacks the raucousness and cutting edge, that Spanish cafe-singer sound, that Falla must have had in mind.

Something else that Fruehbeck achieved was somehow to appeal to the orchestra. Their playing all afternoon was awake, engaged, and beautiful-sounding. The other thing the concert revealed about Fruehbeck was that he rather lacks sense and taste in program-making. That was a very narcissistic show he put together. It was inconsiderate to Schumann, who really cannot stand being swamped in all that Frenchified glitter, and ultimately it was self-defeating in that a surfeit of Falla is a condition rather easily attained — he is elegant and attractive, but limited — and even the sure-fire Ravel would have made a more brilliant impression had there not been so much fireworks already.

It may be that the unsympathetic context made the Schumann performance slightly disappointing, and surely Eschenbach's idiosyncratic approach to the piece had a lot to do with it. He is a thoughtful, sensitive musician as well as an impressively resourceful instrumentalist, and his extremely articulated playing presented a fascinating series of beautifully wrought details. It did, however, tend to get lost in the details. Sometimes things got unbelievably slow — in the A flat section of the first movement, which was no flowing Andante but a real Adagio, and again in the Intermezzo — so much so that I began to hear it as a tour-de-force of seeing just how slowly and softly it could be done at all. On a purely local level it worked surprisingly well, so beautiful were phrasing and tone, but I lost all sense that those reveries were part of a larger statement.

The delicacy with which it was projected went a long way toward justifying a sentimental interpretation, and for myself I would say that for all that I found the performance as a whole not quite convincing I did find it thoroughly absorbing and even compelling. Not everyone did, I think: there was warm applause afterwards, but there was considerable restlessness during the performance, and I saw how, as the upbeats in the second movement became longer and longer and more and more soulful, one rear-echelon violinist quietly succumbed to hysterical laughter (con sordino). Except for a couple of pages of the finale, Fruehbeck and the orchestra provided finely integrated, attentive collaboration.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 30 1971

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 25 1971

Boston debut

Spanish conductor Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos will appear with the Boston Symphony for the first time in concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 29 and 30, and Tuesday, Feb. 2, directing works by Falla, Schumann, and Ravel. He will also conduct the BSO's Providence concert on Jan. 28.

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will make his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 15th pair of Friday Saturday concerts, this week in Symphony Hall. Soloists on the program are Christoph Eschenbac, pianist and Eunice Alberts, contralto.

The concert will include Falla, "El amor brujo" and the Suite from "Three-Cornered Hat"; Schumann, Piano Concerto in A-minor; and Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

JAN 26 1971

Guest Conductor

De Burgos Leads Boston Symphony

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, music director of the Madrid Symphony, led the Boston Symphony in a brilliant program: Falla's ballet-pantomime music for El amor brujo and Suite from the ballet: El sombrero de tres picos; Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor, opus 54, and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 by Ravel. The first two and last are sure-fire music, grateful baggage for any traveling maestro, but worth hearing when fired by de Burgos' skill from the BSO gun. The Schumann would have been pallid in comparison except for the intervening intermission and the combination of the conductor and Christoph Eschenbach at the piano. De Burgos is elegant and dynamic, his gestures effectively appropriate to the moment—and with the clearest beat in the business.

One often hears the Ritual Dance of Fire from El Amor (to exorcise the evil spirits) but the gypsy idiom also infuses the other dances and songs to fine effect. Eunice Albert's rich mezzo did justice to the vocal passages—she even contrives a special voice, flatly harsh with tension for the Song of Sorrowful Love episode.

The Three Cornered Hat Suite is a bit more sophisticated to suit a humorous story in a style appropriate to the Diaghilev stable (Picasso, Massine, et al). International Paris cultured an artistic refinement of play in the postwar (No. 1) years never duplicated. De Burgos takes everything up to the hilt—phrasing, rhythm, dynamics, pace—always stylishly.

The Schumann still rides on its first movement, originally a Fantasie by itself, later built out with an Intermezzo and an Allegro vivace. Clara Schumann, who had 'always wanted a great bravura piece by him' was always happy playing the concerto and would have approved the musicianly way Eschenbach and the orchestra wove a subtle web. The Intermezzo is still slight, even with the best treatment, and the Vivace relies more on repetitions of its sprightly opening theme than on solid development. Let us be thankful for any blessings. The de Burgos concern for every facet of interest made good listening.

With the Ravel Suite there was no question. From the liquid arpeggios of the woodwinds to the final ecstatic drive of the dance every nuance was effective — melting harmony, lifting line, incisive rhythm—magnificent.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 4 1971

Conductor, or bandmaster?

I was pleased that Michael Steinberg reviewed (Jan. 30) Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos's debut with the B.S.O., but was displeased that he seemed to understate, skirt (or whatever) what was, for me, the singularly essential issue of the performance — it's grossness.

I felt that Fruehbeck with his "large, slashing, angular motions defined by a very long stick at the end of a very long arm," not only succeeded in looking like a bandmaster, as Mr. Steinberg suggests, but that he managed to make the B.S.O. sound like a band.

I would doubt that there is any justification in the texts of the music played that afternoon — in the scores of Ravel, Falla and Schumann for generally garish playing, brassy crescendos, and militant finales. And yet, so far as I'm concerned, this is what happened in Symphony Hall. . . . The time might as well have been spent in a bandstand with a facsimile of John Philip Sousa. . . .

About the soloists. Anyone attending the concerts knows that there were definite problems with hearing . . . Compared with other instruments, the vocal instrument is not after all among the most powerful. Projection problems with singers, then, are not unknown — particularly in very large halls with very large orchestras. Perhaps Eunice Alberts was "largely inaudible" because of a particular problem she, personally, may have with the projection of her vocal instrument. (Fruehbeck can't be blamed for everything, after all.)

However, when Christoph Eschenbach began work on his instrument, a strapping Steinway, I experienced a nearly similar situation. From the second balcony (and everyone knows that in a hall which reverberates at a period of exactly 2.31 seconds where you sit shouldn't matter), all but the unorchestrated passages of the concerto were "largely inaudible." The piano sounds seemed mere smudges on the brass. Could it have been that a little more sensitivity on the part of the conductor might have helped the soloists? Or, to put it more in the blatant spirit of Fruehbeck himself, perhaps Sousa should have toned down his band.

MARJORY MARTIN
North Andover

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

FEB 13 1971

De Burgos Conductor For Boston Symphony

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos makes his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at the 15th pair of Friday - Saturday concerts, January 29-30 at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Soloists are Christoph Eschenbach, pianist and Eunice Alberts, contralto. The program opens with two pieces by Falla: "El Amor Brujo" and the Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Contralto Miss Alberts is soloist in "El Amor Brujo."

Following intermission, Eschenbach is soloist in Schumann's Piano Concerto. The program closes with Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra of Madrid, has conducted many of the world's leading orchestras including the London, Vienna and Los Angeles Philharmonics, the Chicago Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. He was born in Spain of German parents and received his musical education in Spain and Germany.

German - born Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concerts of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Chicago and Toronto Symphonies. His most recent appearance with the Orchestra was at Tanglewood during the summer of 1970 in a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 19.

Miss Alberts, a graduate of the Berkshire Music Center, made her professional debut with the Boston Symphony after graduating from the New England Conservatory. She has performed with major American orchestras and opera companies and most recently with the Boston Symphony during the summer of 1970 at Tanglewood in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The seventh concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Jan. 26 at 8:30 p.m. The program is conducted by Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas with soloist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 97, Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3.

The third and final concert of the Providence series at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium takes place Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m. The concert is conducted by Fruhbeck de Burgos with soloist Eschenbach, piano and Miss Alberts, contralto. Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts Falla's "El Amor Brujo," with Miss Alberts as soloist, and the Suite, from "The Three - Cornered Hat," followed by Schumann's Piano concerto in A Minor with soloist Eschenbach. The concert closes with Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JAN 23 1971

Spanish conductor leads Boston Symphony

There is a proverb that states, "It takes a Spaniard to know a Spaniard." There are also proverbs that begin, "It takes an Italian . . ." "It takes an Irishman . . ." "It takes a Greek . . ." and so on, infinitum. But what of that? Last week, in the fifth program of the Boston Symphony's Tuesday "B" Series, the truth of the proverb was proved (in whatever form you desire it) by guest-conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of Spain's National Orchestra of Madrid.

For part of his program, de Burgos chose two works (both ballet scores) by the noted Spanish composer, Manuel de Falla, — "El Amor Brujo" and "The Three-Cornered Hat." The results were delightful. Symphony Hall rocked with the contagious, flamenco-like Gypsy rhythms of the music, with the subtle dynamic variations of both scores. The Spanish-born de Burgos obviously has an affinity for the music of his native land; I have never heard de Falla played better.

The concert also offered the German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, as soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto. Eschenbach is a long-haired, frail-looking young man — but there is nothing frail or fragile about his keyboard technique. He has pianistic power, a good variety of tone quality, and the right romantic approach for this alternately dramatic and lyrical work.

De Burgos concluded the concert with another sure-fire audience pleaser, Ravel's masterpiece, the "Daphnis and Chloe Suite, No. 2." As everyone knows, the orchestration of this work is nothing short of brilliant, from the impressionistic opening depicting the dawning of the day to the lush texture of the final dance, thrilling in sound and haunting in melody. The Boston musicians worked hard and well for de Burgos, conveying the sonorities of the piece in true virtuoso style. The concert was, in short one of the highlights of the current Series — one that brought much-needed warmth to what was a cold and goose flesh-making night on the outside.

Incidentally, the Boston Symphony's former music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will return to the Symphony Hall podium in the final program of the Series on Feb. 23.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,00

FEB 7 1971

Earl J. Dias review

Spanish conductor expressively leads BSO

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, Spain, made his first appearance as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the fifth program of the Tuesday "B" Series. De Burgos featured on his program two works by the Spanish composer, Manuel de Falla, "El Amor Brujo" and the suite from "The Three-cornered Hat;" Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor," with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

The Spanish-born conductor is an energetic man who conducts expressively (in fact, he sometimes seems to dance to the orchestra's rhythms) and obviously knows his way about the podium. As might be expected from his background and training, he has a special affinity for the work of De Falla. The richly passionate Gypsy rhythms of "El Amor Brujo" and the interesting dynamic contrasts in the work were spiritedly conveyed in de Burgos' reading. Mezzo-soprano Eunice Alberts was soloist in three of the sections of the work (which is a score for ballet). Miss Alberts is an experienced and generally capable vocalist, but she did not seem much at home with the De Falla style and failed to project dramatically or effectively.

As for the De Falla suite from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," this is bright, congenial music, notable for its tightly-wrought, muscular texture. Especially efficacious was the rousing Finale, a jota with fascinating cross-rhythms and considerable challenge to the virtuosity of an orchestra. Both De Burgos and the Boston musicians performed the work admirably.

The familiar and well-loved Schumann Piano Concerto is, of course, the essence of romanticism. It is sensitive, poetic, sometimes even sentimental, but it is also the work of a man in command of both style and form. To convey its riches, the soloist must be able to manage a variety of tone color, and the German pianist, Eschenbach has, in addition to a formidable technique, this quality in good measure. Consequently, the lyricism of the piece, the graceful figuration, the occasional drama were accomplished well by Eschenbach and the orchestra, with the sonorities of the music well-balanced between soloist and orchestral accompaniment.

Closing the program was one of Ravel's genuine masterpieces, the "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2," which boasts some brilliant orchestral writing — from the impressionistic first section depicting daybreak to the final Danse Generale, a movement that offers some thrilling sound and some haunting melody. De Burgos' reading of the Ravel was in the vein — superbly paced, subtle in shading and nuance, filled with emotional impact at the end.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 4 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening February 4 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon February 5 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 6 1971 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

TCHAIKOVSKY 'Romeo and Juliet', overture-fantasy*

SCRIABIN Le poème de l'extase op. 54

intermission

BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CLAUDIO ABBADO, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, studied piano and composition at the Verdi Conservatory of Milan, his native city, and conducting at the Vienna Academy. He won the Koussevitzky Award for conducting at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958, and five years later a first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. In 1964 Herbert von Karajan heard him in Berlin, and invited him to appear at the Salzburg Festival the following year, and to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic; he received the Philips Prize for a performance of Mahler's Second symphony. Claudio Abbado was shortly afterwards named permanent conductor of La Scala in Milan, the first man to be so honored since Guido Cantelli nine years earlier. Engagements followed with other leading opera companies and orchestras, the Metropolitan Opera, the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, the Berlin Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia of London, the New York Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra and the London Symphony. Claudio Abbado has made many recordings on the London and Deutsche Grammophon labels, including one by the Boston Symphony of music by Debussy and Ravel, which was among the first release of the Orchestra's records for DGG. He has recently been named permanent conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

Fruehbeck de Burgos: It's very, very nice

BY RICHARD BUELL

The recent concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by guest Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos provided a different mixture of rewards and frustrations from the usual for this season. This time the orchestral playing was extremely fine—the players were audibly and visibly responsive to this conductor—but the programming was unusually lightweight and unchallenging. Only one of the four pieces played was originally intended for the concert hall. There hadn't been so much bright color or so little sonata form on a Symphony program for quite a while.

What I heard of the de Falla works, the ballet-pantomime El amor brujo and the suite from the ballet El sombrero de tres picos, helped alleviate a little the Hispanophobia induced by the Segovia recital a few weeks ago. The first is a spicy olla podrida whose ingredients contain gypsies, dreams, vengeance, a specter, some languishing and drooping, the Ritual Fire Dance, etc., etc., and other such elements provided by a very ethnic scenario by one Martinez Sierra. (Love lays the specter has been suggested as a translation of the title.) Falla's music is brilliantly orchestrated, episodic; the players really tore into it and sounded as good as they have all season. The three passages for mezzo were taken by Eunice Alberts, who was steadfastly lady-like in a tight spot. There were no flamenco growls from her. The dances from sombrero were very brightly and energetically played.

It was all really very nice, and there was even more niceness after the intermission when that nicest of piano concertos, Schumann's A Minor, Op. 54 was performed, with Christoph Eschenbach as the soloist. I will have to admit to a life-long antipathy to this particular concerto which has always seemed the summation of a flowered-wallpaper esthetic, and rather diffuse and disorderly in its organization, even for Schumann. There doesn't seem to be the maximum degree of necessity or inevitability to anything that happens in its course.

All the music is really in the piano part, and the use of the orchestra inept and really a waste. And it must be one of the most boring ordeals for an orchestral player to have to submit to. This is really unfair to the level of detailed effort that the sensitive and agile young Eschenback brought to his busy part, and to the fluid collaboration between him, Fruehbeck de Burgos, and the orchestra. I heard delicate fingerwork, wonderful trills, sensitively judged rubatos, but I also heard long stretches that were interesting only for the fingers, and much sterile rhetoric.

The second suite from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe was a stunning program-closer and audience-rouser. It was also exceptionally well-played, the orchestra giving off some delicately adjusted dynamic shadings that I don't often hear, and lots of good solos.

Fruehbeck de Burgos' way with the BSO, although a little oily, was obviously very clear in the traffic-management aspects of the conductor's art, and the players took to him. He should be invited back anyway, but also prodded into deviating from the London Phase 4 repertory and the excessively well-spoken.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON AFTER DARK
W. 68,500

FEB 9 1971

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 11 1971

ABBADO IMPRESSIVE AT BSO

Ordinarily if someone were to predict that I could be caught alive at a concert that served up Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Scriabin's "Poeme d'extase" back-to-back, his credibility as a prognosticator would have little standing in this court. But "ordinarily" doesn't attach where the conductor is Claudio Abbado and the remaining work is the "Eroica," and so there we were, all present and accounted for.

As it developed, it was the Tchaikowsky-Scriabin half of the program, not the Beethoven half, that furnished the rewards, which were ample.

"Romeo and Juliet" really belongs to the Leslie Howard and Norma Shearer movie of the thirties, and one could do worse than let it stand on the melting recollections of the sentiments engendered by them and by one's teenhood. Yet truly attentive listening on its own unabashed terms for perhaps the first time in over thirty years has something to be said for it.

So too with the Poeme. I had long dismissed the work as one of Dr. Koussevitsky's more empty monuments—longer on emptiness than monumentality and now understandably retired from the symphony repertory. After an extended sabbatical, Scriabin's art shows up as rather more imposing than memory had suggested, however, an esthetic that goes beyond an exercise in neo-Wagnerian chromatic mysticism. It has distinctive chordal treatment, at least for its era, and actually quite original orchestral coloration which make for considerable uniqueness.

The catalyst behind these reactions was Mr. Abbado, former director at La Scala and now at the Vienna Opera. For sheer professionalism you will have to travel the earth to meet his equal. The cleanness of line, the tension of his projection, the gorgeousness of sound, the sensitivity of orchestral response, they were all in evidence before a few bars had been played, and they remained there throughout the concert.

It was a good thing that they did, too, for they saved the "Eroica." The weird distortion of the proportions of the symphony carried the seeds of potential disaster: the exposition was repeated in the first movement; and the Marche Funebre went on at least half again as long as I can ever recall. Some slow movements are made to stand still, but this is not one of them. Yet Mr. Abbado certainly hung on to his listeners. There was no coughing, no stirring. Thus the disaster never materialized, and so the quintessential strength and affirmation of Beethoven's noble paean asserted itself in rightful measure.

Here is a conductor to conjure with, indeed.

This weekend Erich Leinsdorf returns for his second visit of the season. The program he has chosen includes Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Schonberg's Variations for Orchestra, Opus 31, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,5(

JAN 29 1971

Claudio Abbado Guest Conductor

BOSTON, — Claudio Abbado is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, February 5 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday, February 6 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, followed by Scriabin's Poem of ecstasy and Beethoven's Third symphony, Eroica.

Mr. Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

Abbado returns to BSO

By Louis Snyder

The star soloist at this weekend's Boston Symphony concerts is the guest conductor, Claudio Abbado (final appearance tonight). Last season he impressed in his first local exposure during two weeks with the orchestra, and on Thursday night he reaffirmed his appeal with another display of the qualities that seem to differentiate inspired orchestral performances from merely good ones—a highly personal view toward the music being played, and a workable rapport with the musicians under one's baton. Plus, of course, the dynamism to weld these intangibles to produce very substantial results.

Mr. Abbado began with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, which hasn't been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for almost 10 years, and followed it with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third Symphony ("Eroica"), both of which he has just conducted with another fine orchestra, the New York Philharmonic. It proved to be a hearty mixture, rightly served.

For Mr. Abbado's conducting strengths are such that he commands the unswerving attention of all his musicians, and encompasses the smallest details of each score by sheer force of arms (no pun intended). The Tchaikovsky trembled and soared, Scriabin's "extase" was conveyed with stormy-calm alternation, unrestrained but still not exaggerated, and the "Eroica" was Mr. Abbado's own — eloquent and warm-blooded.

The effect of Mr. Abbado's conducting methods and personality on the orchestra —decidedly apparent throughout the program—proved to be an interesting side-light on the perennial question of the balance necessary between those who direct and those who play. As elemental as the description may seem, with each number conductor and musicians charged into the music together, with all the singleness of purpose of a mass dash into the surf. It was almost as gratifying to see as to hear, because it is a situation, all good intentions aside, that is seldom so happily achieved.

Thursday's audience greeted Mr. Abbado vociferously, and the musicians who had made this triumph possible added their applause, too.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 6 1971

Earl J. Dias review

Spanish conductor expressively leads BSO

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, Spain, made his first appearance as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the fifth program of the Tuesday "B" Series. De Burgos featured on his program two works by the Spanish composer, Manuel de Falla, "El Amor Brujo" and the suite from "The Three-cornered Hat;" Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor," with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

The Spanish-born conductor is an energetic man who conducts expressively (in fact, he sometimes seems to dance to the orchestra's rhythms) and obviously knows his way about the podium. As might be expected from his background and training, he has a special affinity for the work of De Falla. The richly passionate Gypsy rhythms of "El Amor Brujo" and the interesting dynamic contrasts in the work were spiritedly conveyed in de Burgos' reading. Mezzo-soprano Eunice Alberts was soloist in three of the sections of the work (which is a score for ballet). Miss Alberts is an experienced and generally capable vocalist, but she did not seem much at home with the De Falla style and failed to project dramatically or effectively.

As for the De Falla suite from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," this is bright, congenial music, notable for its tightly-wrought, muscular texture. Especially efficacious was the rousing Finale, a jota with fascinating cross-rhythms and considerable challenge to the virtuosity of an orchestra. Both De Burgos and the Boston musicians performed the work admirably.

The familiar and well-loved Schumann Piano Concerto is, of course, the essence of romanticism. It is sensitive, poetic, sometimes even sentimental, but it is also the work of a man in command of both style and form. To convey its riches, the soloist must be able to manage a variety of tone color, and the German pianist, Eschenbach has, in addition to a formidable technique, this quality in good measure. Consequently, the lyricism of the piece, the graceful figuration, the occasional drama were accomplished well by Eschenbach and the orchestra, with the sonorities of the music well-balanced between soloist and orchestral accompaniment.

Closing the program was one of Ravel's genuine masterpieces, the "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2," which boasts some brilliant orchestral writing — from the impressionistic first section depicting daybreak to the final Danse Generale, a movement that offers some thrilling sound and some haunting melody. De Burgos' reading of the Ravel was in the vein — superbly paced, subtle in shading and nuance, filled with emotional impact at the end.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 4 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening February 4 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon February 5 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 6 1971 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

TCHAIKOVSKY 'Romeo and Juliet', overture-fantasy*

SCRIABIN Le poème de l'extase op. 54

intermission

BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CLAUDIO ABBADO, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, studied piano and composition at the Verdi Conservatory of Milan, his native city, and conducting at the Vienna Academy. He won the Koussevitzky Award for conducting at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958, and five years later a first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. In 1964 Herbert von Karajan heard him in Berlin, and invited him to appear at the Salzburg Festival the following year, and to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic; he received the Philips Prize for a performance of Mahler's Second symphony. Claudio Abbado was shortly afterwards named permanent conductor of La Scala in Milan, the first man to be so honored since Guido Cantelli nine years earlier. Engagements followed with other leading opera companies and orchestras, the Metropolitan Opera, the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, the Berlin Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia of London, the New York Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra and the London Symphony. Claudio Abbado has made many recordings on the London and Deutsche Grammophon labels, including one by the Boston Symphony of music by Debussy and Ravel, which was among the first release of the Orchestra's records for DGG. He has recently been named permanent conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

Fruehbeck de Burgos: It's very, very nice

BY RICHARD BUELL

The recent concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by guest Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos provided a different mixture of rewards and frustrations from the usual for this season. This time the orchestral playing was extremely fine—the players were audibly and visibly responsive to this conductor —but the programming was unusually lightweight and unchallenging. Only one of the four pieces played was originally intended for the concert hall. There hadn't been so much bright color or so little sonata form on a Symphony program for quite a while.

What I heard of the de Falla works, the ballet-pantomime El amor brujo and the suite from the ballet El sombrero de tres picos, helped alleviate a little the Hispanophobia induced by the Segovia recital a few weeks ago. The first is a spicy olla podrida whose ingredients contain gypsies, dreams, vengeance, a specter, some languishing and drooping, the Ritual Fire Dance, etc., etc., and other such elements provided by a very ethnic scenario by one Martinez Sierra. (Love lays the specter has been suggested as a translation of the title.) Falla's music is brilliantly orchestrated, episodic; the players really tore into it and sounded as good as they have all season. The three passages for mezzo were taken by Eunice Alberts, who was steadfastly lady-like in a tight spot. There were no flamenco growls from her. The dances from sombrero were very brightly and energetically played.

It was all really very nice, and there was even more niceness after the intermission when that nicest of piano concertos, Schumann's A Minor, Op. 54 was performed, with Christoph Eschenbach as the soloist. I will have to admit to a life-long antipathy to this particular concerto which has always seemed the summation of a flowered-wallpaper esthetic, and rather diffuse and disorderly in its organization, even for Schumann. There doesn't seem to be the maximum degree of necessity or inevitability to anything that happens in its course.

All the music is really in the piano part, and the use of the orchestra inept and really a waste. And it must be one of the most boring ordeals for an orchestral player to have to submit to. This is really unfair to the level of detailed effort that the sensitive and agile young Eschenback brought to his busy part, and to the fluid collaboration between him, Fruehbeck de Burgos, and the orchestra. I heard delicate fingerwork, wonderful trills, sensitively judged rubatos, but I also heard long stretches that were interesting only for the fingers, and much sterile rhetoric.

The second suite from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe was a stunning program-closer and audience-rouser. It was also exceptionally well-played, the orchestra giving off some delicately adjusted dynamic shadings that I don't often hear, and lots of good solos.

Fruehbeck de Burgos' way with the BSO, although a little oily, was obviously very clear in the traffic-management aspects of the conductor's art, and the players took to him. He should be invited back anyway, but also prodded into deviating from the London Phase 4 repertory and the excessively well-spoken.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON AFTER DARK
W. 68,500

FEB 9 1971

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 11 1971

ABBADO IMPRESSIVE AT BSO

Ordinarily if someone were to predict that I could be caught alive at a concert that served up Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Scriabin's "Poeme d'extase" back-to-back, his credibility as a prognosticator would have little standing in this court. But "ordinarily" doesn't attach where the conductor is Claudio Abbado and the remaining work is the "Eroica," and so there we were, all present and accounted for.

As it developed, it was the Tchaikowsky-Scriabin half of the program, not the Beethoven half, that furnished the rewards, which were ample.

"Romeo and Juliet" really belongs to the Leslie Howard and Norma Shearer movie of the thirties, and one could do worse than let it stand on the melting recollections of the sentiments engendered by them and by one's teenhood. Yet truly attentive listening on its own unabashed terms for perhaps the first time in over thirty years has something to be said for it.

So too with the Poeme. I had long dismissed the work as one of Dr. Koussevitsky's more empty monuments—longer on emptiness than monumentality and now understandably retired from the symphony repertory. After an extended sabbatical, Scriabin's art shows up as rather more imposing than memory had suggested, however, an esthetic that goes beyond an exercise in neo-Wagnerian chromatic mysticism. It has distinctive chordal treatment, at least for its era, and actually quite original orchestral coloration which make for considerable uniqueness.

The catalyst behind these reactions was Mr. Abbado, former director at La Scala and now at the Vienna Opera. For sheer professionalism you will have to travel the earth to meet his equal. The cleanness of line, the tension of his projection, the gorgeousness of sound, the sensitivity of orchestral response, they were all in evidence before a few bars had been played, and they remained there throughout the concert.

It was a good thing that they did, too, for they saved the "Eroica." The weird distortion of the proportions of the symphony carried the seeds of potential disaster: the exposition was repeated in the first movement; and the Marche Funebre went on at least half again as long as I can ever recall. Some slow movements are made to stand still, but this is not one of them. Yet Mr. Abbado certainly hung on to his listeners. There was no coughing, no stirring. Thus the disaster never materialized, and so the quintessential strength and affirmation of Beethoven's noble paean asserted itself in rightful measure.

Here is a conductor to conjure with, indeed.

This weekend Erich Leinsdorf returns for his second visit of the season. The program he has chosen includes Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Schonberg's Variations for Orchestra, Opus 31, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,5(

JAN 29 1971

Claudio Abbado Guest Conductor

BOSTON, — Claudio Abbado is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, February 5 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday, February 6 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, followed by Scriabin's Poem of ecstasy and Beethoven's Third symphony, Eroica.

Mr. Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

Abbado returns to BSO

By Louis Snyder

The star soloist at this weekend's Boston Symphony concerts is the guest conductor, Claudio Abbado (final appearance tonight). Last season he impressed in his first local exposure during two weeks with the orchestra, and on Thursday night he reaffirmed his appeal with another display of the qualities that seem to differentiate inspired orchestral performances from merely good ones—a highly personal view toward the music being played, and a workable rapport with the musicians under one's baton. Plus, of course, the dynamism to weld these intangibles to produce very substantial results.

Mr. Abbado began with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, which hasn't been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for almost 10 years, and followed it with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third Symphony ("Eroica"), both of which he has just conducted with another fine orchestra, the New York Philharmonic. It proved to be a hearty mixture, richly served.

For Mr. Abbado's conducting strengths are such that he commands the unswerving attention of all his musicians, and encompasses the smallest details of each score by sheer force of arms (no pun intended). The Tchaikovsky trembled and soared, Scriabin's "extase" was conveyed with stormy-calm alternation, unrestrained but still not exaggerated, and the "Eroica" was Mr. Abbado's own — eloquent and warm-blooded.

The effect of Mr. Abbado's conducting methods and personality on the orchestra —decidedly apparent throughout the program—proved to be an interesting side-light on the perennial question of the balance necessary between those who direct and those who play. As elemental as the description may seem, with each number conductor and musicians charged into the music together, with all the singleness of purpose of a mass dash into the surf. It was almost as gratifying to see as to hear, because it is a situation, all good intentions aside, that is seldom so happily achieved.

Thursday's audience greeted Mr. Abbado vociferously, and the musicians who had made this triumph possible added their applause, too.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 6 1971

Symphony: Abbado Conducts 3-Concert Series

By HARRY NEVILLE

Claudio Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, returned here this week to conduct a three-concert series which began Thursday night. His program repeated yesterday and to be played again tonight, consisted of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony.

THE SCRIABIN is, of course, an unusual item, one that isn't often programmed, though revived interest in Scriabin will no doubt change that situation before long. "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Eroica," on the other hand, are part of everyone's experience—so much so that for many people it isn't easy to respond to the prospect of yet another performance.

Abbado's readings of these works, which I heard Thursday night, were hardly of the "yet another performance" variety. They were, to be sure, extraordinarily engrossing performances, but not because of any extremely personal ideas Abbado has about the scores. Except for an unusually slow "Eroica" funeral march, his conceptions were rather straightforward, in fact.

WHAT MADE the evening so appealing was Abbado's ability to make the listener feel that this was a statement of the composer's music, not an individual conductor's statement about the music. One seldom hears performances so beautifully conceived and executed, so passionately projected and yet so free of sentiment and "interpretation."

The orchestra responded superbly to this kind of direction, producing some of their best playing of the season. They twice insisted on solo bows for Abbado, who in turn bestowed special recognition upon Armando Ghitalla for his brilliant trumpet solos in Scriabin's "Poem."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 6 1971

Claudio Abbado guest conductor

Claudio Abbado will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in concerts which take place this Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. His program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third Symphony.

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct the final concert of his guest series this Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. ontralto Eunice Alberts will be the soloist in Falla's "El Amor Brujo," and Christoph Eschenbach will perform the Schumann Piano Concerto. Also on the program are Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Ravel's "Daphnis and hloe" Suite No. 2.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S)

JAN 31 1971

Claudio Abbado

. . . returns to conduct the Boston Symphony on Thursday and Saturday evenings, Feb. 4 and 6, and Friday afternoon, Feb. 5, in a program of works by Tchaikovsky, Scriabin, and Beethoven. Mr. Abbado has recently been named conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 3 1971

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 16th annual pair of Friday and Saturday concerts of Feb. 5-6. The program will open with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. This will be followed by Scribin's Poem of Ecstacy and Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica).

Claudio Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center. This was in 1958. Five years later he won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all of the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

The fifth concert of the Tuesday "B" series takes place Tuesday evening of this coming week at 7:30 p.m., in Boston Symphony Hall. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will be guest conductor, with soloists Christoph Eschenbach, piano, and Eunice Alberts, contralto. The program is Falla's "El amor brujo" with Eunice Alberts and Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat," Schumann's Piano Concerto with Christoph Eschenbach, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

The second concert of the Thursday "B" series takes place Thursday evening (Feb. 4). Claudio Abbado will conduct. The program will be the same as the weekend programs.

SUN/day
JAN. 31, 1971

Abbado conducts Boston Symphony in Scriabin

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Claudio Abbado, who since his visit here last season has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic, was the guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. His program: Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Scriabin's "Le poeme del' extase," and Bethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Obviously, the news here is the Scriabin, written in 1907, played here often by Koussevitzky, and last done at a Boston Symphony concert in 1960 under Lorin Maazel. A funny piece it is, more of a "Poeme des cantharides" than a "poeme de l'extase," with lots of irritation, some excitement, and not really a lot of ecstasy. It is hobbled by its themes, particularly a Wagnerian trumpet phrase that must occur five or six dozen times, and it is another of those Scriabin pieces that for all their churning are stuck quite fast to the flypaper. On the other hand, the details and many of the local relationshis are fascinating, the sheer sound is marvelous, and the final climax — in C major, a splendid key, but, as Wagner well knew, not one for ecstasy — is just possibly the most stupendous in the orchestral repertory.

Not really convinced, I still was enormously pleased by the chance to hear it. An original mind and lively fantasy speak through it, and if the BSO had a program policy rather than a lottery, they would in the next couple of seasons give us "Prometheus" (perhaps with light show, and I hope a better one than the New York Philharmonic came up with last year) and "Le Divin Poeme" as well. Abbado's performance yesterday, though it left something to be desired in textural clarity, was marvelous at catching the ebb and flow of the music, and the excitement of it really got to the audience. Armando Ghitalla deserved and got a couple of solo bows and cheers for his trumpet solos.

The Tchaikovsky performance was warm in the right places, though perhaps a bit cool where it might or should have been hot, and altogether the piece was projected cohesively and with refined musical taste. Abbado had nothing fresh to say about the "Eroica," but apart from some excessively slow tempi for the first and second movements, particularly the second, this work, too, was given honestly and clearly. Abbado again proved to be one of the few conductors who can persuade the Boston Symphony to play pianissimo — nice in Tchaikosvky, but particularly welcome in Beethoven—but the playing otherwise was plagued by uneasy woodwind intonation and by lots of mess from the horns.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (
(S) 566,377

FEB 6 1971

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,878

FEB 11 1971

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

FEB 11 1971

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

FEB 11 1971

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

FEB 2 1971

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

FEB 11 1971

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

FEB 11 1971

Symphony Concerts Scheduled

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns for the second time this season to conduct the orchestra's 17th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Feb. 12 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Feb. 13 at 8:30 p.m.

The program opens with Schubert's Symphony No. 8, "Unfinished," followed by Schoenberg's Variations for orchestra and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

The eighth concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Tuesday evening, Feb. 9 at 8:30 p.m. Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra in performances of Mozart's Serenade no. 9 and Stravinsky's Petrushka.

The fifth open rehearsal of the orchestra's 19th anniversary season takes place Thursday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m.

Looking Backward

BY L. P. KATZENSTEIN

Saturday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was the concert of the season to attend stoned. Probably only in that condition could Scriabin's mystic Poem of Ecstacy be heard as Scriabin must have intended. He was a man ahead of his time. Light shows? By the turn of the century he had invented a color organ for projecting the colors he associated with various keys. The occult? At the time of his death in 1915 he was working on Mystery, to be performed as a worship service by thousands in Tibet, with lights, perfumed air, dance, music and drama.

As one may have gathered, Scriabin's is music of some decadence. Such instructions in the Poem of Ecstacy score as "tres parfume" or "molto languido" give some sense of the perfumed world of Poem. But for all its "with-it-ness," this highly chromatic music looks backward, to the harmonic language of Wagner, rather than forward. But Scriabin was a truly individual composer, with an unmistakable style, and I was glad that guest conductor Claudio Abbado chose the Poem. I was struck most by some passages strikingly reminiscent of Stravinsky's Firebird.

Abbado is young, attractive, fun to watch, and a thoughtful, careful musician. But Poem of Ecstacy is no piece to judge a conductor by, though the orchestra played beautifully and with much passion. Poem requires organization more than interpretation—it is colorful but not very profound.

But the Eroica is a classic test and Abbado made a strong case for his version of what I think is Beethoven's most monumental symphony. Abbado's Eroica was straightforward, with few frills—maybe somewhat lacking a distinct personality, but a moving Eroica nonetheless. Especially compelling was the Marcia Funebre, Abbado began it at a very slow tempo, but was able to sustain the tension without letting the dramatic line go slack. There was only one eccentricity. The tempo bogged down to a plod during the first movement development. He is to be congratulated, though, for taking the exposition repeat, something too seldom done in these days of restless audiences.

The program began with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. I like the way the BSO plays under Abbado, with enthusiasm and a close attention to dynamics which has not always been so scrupulously observed in the past. William Steinberg announced last week that he will be leaving the BSO at the end of the 1971-72 season, and Abbado's name will likely be high on the list of possibilities for Mr. Steinberg's successor.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON AFTER DARK
W. 68,500

FEB 16 1971

Claudio Abbado is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, February 5 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, February 6 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, followed by Scriabin's Poem on Ecstacy and Beethoven's Third Symphony Eroica. Mr. Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,878

Symphony: Abbado Conducts 3-Concert Series

By HARRY NEVILLE

Claudio Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, returned here this week to conduct a three-concert series which began Thursday night. His program repeated yesterday and to be played again tonight, consisted of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony.

THE SCRIABIN is, of course, an unusual item, one that isn't often programmed, though revived interest in Scriabin will no doubt change that situation before long. "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Eroica," on the other hand, are part of everyone's experience—so much so that for many people it isn't easy to respond to the prospect of yet another performance.

Abbado's readings of these works, which I heard Thursday night, were hardly of the "yet another performance" variety. They were, to be sure, extraordinarily engrossing performances, but not because of any extremely personal ideas Abbado has about the scores. Except for an unusually slow "Eroica" funeral march, his conceptions were rather straightforward, in fact.

WHAT MADE the evening so appealing was Abbado's ability to make the listener feel that this was a statement of the composer's music, not an individual conductor's statement about the music. One seldom hears performances so beautifully conceived and executed, so passionately projected and yet so free of sentiment and "interpretation."

The orchestra responded superbly to this kind of direction, producing some of their best playing of the season. They twice insisted on solo bows for Abbado, who in turn bestowed special recognition upon Armando Ghitalla for his brilliant trumpet solos in Scriabin's "Poem."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 6 1971

Claudio Abbado guest conductor

Claudio Abbado will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in concerts which take place this Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. His program will consist of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Third Symphony.

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct the final concert of his guest series this Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. ontralto Eunice Alberts will be the soloist in Falla's "El Amor Brujo," and Christoph Eschenbach will perform the Schumann Piano Concerto. Also on the program are Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Ravel's "Daphnis and hloe" Suite No. 2.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305

JAN 31 1971

Claudio Abbado

. . . returns to conduct the Boston Symphony on Thursday and Saturday evenings, Feb. 4 and 6, and Friday afternoon, Feb. 5, in a program of works by Tchaikovsky, Scriabin, and Beethoven. Mr. Abbado has recently been named conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 3 1971

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 16th annual pair of Friday and Saturday concerts of Feb. 5-6. The program will open with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. This will be followed by Scribin's Poem of Ecstacy and Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica).

Claudio Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center. This was in 1958. Five years later he won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all of the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

The fifth concert of the Tuesday "B" series takes place Tuesday evening of this coming week at 7:30 p.m., in Boston Symphony Hall. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will be guest conductor, with soloists Christoph Eschenbach, piano, and Eunice Alberts, contralto. The program is Falla's "El amor brujo" with Eunice Alberts and Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat," Schumann's Piano Concerto with Christoph Eschenbach, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

The second concert of the Thursday "B" series takes place Thursday evening (Feb. 4). Claudio Abbado will conduct. The program will be the same as the weekend programs.

SUN/day
JAN. 31, 1971

Abbado conducts Boston Symphony in Scriabin

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Claudio Abbado, who since his visit here last season has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic, was the guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. His program: Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Scriabin's "Le poeme del' extase," and Bethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Obviously, the news here is the Scriabin, written in 1907, played here often by Koussevitzky, and last done at a Boston Symphony concert in 1960 under Lorin Maazel. A funny piece it is, more of a "Poeme des cantharides" than a "poeme de l'extase," with lots of irritation, some excitement, and not really a lot of ecstasy. It is hobbled by its themes, particularly a Wagnerian trumpet phrase that must occur five or six dozen times, and it is another of those Scriabin pieces that for all their churning are stuck quite fast to the flypaper. On the other hand, the details and many of the local relationshis are fascinating, the sheer sound is marvelous, and the final climax — in C major, a splendid key, but, as Wagner well knew, not one for ecstasy — is just possibly the most stupendous in the orchestral repertory.

Not really convinced, I still was enormously pleased by the chance to hear it. An original mind and lively fantasy speak through it, and if the BSO had a program policy rather than a lottery, they would in the next couple of seasons give us "Prometheus" (perhaps with light show, and I hope a better one than the New York Philharmonic came up with last year) and "Le Divin Poeme" as well. Abbado's performance yesterday, though it left something to be desired in textural clarity, was marvelous at catching the ebb and flow of the music, and the excitement of it really got to the audience. Armando Ghitalla deserved and got a couple of solo bows and cheers for his trumpet solos.

The Tchaikovsky performance was warm in the right places, though perhaps a bit cool where it might or should have been hot, and altogether the piece was projected cohesively and with refined musical taste. Abbado had nothing fresh to say about the "Eroica," but apart from some excessively slow tempi for the first and second movements, particularly the second, this work, too, was given honestly and clearly. Abbado again proved to be one of the few conductors who can persuade the Boston Symphony to play pianissimo — nice in Tchaikosvky, but particularly welcome in Beethoven—but the playing otherwise was plagued by uneasy woodwind intonation and by lots of mess from the horns.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

FEB 6 1971

Looking Backward

BY L. P. KATZENSTEIN

Saturday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was the concert of the season to attend stoned. Probably only in that condition could Scriabin's mystic Poem of Ecstacy be heard as Scriabin must have intended. He was a man ahead of his time. Light shows? By the turn of the century he had invented a color organ for projecting the colors he associated with various keys. The occult? At the time of his death in 1915 he was working on Mystery, to be performed as a worship service by thousands in Tibet, with lights, perfumed air, dance, music and drama.

As one may have gathered, Scriabin's is music of some decadence. Such instructions in the Poem of Ecstacy score as "tres parfume" or "molto languido" give some sense of the perfumed world of Poem. But for all its "with-it-ness," this highly chromatic music looks backward, to the harmonic language of Wagner, rather than forward. But Scriabin was a truly individual composer, with an unmistakable style, and I was glad that guest conductor Claudio Abbado chose the Poem. I was struck most by some passages strikingly reminiscent of Stravinsky's Firebird.

Abbado is young, attractive, fun to watch, and a thoughtful, careful musician. But Poem of Ecstacy is no piece to judge a conductor by, though the orchestra played beautifully and with much passion. Poem requires organization more than interpretation—it is colorful but not very profound.

But the Eroica is a classic test and Abbado made a strong case for his version of what I think is Beethoven's most monumental symphony. Abbado's Eroica was straightforward, with few frills—maybe somewhat lacking a distinct personality, but a moving Eroica nonetheless. Especially compelling was the Marcia Funebre, Abbado began it at a very slow tempo, but was able to sustain the tension without letting the dramatic line go slack. There was only one eccentricity. The tempo bogged down to a plod during the first movement development. He is to be congratulated, though, for taking the exposition repeat, something too seldom done in these days of restless audiences.

The program began with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet. I like the way the BSO plays under Abbado, with enthusiasm and a close attention to dynamics which has not always been so scrupulously observed in the past. William Steinberg announced last week that he will be leaving the BSO at the end of the 1971-72 season, and Abbado's name will likely be high on the list of possibilities for Mr. Steinberg's successor.

BOSTON, MASS.
BOSTON AFTER DARK
W. 68,500

FEB 16 1971

Claudio Abbado is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, February 5 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, February 6 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet, followed by Scriabin's Poem on Ecstacy and Beethoven's Third Symphony Eroica. Mr. Abbado, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, was winner of the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition. He has conducted all the major orchestras in the United States and has made many recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, including one of the initial releases of the Boston Symphony on DGG.

PUBLIC SPIRIT
AYER, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,878

FEB 11 1971

STAR
BRAINTREE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

FEB 11 1971

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

FEB 11 1971

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

FEB 2 1971

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

FEB 11 1971

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

FEB 11 1971

Symphony Concerts Scheduled

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns for the second time this season to conduct the orchestra's 17th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Friday, Feb. 12 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Feb. 13 at 8:30 p.m.

The program opens with Schubert's Symphony No. 8, "Unfinished," followed by Schoenberg's Variations for orchestra and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

The eighth concert of the Tuesday "A" series takes place Tuesday evening, Feb. 9 at 8:30 p.m. Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra in performances of Mozart's Serenade no. 9 and Stravinsky's Petrushka.

The fifth open rehearsal of the orchestra's 19th anniversary season takes place Thursday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m.

Symphony: Leinsdorf Conducts BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony yesterday in the second of two programs he is offering during his current guest engagement with the orchestra. The fare consisted of two great audience favorites—Schubert's Eighth ("Unfinished") Symphony and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra—plus a work for which Leinsdorf himself seems to have great affection—Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31.

The Schubert is a work that most professional groups can (and sometimes do) play in their sleep, but there was nothing jaded about the way the Boston players performed it yesterday. The reading was beautifully paced and Leinsdorf got some exquisite playing, particularly from the woodwinds.

SCHOENBERG'S Variations is a work that Leinsdorf conducted with the BSO less than two years ago, and that performance was a high point of my own rather brief experience of Leinsdorf's tenure as music director here. Yesterday's account seemed even more lucid and expressively played than the previous one, although I still wish Leinsdorf would make a more vivid point of the final presto.

Leinsdorf's way with Bartok is quite sophisticated, polished and flexible. Textures were everywhere well controlled, rhythms were nicely pointed and transition passages, while subtly shaped, were handled with a great deal of freedom. A very urbane performance but one that might disappoint people who prefere a reading that makes more of the score's earthiness and tang.

A REVIEW of the Symphony seems a logical place to take belated notice of an event that occured at the beginning of the week; namedly, last Monday's Kresge Auditorium recital of Boston Symphony cellist Luis Leguia and pianist Robert Freeman of the MIT music faculty.

Their program was well conceived, displaying as it did each participant in solo works—Kodaly's Sonata for Solo Cello and Schubert's A Minor Piano Sonata (D. 537)—and then giving them an opportunity to demonstrate their ensemble abilities in two gems of the cello-piano literature, the Elliott Carter Sonata and Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Op. 69.

THAT THESE artists are splendidly attuned to each other was apparent in carefully conceived balances, in nicely matchen phrasing, and in the sense one got of spontaneous exchange. Leguia produces a warm, glowing tone and has a brilliant technical control of his instrument—nowhere more evident than in the exceedingly difficult Kodaly Sonata. It was in this work, too, that I experienced my only reservation about his playing, which was to wish for him to "let go" a bit more, especially in so surging a score.

It was a pleasure to discover so intelligent and sensitive a pianist as Freeman, who seems to have an unusual understanding of Schubert's music. Especially impressive was his way of delicately manipulating tempos so as to heighten expressiveness and yet not distort the music's flow.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 13 1971

BSO performs Schoenberg

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

It was a pity that because of problems with rehearsal schedules, Erich Leinsdorf could not go through with his plan to conduct the Golden Calf scene from Schoenberg's "Moses und Aron" at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. What he gave us instead was by no means bad: Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31, of which he had conducted some fine performances a couple of years ago, and which he led with considerable skill and sympathy this time as well. A marvelous piece it is, too, tightly packed and clean and unwasteful, yet with uncommon charm of surface; aglow and rich with what it has learned from Bach and Brahms, but so original, so personal in every sound and gesture. The audience hated it.

Leinsdorf had begun with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and he came with interesting ideas about its second movement. First of all, he started it at a tempo that was not the traditional drag, but the result of a move really to imagine what Schubert meant by "Andante con moto" and by his decision to make the metric unit eights rather than quarters. Then, he was elastic in his departures from the main tempo, and he did much to articulate the events of the movement by modifying, sometimes quite startlingly, the intensity of forward motion as well as of sonority. It remained, however, a performance more of good intentions than of convincingly projected results. There were arresting, illuminating interpretive ideas and many lovely details, but the framework had a kind of absent mindedness to it, and the playing often was rhythmically swimmy.

After intermission, Leinsdorf conducted Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. He has that piece very well put together in his mind, and his conducting of it told a lot about the compositional genius Bartok lavished on the making of it (even without, for once, having much to say); still, the work wants rather more than it got yesterday of pepper, of humor, and of orchestral brilliance.

Meanwhile I hope that the "Moses und Aron" scheme can be brought to life again for one of Leinsdorf's programs next season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

FEB 13 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon February 12 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 13 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 23 1971 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHUBERT Symphony no. 8 in B minor D. 759
'Unfinished'*
Allegro moderato
Andante con moto

SCHOENBERG Variations for orchestra op. 31

intermission

BARTÓK Concerto for orchestra (1943)*
Andante non troppo – allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 16 1971

BSO: Leinsdorf leads

By Louis Snyder

Erich Leinsdorf was back with his second Boston Symphony program of the season in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. Tonight he'll lead program No. 1 there (Mozart, Stravinsky) before accompanying the orchestra to New York for a week of appearances.

Second time around, Mr. Leinsdorf dipped into late BSO seasons' repertoire: Schubert's Eighth Symphony ("Unfinished") (1967), Schoenberg's teeming Variations for Orchestra (1969), and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra (1968) as the stirring climax. However, it was hardly warmed-over fare, because none of the works, in their very different contexts, is to be served up half-prepared. Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians gave every evidence of pre-performance diligence.

The centerpiece of the program was Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, which is required listening for those who want to probe the what and how of serial writing. And, like it or not, who can afford to disregard this powerful influence on so much of the music composed in this century? The Variations are not easy going—hardly a case of love-at-first-hearing for anyone—but with the help of the succinct Burk program notes for starters, and a little goodwill toward the composer ("His radicalism," writes Mr. Burk, "had no purpose of drawing attention by shock"), the experience can be rewarding after all. And particularly in the present performance, which Mr. Leinsdorf led with zeal, and the orchestra expounded with conviction.

There were becoming contrasts for the Schoenberg, with the Schubert which preceded it, and the Bartok which followed. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of the "Unfinished" is not as langorous as some, and a little more matter-of-fact than others, but it sings validly and convincingly. The great Bartok Concerto, so much the real property of the BSO, was again treated to a ringing, vigorous performance in which conductor, players, and audience were equally and happily involved.

This second Leinsdorf program will be repeated in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 23.

Leinsdorf, BSO give virtuoso performance

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 24 1971

Erich Leinsdorf was guest conductor last night, in Symphony Hall, in the final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. Leinsdorf chose for the occasion two of the most popular works of the symphonic repertoire, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," and balanced these with a work that is never likely to win anyone's undying affection: Schoenberg's difficult "Variations for Orchestra, Opus 31."

Leinsdorf has always had a fondness for taking a new look at time-honored works which are familiar both to his musicians and to his audiences. Certainly, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony is a musical warhorse. The danger inherent in its playing by a seasoned orchestra is that the musicians, over-familiar with the score, could probably go through its musical paces without a conductor and while munching sandwiches and sipping beer during rests. To the credit of Leinsdorf and the orchestra, however, neither perfunctoriness nor signs of boredom were evident. On the contrary, the performance was fresh and meticulous in detail, lush and sonorous in the familiar slow theme, precise and clear in the rapid sections of the opening Allegro. In short, the reading, far from being soporific, was highly pleasurable and exquisitely controlled.

The same can be said for the Bartok "Concerto for Orchestra," assuredly one of the genuine masterpieces of 20th-Century music. A work of the last year of Bartok's life, it is illustrative of how Bartok had managed to simplify his method and means and to introduce into his composition a humanity and emotion lacking in his earlier, austere pieces.

The work abounds in abrupt and shifting accents, intricate rhythms, a note of remarkable affirmation (particularly in the finale), and moods that range from a brilliantly satiric scherzo to a moving elegy. The orchestration is brilliant, the melodic content appealing and Leinsdorf and the orchestra played it to the hilt in a truly virtuoso performance, with excellent solo work by nearly all the sections of the ensemble.

But, alas, for the Schoenberg! A product of the middle period of the composer's career when he was beginning to experiment with the 12-tone scale, it is an intellectual display of skill and ingenuity but it has no more heart or warmth than a block of cement.

20

Symphony: Leinsdorf Conducts BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony yesterday in the second of two programs he is offering during his current guest engagement with the orchestra. The fare consisted of two great audience favorites—Schubert's Eighth (("Unfinished") Symphony and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra—plus a work for which Leinsdorf himself seems to have great affection—Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31.

The Schubert is a work that most professional groups can (and sometimes do) play in their sleep, but there was nothing jaded about the way the Boston players performed it yesterday. The reading was beautifully paced and Leinsdorf got some exquisite playing, particularly from the woodwinds.

SCHOENBERG'S Variations is a work that Leinsdorf conducted with the BSO less than two years ago, and that performance was a high point of my own rather brief experience of Leinsdorf's tenure as music director here. Yesterday's account seemed even more lucid and expressively played than the previous one, although I still wish Leinsdorf would make a more vivid point of the final presto.

Leinsdorf's way with Bartok is quite sophisticated, polished and flexible. Textures were everywhere well controlled, rhythms were nicely pointed and transition passages, while subtly shaped, were handled with a great deal of freedom. A very urbane performance but one that might disappoint people who prefere a reading that makes more of the score's earthiness and tang.

A REVIEW of the Symphony seems a logical place to take belated notice of an event that occured at the beginning of the week; namedly, last Monday's Kresge Auditorium recital of Boston Symphony cellist Luis Leguia and pianist Robert Freeman of the MIT music faculty.

Their program was well conceived, displaying as it did each participant in solo works—Kodaly's Sonata for Solo Cello and Schubert's A Minor Piano Sonata (D. 537)—and then giving them an opportunity to demonstrate their ensemble abilities in two gems of the cello-piano literature, the Elliott Carter Sonata and Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Op. 69.

THAT THESE artists are splendidly attuned to each other was apparent in carefully conceived balances, in nicely matchen phrasing, and in the sense one got of spontaneous exchange. Leguia produces a warm, glowing tone and has a brilliant technical control of his instrument—nowhere more evident than in the exceedingly difficult Kodaly Sonata. It was in this work, too, that I experienced my only reservation about his playing, which was to wish for him to "let go" a bit more, especially in so surging a score.

It was a pleasure to discover so intelligent and sensitive a pianist as Freeman, who seems to have an unusual understanding of Schubert's music. Especially impressive was his way of delicately manipulating tempos so as to heighten expressiveness and yet not distort the music's flow.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 13 1971

BSO performs Schoenberg

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

It was a pity that because of problems with rehearsal schedules, Erich Leinsdorf could not go through with his plan to conduct the Golden Calf scene from Schoenberg's "Moses und Aron" at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. What he gave us inst d was by no means bad Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31, of which he had conducted some fine performances a couple of years ago, and which he led with considerable skill and sympathy this time as well. A marvelous piece it is, too, tightly packed and clean and unwasteful, yet with uncommon charm of surface; aglow and rich with what it has learned from Bach and Brahms, but so original, so personal in every sound and gesture. The audience hated it.

Leinsdorf had begun with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and he came with interesting ideas about its second movement. First of all, he started it at a tempo that was not the traditional drag, but the result of a move really to imagine what Schubert meant by "Andante con moto" and by his decisiion to make the metric unit eights rather than quarters. Then, he was elastic in his departures from the main tempo, and he did much to articulate the events of the movement by modifying, sometimes quite startlingly, the intensity of forward motion as well as of sonority. It remained, however, a performance more of good intentions than of convincingly projected results. There were arresting, illuminating interpretive ideas and many lovely details, but the framework had a kind of absent mindedness to it, and the playing often was rhythmically swimmy.

After intermission, Leinsdorf conducted Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. He has that piece very well put together in his mind, and his conducting of it told a lot about the compositional genius Bartok lavished on the making of it (even without, for once, having much to say); still, the work wants rather more than it got yesterday of pepper, of humor, and of orchestral brilliance.

Meanwhile I hope that the "Moses und Aron" scheme can be brought to life again for one of Leinsdorf's programs next season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

FEB 13 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Friday afternoon February 12 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 13 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 23 1971 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 8 in B minor D. 759 'Unfinished'*
Allegro moderato
Andante con moto

SCHOENBERG — Variations for orchestra op. 31

intermission

BARTÓK — Concerto for orchestra (1943)*
Andante non troppo – allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 16 1971

BSO: Leinsdorf leads

By Louis Snyder

Erich Leinsdorf was back with his second Boston Symphony program of the season in weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. Tonight he'll lead program No. 1 there (Mozart, Stravinsky) before accompanying the orchestra to New York for a week of appearances.

Second time around, Mr. Leinsdorf dipped into late BSO seasons' repertoire: Schubert's Eighth Symphony ("Unfinished") (1967), Schoenberg's teeming Variations for Orchestra (1969), and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra (1968) as the stirring climax. However, it was hardly warmed-over fare, because none of the works, in their very different contexts, is to be served up half-prepared. Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians gave every evidence of pre-performance diligence.

The centerpiece of the program was Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, which is required listening for those who want to probe the what and how of serial writing. And, like it or not, who can afford to disregard this powerful influence on so much of the music composed in this century? The Variations are not easy going—hardly a case of love-at-first-hearing for anyone—but with the help of the succinct Burk program notes for starters, and a little goodwill toward the composer ("His radicalism," writes Mr. Burk, "had no purpose of drawing attention by shock"), the experience can be rewarding after all. And particularly in the present performance, which Mr. Leinsdorf led with zeal, and the orchestra expounded with conviction.

There were becoming contrasts for the Schoenberg, with the Schubert which preceded it, and the Bartok which followed. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of the "Unfinished" is not as langorous as some, and a little more matter-of-fact than others, but it sings validly and convincingly. The great Bartok Concerto, so much the real property of the BSO, was again treated to a ringing, vigorous performance in which conductor, players, and audience were equally and happily involved.

This second Leinsdorf program will be repeated in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 23.

Leinsdorf, BSO give virtuoso performance

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 24 1971

Erich Leinsdorf was guest conductor last night, in Symphony Hall, in the final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. Leinsdorf chose for the occasion two of the most popular works of the symphonic repertoire, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," and balanced these with a work that is never likely to win anyone's undying affection: Schoenberg's difficult "Variations for Orchestra, Opus 31."

Leinsdorf has always had a fondness for taking a new look at time-honored works which are familiar both to his musicians and to his audiences. Certainly, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony is a musical warhorse. The danger inherent in its playing by a seasoned orchestra is that the musicians, over-familiar with the score, could probably go through its musical paces without a conductor and while munching sandwiches and sipping beer during rests. To the credit of Leinsdorf and the orchestra, however, neither perfunctoriness nor signs of boredom were evident. On the contrary, the performance was fresh and meticulous in detail, lush and sonorous in the familiar slow theme, precise and clear in the rapid sections of the opening Allegro. In short, the reading, far from being soporific, was highly pleasurable and exquisitely controlled.

The same can be said for the Bartok "Concerto for Orchestra," assuredly one of the genuine masterpieces of 20th-Century music. A work of the last year of Bartok's life, it is illustrative of how Bartok had managed to simplify his method and means and to introduce into his composition a humanity and emotion lacking in his earlier, austere pieces.

The work abounds in abrupt and shifting accents, intricate rhythms, a note of remarkable affirmation (particularly in the finale), and moods that range from a brilliantly satiric scherzo to a moving elegy. The orchestration is brilliant, the melodic content appealing and Leinsdorf and his orchestra played it to the hilt in a truly virtuoso performance, with excellent solo work by nearly all the sections of the ensemble.

But, alas, for the Schoenberg! A product of the middle period of the composer's career when he was beginning to experiment with the 12-tone scale, it is an intellectual display of skill and ingenuity but it has no more heart or warmth than a block of cement.

Haitink even better in the flesh

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The guest conductor for the Boston Symphony concerts at the end of last week and again last night was Bernard Haitink of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and the London Philharmonic.

Haitink has made lots of records, and, to a certain point at least, he was a known quantity when he strode onto the Symphony Hall stage: a serious and careful musician, an able conductor, with nothing flashy to his work.

Now, seeing Haitink at work for the first time and hearing the results in concert was an enormously interesting experience, even more because he exuded a vitality of which his recordings only sporadically give some sense.

BERNARD HAITINIK
. . . guest conductor

What I said about the absence of flashiness stays true, though. Haitink's "big piece" was Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," and the performance was a very different sort of affair from the all-stops-out attack by Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic on the "Symphonia domestica" at the beginning of this season.

Perhaps it is true that "Heldenleben," even by Straussian standards, rather overinforms the listener, but it is a masterfully controlled work that makes a sprawly effect only when it is conducted badly, which usually means too self-indulgently.

Haitink set it out so that it was as cohesive, as readily surveyed, as a Mozart allegro. It was superlatively well paced, with a stable framework and an elastic surface, and beautifully proportioned. The performance was of the rare sort that is exciting through sheer lucidity, the clarity of view it afforded of an extraordinarily imaginative and still original composition.

Not least, "Ein Heldenleben" was the occasion for handsome and relaxed playing by the orchestra. Joseph Silverstein's work with the violin solos, not only the fond but malicious portrait of Mrs. Strauss, but also the lyric passage near the end of the work, was marvelous, as brilliant violinistically as you would expect, but also with a sense of character that I don't recall from the orchestra's last performances five years ago.

The first half was rather quieter, with a Mozart serenade for strings and kettledrums only (the "Serenata notturna" in major, K.239, and Ravel's "Mother Goose," where even the final climax is somehow muted, luminousness perceived through a scrim. Both are works that give great pleasure. The Mozart is charming, but it is also quietly amazing in its orchestral originality with the division of the players into a solo quartet of two violins, viola and bass, playing into and out of a larger band of violins, violas, and cellos (no basses!) plus drums.

The Ravel is a wonder of economy and restraint, saying so much, and so much that is very touching, in so few notes — and how extraordinary it seemed again that so much of the music that most rightly speaks of childhood, Tchaikovsky, Ravel, Britten, is the work of childless men.

In addition to the five most familiar movements of the "Mother Goose" suite, Haiting conducted the two pieces Ravel added later, a Prelude that is particularly lovely in its prefiguring of later ideas in the work, and an elegant "Dance of the Spinning-wheel." The performances were fine, too: good, that is to say natural and easy-flowing Mozart, and just the right sort of shy warmth for the Ravel, played by the orchestra so that it was a delight to hear.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

MAR 3 1971

Haitink Conducts Boston Symphony

Bernard Haitink, who is artistic director of the Concert gebow Orchestra of Amsterdam and principal conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, made his conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Thursday night. Haitink has conducted in this country on sevral previous occasions, but his fame in the U.S. has come about principally through his recordings, especially those of the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler.

Perhaps out of a wish to counteract his image as a Bruckner and Mahler specialist, Haitink is ignoring those composers during his five-concert series here. His program, which will be repeated tonight and on March 2, and 4, conisits of Mozart's Serenade No. 6 in D, K. 239 ("Serenata Notturna"), Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS WRITER attended Thursday's concert and had the admirable but unfulfilled intention of going again on Friday afternoon. The reason for this was my dissatisfaction with the performance of the Mozart and Ravel works, which it seemed to me might have gotten short shrift in rehearsal time but which in any event came off in a rather pedestrian fashion.

Mozart's serenade is full of wit and humor as well as a quality aptly described by the program notes as "tongue-in-cheek pomposity." There was a certain amount of pomposity in the performance but I'm sorry to say I didn't find it very tongue-in-cheek. The Ravel contained several nice instances of solo playing but somehow missed the charm, warmth and delicacy of feeling that this music should convey.

ON THE OTHER HAND, Haitink's account of "Ein Heldenleben" was splendid in every way. This is a work that can easily be made to seem overinflated, but whereas many other conductors wallow in its grandiose emotions, Haitink finds much that is truly noble in the music. Part of his secret ,I think, is to avoid the excessive ritards that characterize the Strauss playing one often hears. But he has a way too of holding the music in reserve, of not expending too much energy too early, so that when the big moments arrive they have their full effect.

The orchestra responded beautifully to his direction of the Strauss. The strings in particular played resplendantly, and Joseph Silverstein gave a glowing performance of the solo violin part.

HARRY NEVILLE

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 27 1971

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

BERNARD HAITINK, Artistic Director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam, and Principal Conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts. Like many conductors, he was originally a violinist. He was in his mid-twenties when he was appointed conductor of the Radio Filharmonisch Orkest in Holland, and shortly afterwards substituted for the indisposed Carlo Maria Giulini in concerts with the Concertgebouw Orchestra. He was soon guest conducting with orchestras in Europe and the United States. In 1961 Bernard Haitink became a permanent conductor of the Concertgebouw, and toured with the Orchestra to many parts of the world, including Japan.

In 1964, on the occasion of the opening of the World's Fair, Bernard Haitink conducted concerts of the Concertgebouw in New York City. Three years later he took up his post with the London Philharmonic, and now spends about twelve weeks with the Orchestra in England. Recently he has been conducting opera in the Netherlands, and has been guest conductor with many of the world's great orchestras, among them the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Hallé and the BBC Symphony. Bernard Haitink has made many recordings with the Concertgebouw and London Philharmonic Orchestras on the Philips label.

PATRIOT LEDGER
MARCH 4, 1971

Welcome Guest

By Peter M. Knapp

Bernard Haitink, artistic director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam and principal conductor of the London Philharmonic, has been taking a turn as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. He should take many more, for Tuesday's concert was one of the finest of the season.

Haitink, a solid-looking, balding Dutchman who turns 42 today, is a sober batonist with a light hand who transformed the Boston Symphony into a distinctly European-sounding orchestra. His gestures are graceful and to the point; there are no hysterics — and much beautiful music-making.

Proper Production

His program — conducted from memory — included Mozart's Serenade No. 6 in D, K. 239, the dainty "Serenata Notturna;" Ravel's "Ma mere l'oye" ("Mother Goose"); and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." In each, he showed himself to be a conductor of musical perception and refinement, producing the proper scale and tonal-frame for each work.

And it must be said that the Boston Symphony played splendidly for him. It was a particular delight to hear playing that sounded relaxed, yet remained alert, and which had such instances of vivid detail.

The Mozart was particularly enjoyable — genial, mellow, gently-shaped, and scaled down to chamber-serenade proportions. There were a few moments of untogetherness, as in the opening of "Heldenleben," but many more of discriminating charm — as in the neatly elongated phrase-endings of the minuet. And the concluding allegretto section danced and sparkled.

The Ravel also abounded in fine detail and textures, with much nuance in line, coloring and dynamics. Haitink coaxed sensuous tones from the orchestra, but with a good deal more lightness than customary for the Boston Symphony. The Pavane came out all lace and wisps of sound. And again, amid the complexity of Ravel's pastel orchestration, there was the sense of relaxed, unhurried music-making.

BERNARD HAITINK

Haitnk surely demonstrated a keen ear for sound and texture.

Hard To Manage

After the pre-intermission charm, there was the contrast of the windy Strauss tone poem, an ambitious work of baffling banality and inspiration. "Heldenleben" is not easy to manage, but Haitink conducted it with care and logic. Properly, there was more iron, weight and passion. The battle episode was big and rugged, and Joseph Silverstein's violin solo expressive and technically brilliant.

The Strauss took a few moments to gel, but once it did the performance was rich in detail, neatly paced and framed in Old World sound. In all, Haitink is an extremely impressive conductor on the basis of his Boston debut program.

GUEST BSO MAESTRO — Bernard Haitink, Artistic Director of the Concertgebow Orchestra of Amsterdam and Principal Conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, makes his Boston Symphony debut at the ~~Friday - Saturday~~ concerts, Feb. 26 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Feb. 27 at 8:30 p.m. Program includes Mozart's Serenade no. 6 in D "Serenata notturna", Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite" and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben". Mr. Haitink also conducts this program Thursday, Feb. 25 at 8:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 21 1971

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

FEB 21 1971

STANDARD
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,414

FEB 25 1971

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 18 1971

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,410

FEB 25 1971

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening February 25 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon February 26 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 27 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 2 1971 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 4 1971 at 8.30

BERNARD HAITINK conductor

MOZART — Serenade no. 6 in D K. 239 'Serenata notturna'
- Marcia: maestoso
- Menuetto & trio
- Rondeau: allegretto

RAVEL — Ma mère l'oye*
- Prélude et danse du rouet (Introduction and dance of the spinning wheel)
- Pavane de la Belle au bois dormant (Pavane of the sleeping beauty)
- Petit Poucet (Tom Thumb)
- Laideronette, impératrice des Pagodas (The ugly little empress of the Pagodas)
- Les entretiens de la Belle et de la Bête (The conversation between Beauty and the Beast)
- Le jardin féerique (The fairy garden)

intermission

STRAUSS — Ein Heldenleben (A Hero's life) op. 40*

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin

Haitink even better in the flesh

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

BERNARD HAITINIK
. . . guest conductor

The guest conductor for the Boston Symphony concerts at the end of last week and again last night was Bernard Haitink of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and the London Philharmonic.

Haitink has made lots of records, and, to a certain point at least, he was a known quantity when he strode onto the Symphony Hall stage: a serious and careful musician, an able conductor, with nothing flashy to his work.

Now, seeing Haitink at work for the first time and hearing the results in concert was an enormously interesting experience, even more because he exuded a vitality of which his recordings only sporadically give some sense.

What I said about the absence of flashiness stays true, though. Haitink's "big piece" was Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," and the performance was a very different sort of affair from the all-stops-out attack by Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic on the "Symphonia domestica" at the beginning of this season.

Perhaps it is true that "Heldenleben," even by Straussian standards, rather overinforms the listener, but it is a masterfully controlled work that makes a sprawly effect only when it is conducted badly, which usually means too self-indulgently.

Haitink set it out so that it was as cohesive, as readily surveyed, as a Mozart allegro. It was superlatively well paced, with a stable framework and an elastic surface, and beautifully proportioned. The performance was of the rare sort that is exciting through sheer lucidity, the clarity of view it afforded of an extraordinarily imaginative and still original composition.

Not least, "Ein Heldenleben" was the occasion for handsome and relaxed playing by the orchestra. Joseph Silverstein's work with the violin solos, not only the fond but malicious portrait of Mrs. Strauss, but also the lyric passage near the end of the work, was marvelous, as brilliant violinistically as you would expect, but also with a sense of character that I don't recall from the orchestra's last performances five years ago.

The first half was rather quieter, with a Mozart serenade for strings and kettledrums only (the "Serenata notturna" in major, K.239, and Ravel's "Mother Goose," where even the final climax is somehow muted, luminousness perceived through a scrim. Both are works that give great pleasure. The Mozart is charming, but it is also quietly amazing in its orchestral originality with the division of the players into a solo quartet of two violins, viola and bass, playing into and out of a larger band of violins, violas, and cellos (no basses!) plus drums.

The Ravel is a wonder of economy and restraint, saying so much, and so much that is very touching, in so few notes — and how extraordinary it seemed again that so much of the music that most rightly speaks of childhood, Tchaikovsky, Ravel, Britten, is the work of childless men.

In addition to the five most familiar movements of the "Mother Goose" suite, Haiting conducted the two pieces Ravel added later, a Prelude that is particularly lovely in its prefiguring of later ideas in the work, and an elegant "Dance of the Spinning-wheel." The performances were fine, too: good, that is to say natural and easy-flowing Mozart, and just the right sort of shy warmth for the Ravel, played by the orchestra so that it was a delight to hear.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E)
(S) 566,377

MAR 3 1971

Haitink Conducts Boston Symphony

Bernard Haitink, who is artistic director of the Concert gebow Orchestra of Amsterdam and principal conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, made his conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Thursday night. Haitink has conducted in this country on sevral previous occasions, but his fame in the U.S. has come about principally through his recordings, especially those of the symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler.

Perhaps out of a wish to counteract his image as a Bruckner and Mahler specialist, Haitink is ignoring those composers during his five-concert series here. His program, which will be repeated tonight and on March 2, and 4, consists of Mozart's Serenade No. 6 in D, K. 239 ("Serenata Notturna"), Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS WRITER attended Thursday's concert and had the admirable but unfulfilled intention of going again on Friday afternoon. The reason for this was my dissatisfaction with the performance of the Mozart and Ravel works, which it seemed to me might have gotten short shrift in rehearsal time but which in any event came off in a rather pedestrian fashion.

Mozart's serenade is full of wit and humor as well as a quality aptly described by the program notes as "tongue-in-cheek pomposity." There was a certain amount of pomposity in the performance but I'm sorry to say I didn't find it very tongue-in-cheek. The Ravel contained several nice instances of solo playing but somehow missed the charm, warmth and delicacy of feeling that this music should convey.

ON THE OTHER HAND, Haitink's account of "Ein Heldenleben" was splendid in every way. This is a work that can easily be made to seem overinflated, but whereas many other conductors wallow in its grandiose emotions, Haitink finds much that is truly noble in the music. Part of his secret, I think, is to avoid the excessive ritards that characterize the Strauss playing one often hears. But he has a way too of holding the music in reserve, of not expending too much energy too early, so that when the big moments arrive they have their full effect.

The orchestra responded beautifully to his direction of the Strauss. The strings in particular played resplendantly, and Joseph Silverstein gave a glowing performance of the solo violin part.

HARRY NEVILLE

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 27 1971

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

BERNARD HAITINK, Artistic Director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam, and Principal Conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts. Like many conductors, he was originally a violinist. He was in his mid-twenties when he was appointed conductor of the Radio Filharmonisch Orkest in Holland, and shortly afterwards substituted for the indisposed Carlo Maria Giulini in concerts with the Concertgebouw Orchestra. He was soon guest conducting with orchestras in Europe and the United States. In 1961 Bernard Haitink became a permanent conductor of the Concertgebouw, and toured with the Orchestra to many parts of the world, including Japan.

In 1964, on the occasion of the opening of the World's Fair, Bernard Haitink conducted concerts of the Concertgebouw in New York City. Three years later he took up his post with the London Philharmonic, and now spends about twelve weeks with the Orchestra in England. Recently he has been conducting opera in the Netherlands, and has been guest conductor with many of the world's great orchestras, among them the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Hallé and the BBC Symphony. Bernard Haitink has made many recordings with the Concertgebouw and London Philharmonic Orchestras on the Philips label.

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY SEASON 1970-1971

Thursday evening February 25 1971 at 8.30
Friday afternoon February 26 1971 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 27 1971 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 2 1971 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 4 1971 at 8.30

BERNARD HAITINK conductor

MOZART	Serenade no. 6 in D K. 239 'Serenata notturna'
	Marcia: maestoso Menuetto & trio Rondeau: allegretto
RAVEL	Ma mère l'oye*
	Prélude et danse du rouet (Introduction and dance of the spinning wheel) Pavane de la Belle au bois dormant (Pavane of the sleeping beauty) Petit Poucet (Tom Thumb) Laideronette, impératrice des Pagodas (The ugly little empress of the Pagodas) Les entretiens de la Belle et de la Bête (The conversation between Beauty and the Beast) Le jardin féerique (The fairy garden)
intermission
STRAUSS	Ein Heldenleben (A Hero's life) op. 40*
	JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin

PATRIOT LEDGER
MARCH 4, 1971

Welcome Guest

By Peter M. Knapp

Bernard Haitink, artistic director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam and principal conductor of the London Philharmonic, has been taking a turn as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. He should take many more, for Tuesday's concert was one of the finest of the season.

Haitink, a solid-looking, balding Dutchman who turns 42 today, is a sober batonist with a light hand who transformed the Boston Symphony into a distinctly European-sounding orchestra. His gestures are graceful and to the point; there are no hysterics — and much beautiful music-making.

Proper Production

His program — conducted from memory — included Mozart's Serenade No. 6 in D, K. 239, the dainty "Serenata Notturna;" Ravel's "Ma mere l'oye" ("Mother Goose"); and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." In each, he showed himself to be a conductor of musical perception and refinement, producing the proper scale and tonal-frame for each work.

And it must be said that the Boston Symphony played splendidly for him. It was a particular delight to hear playing that sounded relaxed, yet remained alert, and which had such instances of vivid detail.

The Mozart was particularly enjoyable — genial, mellow, gently-shaped, and scaled down to chamber-serenade proportions. There were a few moments of untogetherness, as in the opening of "Heldenleben," but many more of discriminating charm — as in the neatly elongated phrase-endings of the minuet. And the concluding allegretto section danced and sparkled.

The Ravel also abounded in fine detail and textures, with much nuance in line, coloring and dynamics. Haitink coaxed sensuous tones from the orchestra, but with a good deal more lightness than customary for the Boston Symphony. The Pavane came out all lace and wisps of sound. And again, amid the complexity of Ravel's pastel orchestration, there was the sense of relaxed, unhurried music-making.

BERNARD HAITINK

Haitnk surely demonstrated a keen ear for sound and texture.

Hard To Manage

After the pre-intermission charm, there was the contrast of the windy Strauss tone poem, an ambitious work of baffling banality and inspiration. "Heldenleben" is not easy to manage, but Haitink conducted it with care and logic. Properly, there was more iron, weight and passion. The battle episode was big and rugged, and Joseph Silverstein's violin solo expressive and technically brilliant.

The Strauss took a few moments to gel, but once it did the performance was rich in detail, neatly paced and framed in Old World sound. In all, Haitink is an extremely impressive conductor on the basis of his Boston debut program.

GUEST BSO MAESTRO — Bernard Haitink, Artistic Director of the Concertgebow Orchestra of Amsterdam and Principal Conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, makes his Boston Symphony debut at the ~~Friday - Saturday~~ concerts, Feb. 26 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, Feb. 27 at 8:30 p.m. Program includes Mozart's Serenade no. 6 in D "Serenata notturna", Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite" and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben". Mr. Haitink also conducts this program Thursday, Feb. 25 at 8:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298

FEB 21 1971

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

FEB 21 1971

STANDARD
BOSTON, MASS.

FEB 25 1971

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 18 1971

HERALD
RANDOLPH, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,410

FEB 25 1971

BLANK PAGE

22

BSO

AWAY

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

SEP 7 1970

a concert version of Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," with one performance falling on the composer's actual birth date, Dec. 16.

Other guest conductors of the season include James DePriest, with Alicia de Larrocha as soloist in the Khachaturian Piano Concerto; Max Rudolf, with violinist Henryk Szeryng performing the Sibelius Concerto; Mesru Mehmedov, with pianist Emil Gilels in an all-Beethoven program; George Semkow, in his debut with the orchestra, with pianist Claudio Arrau as guest artist in a performance of the Chopin Concerto No. 1; Eugen Jochum, with violinist Itzhak Perlman performing Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole; Maxim Shostakovitch, son of the celebrated composer, with pianist Ronald Turini playing the Prokofiev Third Concerto; and Antonio Janigro, leading a program of Baroque music with the four Romeros, guitarists, as soloists.

The Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Zubin Mehta, and the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg, will also appear on the series under National Symphony auspices.

Subscribers can save up to 49 per cent on ticket prices for the season, and are assured of priority seating when the National Symphony moves to Kennedy Center in 1971. Subscription tickets are still available, with choicest seating available for Wednesday evenings. Prices for the series are $85, $70, $56, and $46 (student-military, $22). Subscriptions can be obtained at the National Symphony box office at Campbell's, 1300 G St. NW, or from the subscription department, National Symphony, 2480 16th St. NW.

Boston Symphony Lists 3 Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 87th consecutive season of concerts in Providence opens on Thursday, Oct 22, at 8:30 p m in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. Two other concerts, both Thursdays at 8:30 p m in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium are Dec 10 and Jan 28, 1971.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony conducts on Dec 19 with violinist Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony as soloist.

The final concert of the Providence Series on Jan 28 is conducted by guest conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos. Christoph Eschenbach is piano soloist.

BRISTOL, R. I.
PHOENIX
W. 4,255

SEP 25 1970

TIMES
BARRINGTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 4,201

SEP 24 1970

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
BI-WEEKLY 3,988

SEP 25 1970

WARREN, R. I.
TIMES GAZETTE
W. 2,640

SEP 24 1970

Music In Review

Steinberg, Lettvin Stars Of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~under the direction~~ of William Steinberg gave a superb concert that at intervals attained the sublime in musical expression Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. It was the opening program of the current Providence series of concerts that, this year, includes only three appearances instead of the customary five. And, if the next two are equal in excitement, artistry and audience-pleasing variety, it will make up for the loss.

And adding to the thrilling performance of the orchestra, was the dynamic performance of Theodore Lettvin, young, stalwart and handsome pianist, that burnished the luster of the Boston's first concert here. His keyboard aplomb and fluency, coupled with his exactness in entries and flairing cadenzas marks him as one of the great piano virtuosos of this era.

Opening with the "Variations and Fugue on a theme of Mozart" by Reger, the orchestra created a sensation of anticipated delight in the many moods of Mozart's animated heme that included rhythms of the dances, romance of the serenades, the pathos of lament, the reverence of hymn and psalm, the serenity of a pastorale and the jubilance of a paen of adoration, all in a delicately decorated package of variations.

The performance of Rachmaninov's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paginini" by Lettvin came next and evoked intermission chatter of praise with exclamations such as "What a pianist!" and "What a magnificent orchestra accompaniment!"

The finale was one, if not the merriest and wittiest of Beethoven's writings, "Symphony No. 7 in A" that was lavish in eloquently expressed wooing and caressing phrases and amorous moods ending with a bombast of electrifying merriment in an allegro con brio movement.

It was the most pleasing evening of music I have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra perform in the past 20 years under the batons of Charles Munch, Erich Leinsdorf, William Steinberg and numerous guest conductors.

C.H.L.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,093

SEP 23 1970

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,725 (S) 208,349

SEP 23 1970

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Is Heard In First of 3 Concerts Here

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, played the first of the Providence series of three concerts at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. This is the ninetieth anniversary year for this venerable orchestra and this was their 406th concert in Providence. This total wil not add up so rapidly from now on, since we are cut to three concerts a season. But there is always Route 95, if you wish to add the missing two programs. Boston is nearer than it used to be.

As for excellence of production, there were innumerable points when perfection of ensemble in delicate passages was unbelievably accurate. This was truly a virtuoso concert.

Theodore Lettvin, pianist, was soloist in the Rachmaninov Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, and his performance was admirable. The Rhapsodie was preceded by Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, and the concert closed with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

It was apparent that there has been no generation gap in the musical world of Reger and Rachmaninoff. They followed the trend in the matter of showing their skill at the writing of variations. In the Reger, he paid homage to Mozart and the purity and simplicity of the Mozart theme from his piano Sonata in A major made an excellent basis for the elaborate orchestral structure built by Reger. Mozart himself made several delightful variations on this theme. It was fascinating to hear the individuality and skill exhibited in the score. The exposition of the fugue and its working out, from choir to choir, was a remarkable demonstration of tonal contrast, and here the fine string section outdid itself.

Theodore Lettvin, who had a master class in piano several summers ago at the University of Rhode Island, is a tremendous addition to the musical life of New England. He has power and unlimited technique, but he also has a great gift for interpretation. We heard the Rhapsodie with infinite variety of color, impeccable ryhthm, the speed of virtuoso playing where the Paganini virtuosity was incorporated into this second tribute to an older composer. When it came to the Rachmaninoff theme of the middle movement, we heard an interpretation which was unashamedly romantic. It will sing for us through the coming week. It is that kind of music. Thanks to Mr. Lettvin, this old favorite once more proved its musical worth. Mr. Steinberg's accompaniment was superb.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, as we heard it, was a model of orchestral skill and all its familiar themes fitted into place, as we knew they would, to make another tribute in the Beethoven anniversary year. No revolutionary ideas here. Only the solid, dependable musicianship of a seasoned conductor of William Steinberg's standing could have brought such musical satisfaction to the listeners. It was good to hear him once again.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

OCT 1 1970

Boston Symphony Opens Oct. 14

The Boston Symphony will open its 84th New York season Oct. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in Philharmonic Hall. Music Director William Steinberg will lead the first concert which will be repeated Oct. 16. Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 and Reger's "Mozart Variations" make up the program.

Remaining dates and programs follow: Nov. 18, 20, Seiji Ozawa conducting, works by Copland, Ligeti, Berlioz. . Jan. 13, 15, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, works by Webern, DeBussy and "Saxophone Concerto by Dahl" . . . Feb. 17, 19, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Cantata Singers in "Golden Calf" scene from Arnold Schoenberg's "Moses and Aaron." Also symphonies by Schubert and Mendelssohn . . . March 17, 19, Thomas conducting, works by Beethoven, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky.

The Bostonians will also play five concerts in Carnegie Hall Oct. 17, Steinberg conducting, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 . . . Nov. 21, Ozawa conducting, Maurizio Pollini, pianist, in Piano Concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev . . . Jan. 16, Thomas conducting, Harvard Glee Club assisting; works by Perotin, Stockhausen, Schumann . . . Feb. 20, Leinsdorf conducting, works by Mozart and Stravinsky . . . March 20, Thomas conducting, works by Haydn, Birtwistle, Nielson.

All Philharmonic Hall and Carnegie events will begin at 8:30.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 439,830

OCT 4 1970

PREMIERE—William Steinberg will lead the Boston Symphony Oct. 17 in Carnegie Hall in opening of a four-concert series.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,666

OCT 7 1970

Boston Symphony Concerts

The 84th consecutive season of concerts in New York City by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens on Wednesday and Friday, Oct. 14 and 16, at 8:30 p.m. in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall. William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, conducts Reger's Mozart Variations and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

The first of five concerts by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall takes place Saturday, Oct. 17, at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg conducts Holst's Suite from The Planets, Partos' Paths and Beethoven's Symphony no. 7.

Oedeon Partos' Paths is the first of three pieces commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife.

PASTE OVER

24

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
OCT 15 1970

CRITIC AT LARGE by Byron Belt

Boston Symphony Tops!

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played Bruckner's Seventh Symphony is one hon ic form. aordinarily mes almost r the sound wed to our and experi- formances. a ability to its entire- nd of the such archi- ckner Sev- always be apse into a lilloquence. d a tribute Bostonians, was heard the emo- s freed to

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,666
OCT 15 1970

Critic-at-Large

Boston Symphony Memorable

By Byron Belt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first of its 90th anniversary season concerts in New York last evening. With music director William Steinberg conducting a memorable program of music of Max Reger and Anton Bruckner.

While the orchestra may have shifted its recording allegiance recently, the slogan should remain the same: "The aristocrat of orchestras." Last night's concert (which will be repeated in Philharmonic Hall tomorrow) set standards which the rest of the season will be hard pressed to match.

FROM THE sonically suffocating confines of the loge area, we heard an impeccable performance of Reger's splendid "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart." The Bavarian composer's music has never become as popular as his finest works would dictate, but William Steinberg seems to have assumed the championship of his orchestral music, so long the lonely provence of the late Fritz Busch.

Reger based his eight variations and a gigantic fugue on a theme from one of Mozart's most popular sonatas, that with the so-called "rondo alla turca." The treatment is highly sophisticated, keeping the theme always fairly near the surface, but embellishing it with the most imaginative harmonies and striking polyphonic treatment.

The sublime seventh gariation, and the complex fugue were of particular interest, but Steinberg's interpretation and the orchestra's performance of the entire work must be termed definitive.

BRUCKNER'S Seventh Symphony is one of the most noble in the symphonic form. It is tremendous in scope, extraordinarily original in concept and at all times almost unbearably expressive. To savor the sound of this marvelous work, we moved to our regular seats in the orchestra, and experienced one of the truly great performances.

William Steinberg has a rare ability to conceive and control a work in its entirety; yet never lose sight or sound of the smallest details. In a work of such architectonic grandeur as the Bruckner Seventh, the entire structure must always be apparent, or the work can collapse into a maze of pomposity and grandilloquence.

It is to Steinberg's credit, and a tribute to the magnificence of the Bostonians, that Bruckner's grand design was heard with astonishing clarity, while the emotional and spiritual content was freed to touch and inspire the heart.

THE ORCHESTRAL performance was marked by brass playing that was sonorous without ever blaring, strings rich as wine yet never sounding merely lush, and winds that shimmered through the sometimes over-thick texture without ever shrieking.

The orchestral performance was marked by brass playing that was sonorous without ever blaring, strings rich as wine yet never sounding merely lush, and winds that shimmered through the sometimes over-thick texture without ever shrieking.

As it must be in this symphony, the climax came in the adagio. Where many a conductor is content to storm the heavens, Steinberg let the music soar. The result was perfect listening for what critic Claudia Cassidy always refers to as "the inner ear." That source of contact with the soul was in supreme command last evening. Friday's repeat performance is missed at your peril.

1-5454

ON PODIUM: Maestro William Steinberg is on the podium for three concert series openers. He conducts the Boston Symphony tonight and Friday in Philharmonic Hall and conducts tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
OCT 14 1970

Boston Symphony At Lincoln Center

BOSTON — The eighty-fourth consecutive season of concerts in New York City by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open on Wednesday and Friday at 8:30 p.m. (both nights) in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
OCT 10 1970

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, will conduct Reger's "Mozart Variations" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

The first of five concerts by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall takes place Saturday evening, Oct. 17, at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg conducts Holst's Suite from "The Planets," Partos' "Paths" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

Oedeon Partos' "Paths" is the first of three pieces commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife.

Before the Orchestra leaves for the New York tour concerts, Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's associate conductor, will conduct the first of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4, followed by Harrison's Canticle No. 3, Ravel's "La Valse" and Piston's Symphony No. 2.

CULTURE — Several fine arts programs are scheduled for the area this month. Anhurst College will present two. The first is a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players to invited guests on Sunday to open the women college's 1,018-seat theater in the new cultural center. The other is a professional performance by the National Theater Company of New Jersey of Arthur Miller's play, "Death of a Salesman."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
OCT 8 1970

Visiting Orchestras at Carnegie Hall

The eighth annual International Festival of Visiting Orchestras at Carnegie Hall, 57th Street and Seventh Avenue, will open with the Los Angeles Philharmonic under Zubin Mehta on Thursday evening, October 29.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for another series of four Saturday evening concerts, with William Steinberg conducting on October 17, and Seiji Ozawa on November 21.

CITY EAST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 1970

Bostonians Open Here In 2 Works

By RAYMOND ERICSON

There were only two works on the program that opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here in Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday night: Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Although 31 years separate them—the former was completed in 1914, the latter in 1883—they both belong within the German romantic tradition. Yet they had enough differences to make them nicely complementary.

Reger's work had a good deal of currency in the symphonic repertory some decades ago, but now it seems to have dropped out of favor with conductors. It is a very attractive piece in some ways. The composer was a master contrapuntist, and the score is full of ingenious writing. Inner voices almost overload the music, but they are fun to watch for. A gigantic, even monstrous, double fugue brings the work to a close.

Whitestone

William Steinberg

The harmonies grow richer and more complex as the variations proceed. Mozart's familiar little melody is stretched and twisted until the final variation, when Reger turns out a lush tune that is reminiscent of what happens to the Paganini theme in Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody for piano and orchestra.

This is all pleasantly entertaining, and the piece makes an elegantly virtuoso vehicle for an orchestra of the Boston Symphony's caliber. It was smartly played under the direction of William Steinberg, who was making a welcome return after having been kept out of New York's concert halls for much of last season because of illness. Curiously, he interrupted the Reger after the second variation to allow latecomers to be seated—a thoughtful gesture but musically debatable.

●

The Bruckner symphony is much that the Reger is not. It is noble in intention and accomplishment. It is considerably less polished in the writing, too granitic in structure and far less interesting harmonically. Yet, whether you like Bruckner's music or not, it speaks with a clearly individual voice. The Reger variations could have been written by other composers, and it may be this factor that has caused it to lack more adherents than the work has.

Mr. Steinberg conducted the symphony most beautifully. He did not press the music too hard, by trying to make it even more grandiose than it is. His phrasing was extremely supple, which helped to round off or break up the squarish blocks in which the work is patterned, but he did it without stemming the great flow of the music. The performance was both unfussy and sensitive, to which the Bostonians contributed their usual expert playing.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 16 1970

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,7[illegible] (S) 208,349
OCT 18 1970

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

We should call this Orchestra Week

IF SOMEBODY HAD been alert they would have named this Orchestra Week. No doubt our politicians are so busy running for this or that, such a proclamation never occurred to them.

But the fact is, the next seven days will see opening concerts by each orchestra giving regular series in Providence. This afternoon the Brown University Orchestra performs. On Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its three programs here. And Saturday evening the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra opens its season.

It may seem strange to lump the Brown orchestra with those two more senior groups, even to its music director, Martin Fischer. To do so is not only to make a case for an orchestra week, however, but also because at Brown you hear such imaginative programming. Note the contents of this afternoon's four o'clock concert in Sayles Hall as evidence.

William Steinberg conducts the Bostonian's program, with Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas, named the orchestra's associate conductor at the end of last season, will lead its program of Dec. 10, with violinist Joseph Silverstein the soloist. The third concert on Jan. 28 will be conducted by Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos and will have Christoph Eschenbach performing the Schumann piano concerto.

Then that will be it for the orchestra's 87th season here. It is most interesting that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra cut Providence concerts from five to three hardly a murmur of protest was heard.

There were good reasons for this smaller number. The orchestra has scheduled a European tour next spring and, consequently has reduced the total number of regular performances by 15 or 16. We lost two.

But, there is no assurance its 1971-72 Providence season will return to the former number, either. Audiences have dropped to the point where Boston's management must realistically question the practicality of continuing to come here at a loss.

There are other questions it might ask. Can programs such as Steinberg brings on Thursday to Veterans Auditorium stay attractive forever: Reger's Mozart variations, Rachmaninoff's Paganini variations and Beethoven's seventh symphony?

Well, you should not damn in advance. Performances have a way when they are especially good of negating preconceived notions. But the thing is, excitement from anticipation cannot be ruled out. Reger, Rachmaninoff and Beethoven is not a very exciting combination before the fact.

In the meantime, while Boston's Providence audiences are dwindling, subscription lists for the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra have increased in the past four years. From the 900 to 1,000 it had for most of its history, the number is now approaching 1,500.

Why? No one, including the orchestra's music director, Francis Madeira, claims a performance level equal to Boston, with 89 seasons under its belt. But obviously something has happened. Local pride may be partly an answer. If it is, the Philharmonic's steady improvement over the past several years has to be the larger part.

Saturday evening's concert at Veterans Auditorium, by the way, is the next to last in the orchestra's Beethoven bicentennial celebration. While more Beethoven does not cause waves of excitement in every breast, the prospect of hearing Misha Dichter play the Emperor concerto does stir interest. There is the difference.

All of these points, no matter how you feel about them, add to the amazing sense of change going on. That we have three symphonic programs in so short a period indicates how lively our music scene has become.

* * *

PASTE OVER

2 4

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,961 SUN. 423,790

OCT 15 1970

CRITIC AT LARGE by Byron Belt

Boston Symphony Tops!

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played Bruckner's Seventh Symphony is one honic form. aordinarily mes almost r the sound wed to our and experi- formances. e ability to its entire- and of the such archi- ckner Sev- always be apse into a lilloquence. d a tribute Bostonians, was heard e the emo- s freed to

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 36,024 SAT. 19,066

OCT 15 1970

Critic-at-Large

Boston Symphony Memorable

By Byron Belt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first of its 90th anniversary season concerts in New York last evening. With music director William Steinberg conducting a memorable program of music of Max Reger and Anton Bruckner.

While the orchestra may have shifted its recording allegiance recently, the slogan should remain the same: "The aristrocrat of orchestras." Last night's concert (which will be repeated in Philharmonic Hall tomorrow) set standards which the rest of the season will be hard pressed to match.

FROM THE sonically suffocating confines of the loge area, we heard an impeccable performance of Reger's splendid "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart." The Bavarian composer's music has never become as popular as his finest works would dictate, but William Steinberg seems to have assumed the championship of his orchestral music, so long the lonely provence of the late Fritz Busch.

Reger based his eight variations and a gigantic fugue on a theme from one of Mozart's most popular sonatas, that with the so-called "rondo alla turca." The treatment is highly sophisticated, keeping the theme always fairly near the surface, but embellishing it with the most imaginative harmonies and striking polyphonic treatment.

The sublime seventh gariation, and the complex fugue were of particular interest, but Steinberg's interpretation and the orchestra's performance of the entire work must be termed definitive.

BRUCKNER'S Seventh Symphony is one of the most noble in the symphonic form. It is tremendous in scope, extraordinarily original in concept and at all times almost unbearably expressive. To savor the sound of this marvelous work, we moved to our regular seats in the orchestra, and experienced one of the truly great performances.

William Steinberg has a rare ability to conceive and control a work in its entirety; yet never lose sight or sound of the smallest details. In a work of such architectonic grandeur as the Bruckner Seventh, the entire structure must always be apparent, or the work can collapse into a maze of pomposity and grandilloquence.

It is to Steinberg's credit, and a tribute to the magnificence of the Bostonians, that Bruckner's grand design was heard with astonishing clarity, while the emotional and spiritual content was freed to touch and inspire the heart.

THE ORCHESTRAL performance was marked by brass playing that was sonorous, without ever blaring, strings rich as wine yet never sounding merely lush, and winds that shimmered through the sometimes over-thick texture without ever shrieking.

The orchestral performance was marked by brass playing that was sonorous without ever blaring, strings rich as wine yet never sounding merely lush, and winds that shimmered through the sometimes over-thick texture without ever shrieking.

As it must be in this symphony, the climax came in the adagio. Where many a conductor is content to storm the heavens, Steinberg let the music soar. The result was perfect listening for what critic Claudia Cassidy always refers to as "the inner ear." That source of contact with the soul was in supreme command last evening. Friday's repeat performance is missed at your peril.must be termed definitive.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

OCT 10 1970

Boston Symphony At Lincoln Center

BOSTON — The eighty-fourth consecutive season of concerts in New York City by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open on Wednesday and Friday at 8:30 p.m. (both nights) in Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall.

William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, will conduct Reger's "Mozart Variations" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

The first of five concerts by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall takes place Saturday evening, Oct. 17, at 8:30 p.m. Steinberg conducts Holst's Suite from "The Planets," Partos' "Paths" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

Oedeon Partos' "Paths" is the first of three pieces commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation, a trust established by William Steinberg in memory of his late wife.

Before the Orchestra leaves for the New York tour concerts, Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's associate conductor, will conduct the first of the Tuesday "Cambridge" series Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4, followed by Harrison's Canticle No. 3, Ravel's "La Valse" and Piston's Symphony No. 2.

1-5454

ON PODIUM: Maestro William Steinberg is on the podium for three concert series openers. He conducts the Boston Symphony tonight and Friday in Philharmonic Hall and conducts tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,961 SUN. 423,790

OCT 14 1970

CULTURE — Several fine arts programs are scheduled for the area this month. Annhurst College will present two. The first is a concert bv the Boston Symphony Chamber Players to invited guests on Sunday to open the women college's 1,018-seat theater in the new cultural center. The other is a professional performance by the National Theater Company of New Jersey of Arthur Miller's play, "Death of a Salesman."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

OCT 8 1970

Visiting Orchestras at Carnegie Hall

The eighth annual International Festival of Visiting Orchestras at Carnegie Hall, 57th Street and Seventh Avenue, will open with the Los Angeles Philharmonic under Zubin Mehta on Thursday evening, October 29.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns for another series of four Saturday evening concerts, with William Steinberg conducting on October 17, and Seiji Ozawa on November 21.

OCT 1970

Bostonians Open Here In 2 Works

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

OCT 16 1970

By RAYMOND ERICSON

There were only two works on the program that opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here in Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday night: Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Although 31 years separate them—the former was completed in 1914, the latter in 1883—they both belong within the German romantic tradition. Yet they had enough differences to make them nicely complementary.

Reger's work had a good deal of currency in the symphonic repertory some decades ago, but now it seems to have dropped out of favor with conductors. It is a very attractive piece in some ways. The composer was a master contrapuntist, and the score is full of ingenious writing. Inner voices almost overload the music, but they are fun to watch for. A gigantic, even monstrous, double fugue brings the work to a close.

Whitestone

William Steinberg

The harmonies grow richer and more complex as the variations proceed. Mozart's familiar little melody is stretched and twisted until the final variation, when Reger turns out a lush tune that is reminiscent of what happens to the Paganini theme in Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody for piano and orchestra.

This is all pleasantly entertaining, and the piece makes an elegantly virtuoso vehicle for an orchestra of the Boston Symphony's caliber. It was smartly played under the direction of William Steinberg, who was making a welcome return after having been kept out of New York's concert halls for much of last season because of illness. Curiously, he interrupted the Reger after the second variation to allow latecomers to be seated—a thoughtful gesture but musically debatable.

●

The Bruckner symphony is much that the Reger is not. It is noble in intention and accomplishment. It is considerably less polished in the writing, too granitic in structure and far less interesting harmonically. Yet, whether you like Bruckner's music or not, it speaks with a clearly individual voice. The Reger variations could have been written by other composers, and it may be this factor that has caused it to lack more adherents than the work has.

Mr. Steinberg conducted the symphony most beautifully. He did not press the music too hard, by trying to make it even more grandiose than it is. His phrasing was extremely supple, which helped to round off or break up the squarish blocks in which the work is patterned, but he did it without stemming the great flow of the music. The performance was both unfussy and sensitive, to which the Bostonians contributed their usual expert playing.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 6 208,349

OCT

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

We should call this Orchestra Week

IF SOMEBODY HAD been alert they would have named this Orchestra Week. No doubt our politicians are so busy running for this or that, such a proclamation never occurred to them.

But the fact is, the next seven days will see opening concerts by each orchestra giving regular series in Providence. This afternoon the Brown University Orchestra performs. On Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its three programs here. And Saturday evening the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra opens its season.

It may seem strange to lump the Brown orchestra with those two more senior groups, even to its music director, Martin Fischer. To do so is not only to make a case for an orchestra week, however, but also because at Brown you hear such imaginative programming. Note the contents of this afternoon's four o'clock concert in Sayles Hall as evidence.

William Steinberg conducts the Bostonian's program, with Theodore Lettvin as piano soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas, named the orchestra's associate conductor at the end of last season, will lead its program of Dec. 10, with violinist Joseph Silverstein the soloist. The third concert on Jan. 28 will be conducted by Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos and will have Christoph Eschenbach performing the Schumann piano concerto.

Then that will be it for the orchestra's 87th season here. It is most interesting that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra cut Providence concerts from five to three hardly a murmur of protest was heard.

There were good reasons for this smaller number. The orchestra has scheduled a European tour next spring and, consequently has reduced the total number of regular performances by 15 or 16. We lost two.

But, there is no assurance its 1971-72 Providence season will return to the former number, either. Audiences have dropped to the point where Boston's management must realistically question the practicality of continuing to come here at a loss.

There are other questions it might ask. Can programs such as Steinberg brings on Thursday to Veterans Auditorium stay attractive forever: Reger's Mozart variations, Rachmaninoff's Paganini variations and Beethoven's seventh symphony?

Well, you should not damn in advance. Performances have a way when they are especially good of negating preconceived notions. But the thing is, excitement from anticipation cannot be ruled out. Reger, Rachmaninoff and Beethoven is not a very exciting combination before the fact.

In the meantime, while Boston's Providence audiences are dwindling, subscription lists for the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra have increased in the past four years. From the 900 to 1,000 it had for most of its history, the number is now approaching 1,500.

Why? No one, including the orchestra's music director, Francis Madeira, claims a performance level equal to Boston, with 89 seasons under its belt. But obviously something has happened. Local pride may be partly an answer. If it is, the Philharmonic's steady improvement over the past several years has to be the larger part.

Saturday evening's concert at Veterans Auditorium, by the way, is the next to last in the orchestra's Beethoven bicentennial celebration. While more Beethoven does not cause waves of excitement in every breast, the prospect of hearing Misha Dichter play the Emperor concerto does stir interest. There is the difference.

All of these points, no matter how you feel about them, add to the amazing sense of change going on. That we have three symphonic programs in so short a period indicates how lively our music scene has become.

* * *

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 19 1970

Symphonic Elegy by Partos Bows Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony gave the first New York performance of Oedoen Partos's "Paths," a symphonic elegy, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. Partos, born and educated in Hungary, is now known as an Israeli composer, having settled in Palestine in 1938. He composed this work for the 1970 Ein Gev Festival, and it is the first piece to have been commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation set up by William Steinberg after the death of his wife. Mr. Steinberg, who is music director of the Boston Symphony, conducted it here.

Partos, who was born in 1903, seems to have attempted to compose in an idiom that is not really congenial to him. He has tried to be up-to-date by using what he describes as aleatoric and post-serial techniques, but the result sounds generally as though he would have been more comfortable and more convincing with traditional themes and developments.

He has produced a kind of assemblage of sounds, some of which hearken back at least as far as Ravel. Unfortunately, they do not add up to much of anything, although they are easy to listen to.

*

PROVIDENCE CONCERT
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of three concerts in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium this evening at 8:30.

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,001
OCT 22 1970

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3475
OCT 22 1970

Brown University Herald
Joseph Sullivan III

Boston Symphony Concert 22 October 1970

The Boston Symphony's Providence Series has long been the pet of the While-you're-up-get-me-a-Grant's set of Providence, right in a league with the United Fund and Planned Parenthood. But the series is in trouble. Subscriptions have been falling off for some years now, mainly because the cultarati don't approve of the "cacophony" The BSO has been serving up of late.

The series now consists of only three concerts. Practically nothing is spent on promotion, because what passes for society in Providence hasn't been able to muster much meaningful support for the ailing series and apparently because the orchestra doesn't really seem anxious to make any trips down 95 to Providence. If you want to be unpopular in Providence, confront the natives with something new; they're liable to run you out of town on a rail. But in this case Providence stands to lose one of its most civilizing influences.

Thursday night's program might indicate, however, that the BSO has had a change of heart. They offered some lush Reger, Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart, some Hollywood Rachmaninoff, Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini, and just to keep things from getting completely out of hand, some tried and true Beethoven, the seventh symphony.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
OCT 31 1970

Bostonians In Concert

NEW YORK — Reminiscent of the old proverb about serving the good wine last, the Boston Symphony's tour de force of its Oct. 16 concert at the Philharmonic Hall, was the second half offering which featured Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7." The Boston now records for Deutsche Grammophon.

It was a brilliant climax to what started off — through no fault of director William Steinberg, or his orchestra — as a rather bland evening. Under Steinberg's baton, the symphony flowed exquisitely from the opening allegro to a triumphant finale.

The first part of the concert, which featured Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" was, though artfully done, somewhat sluggish and uncohesive. The blame for this undoubtedly lies with the composer rather than with the orchestra or its director.

RADCLIFFE JOE

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000
OCT 24 1970

LAST Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony came to town to present the initial concert of its series in Philharmonic Hall. I think I have already pointed out the curious fact that the sound of an orchestra reflects its maestro instead of being something inherent in the orchestra itself, and have said that the Boston Symphony's sound has been completely altered since William Steinberg took over its baton. This new sound is rounder and more robust, with brass instruments using the full, expansive embouchure rather than the delicate, refined one that some other conductors prefer. Certainly the new sound is exactly right for Bruckner symphonies, and Mr. Steinberg presented us with Bruckner's Seventh the other night. I have heard more eloquent performances of this symphony. In fact, I have heard more eloquent performances of it by Mr. Steinberg himself. The air of hushed reverence that should accompany any great Bruckner reading was absent this time, and though no one could fault the performance on technical grounds, it did not reach the mystical heights that this great symphony is capable of attaining. About the symphony itself I shall say nothing; I have already written so much about it.

The evening was an interesting one for another reason. Mr. Steinberg brought along the first performance I have heard in many years of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart. While it is not a work of overwhelming power (Reger wrote a great deal of dull music; this composition stands high among his others), it is still worth listening to. Reger was, among other things, a great orchestrator, and his last variation before the fugue is a wonderfully delicate statement, and it was wonderfully played by the orchestra. This work, along with Reger's Hiller Variations and Böcklin Suite, was popular hereabouts way back in the time of Mengelberg. Maybe these last two compositions would be worth a revival, too.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
JAN 1971

Boston Symphony (Steinberg)
The first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony (October 14 at Philharmonic Hall) found William Steinberg back in command of his second orchestra after his extended absence last year due to illness. The two dishes he served up for the occasion were heavy German fare, with the indigestible potato dumpling being the Mozart Variations of Max Reger. Written at the end of Reger's life in 1914, the Mozart Variations have the reputation of being more sprightly than his usual work, but the sprightliness, if it exists, exists only in contrast. They are heavy, ponderous, and thick, afflicted with phrase constipation and metrical stultification, not to mention lack of any real variational ideas. They do not add up, the way all fine nineteenth-century variations do—Brahms in particular—to a sum greater than the parts, and indeed the final double fugue, which should be outstanding simply by virtue of Reger's reputation as a contrapuntalist, is a feeble and obvious exercise which Benjamin Britten managed far better in his Young People's Guide to the Orchestra.

The second part of the program, Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, is a far better example of late German romanticism, and one better played by the orchestra. Steinberg's way with Bruckner is not to exaggerate anything, but to let it unfold itself. Given the class of his players, what emerges is a very beautiful statement of the work, but one without any special character: a sort of emotional neutrality. There was something else, however, that the Bruckner performance brought out, which was the apprehension of a distance between the orchestra and its music director. Undoubtedly Steinberg's absences have prevented the development of a working relationship between him and his men, for he still sounds like a guest conductor. The Boston Symphony, for all its magnificence, is still not Steinberg's orchestra in the way that it was Koussevitsky's, Munch's, and even Leinsdorf's.

PATRICK J. SMITH

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 19 1970

Symphonic Elegy by Partos Bows Here

It was a pleasure to watch Mr Steinberg conduct. Mr. Steinberg has great dignity, a refreshing economy of motion and just the right touch of crotchetiness. He brought to the Reger a perfect combination of remembered suffering and schmaltzy lyricism without letting it sound like inspired Dimitri Tiompkin. Reger is one of those composers who admires complexity for its own sake: he would rather take ten minutes to say something that would have been overstated in two. Perhaps a little editing might be in order in his Mozart Variations.

The Rachmaninoff was especially exciting. In the hands of Theodore Lettvin, pianist, and Mr. Steinberg the Rhapsody took on the quality of a totentanz. It was not, Mr. Lettvin said, the way they had rehearsed the piece, but with two such thorough professionals at work the result was striking. Mr. Lettvin is a superb artist, at once romantic, devilish, serious and blithe. We should hear more of his seemingly effortless virtuosity.

We should, however, hear less of Beethoven's Seventh. Even Mr. Steinberg couldn't breathe much life into this all too familiar piece. Give me some new "cacophony" any day.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000
OCT 24 1970

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
OCT 31 1970

Bostonians In Concert

NEW YORK — Reminiscent of the old proverb about serving the good wine last, the Boston Symphony's tour de force of its Oct. 16 concert at the Philharmonic Hall, was the second half offering which featured Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7." The Boston now records for Deutsche Grammophon.

It was a brilliant climax to what started off — through no fault of director William Steinberg, or his orchestra — as a rather bland evening. Under Steinberg's baton, the symphony flowed exquisitely from the opening allegro to a triumphant finale.

The first part of the concert, which featured Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" was, though artfully done, somewhat sluggish and uncohesive. The blame for this undoubtedly lies with the composer rather than with the orchestra or its director.

RADCLIFFE JOE

LAST Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony came to town to present the initial concert of its series in Philharmonic Hall. I think I have already pointed out the curious fact that the sound of an orchestra reflects its maestro instead of being something inherent in the orchestra itself, and have said that the Boston Symphony's sound has been completely altered since William Steinberg took over its baton. This new sound is rounder and more robust, with brass instruments using the full, expansive embouchure rather than the delicate, refined one that some other conductors prefer. Certainly the new sound is exactly right for Bruckner symphonies, and Mr. Steinberg presented us with Bruckner's Seventh the other night. I have heard more eloquent performances of this symphony. In fact, I have heard more eloquent performances of it by Mr. Steinberg himself. The air of hushed reverence that should accompany any great Bruckner reading was absent this time, and though no one could fault the performance on technical grounds, it did not reach the mystical heights that this great symphony is capable of attaining. About the symphony itself I shall say nothing; I have already written so much about it.

The evening was an interesting one for another reason. Mr. Steinberg brought along the first performance I have heard in many years of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart. While it is not a work of overwhelming power (Reger wrote a great deal of dull music; this composition stands high among his others), it is still worth listening to. Reger was, among other things, a great orchestrator, and his last variation before the fugue is a wonderfully delicate statement, and it was wonderfully played by the orchestra. This work, along with Reger's Hiller Variations and Böcklin Suite, was popular hereabouts way back in the time of Mengelberg. Maybe these last two compositions would be worth a revival, too.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
JAN 1971

Boston Symphony (Steinberg)

The first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony (October 14 at Philharmonic Hall) found William Steinberg back in command of his second orchestra after his extended absence last year due to illness. The two dishes he served up for the occasion were heavy German fare, with the indigestible potato dumpling being the Mozart Variations of Max Reger. Written at the end of Reger's life in 1914, the Mozart Variations have the reputation of being more sprightly than his usual work, but the sprightliness, if it exists, exists only in contrast. They are heavy, ponderous, and thick, afflicted with phrase constipation and metrical stultification, not to mention lack of any real variational ideas. They do not add up, the way all fine nineteenth-century variations do—Brahms in particular—to a sum greater than the parts, and indeed the final double fugue, which should be outstanding simply by virtue of Reger's reputation as a contrapuntalist, is a feeble and obvious exercise which Benjamin Britten managed far better in his Young People's Guide to the Orchestra.

The second part of the program, Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, is a far better example of late German romanticism, and one better played by the orchestra. Steinberg's way with Bruckner is not to exaggerate anything, but to let it unfold itself. Given the class of his players, what emerges is a very beautiful statement of the work, but one without any special character: a sort of emotional neutrality. There was something else, however, that the Bruckner performance brought out, which was the apprehension of a distance between the orchestra and its music director. Undoubtedly Steinberg's absences have prevented the development of a working relationship between him and his men, for he still sounds like a guest conductor. The Boston Symphony, for all its magnificence, is still not Steinberg's orchestra in the way that it was Koussevitsky's, Munch's, and even Leinsdorf's.

PATRICK J. SMITH

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 19 1970

Symphonic Elegy by Partos Bows Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony gave the first New York performance of Oedoen Partos's "Paths," a symphonic elegy, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. Partos, born and educated in Hungary, is now known as an Israeli composer, having settled in Palestine in 1938. He composed this work for the 1970 Ein Gev Festival, and it is the first piece to have been commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation set up by William Steinberg after the death of his wife. Mr. Steinberg, who is music director of the Boston Symphony, conducted it here.

Partos, who was born in 1903, seems to have attempted to compose in an idiom that is not really congenial to him. He has tried to be up-to-date by using what he describes as aleatoric and post-serial techniques, but the result sounds generally as though he would have been more comfortable and more convincing with traditional themes and developments.

He has produced a kind of assemblage of sounds, some of which hearken back at least as far as Ravel. Unfortunately, they do not add up to much of anything, although they are easy to listen to.

*

PROVIDENCE CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of three concerts in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium this evening at 8:30.

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,031
OCT 22 1970

CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 31,7[illegible]
OCT 22 1970

Brown University Herald
Joseph Sullivan III

Boston Symphony Concert 22 October 1970

The Boston Symphony's Providence Series has long been the pet of the While-you're-up-get-me-a-Grant's set of Providence, right in a league with the United Fund and Planned Parenthood. But the series is in trouble. Subscriptions have been falling off for some years now, mainly because the cultarati don't approve of the "cacophony" The BSO has been serving up of late.

The series now consists of only three concerts. Practically nothing is spent on promotion, because what passes for society in Providence hasn't been able to muster much meaningful support for the ailing series and apparently because the orchestra doesn't really seem anxious to make any trips down 95 to Providence. If you want to be unpopular in Providence, confront the natives with something new; they're liable to run you out of town on a rail. But in this case Providence stands to lose one of its most civilizing influences.

Thursday night's program might indicate, however, that the BSO has had a change of heart. They offered some lush Reger, Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart, some Hollywood Rachmaninoff, Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini, and just to keep things from getting completely out of hand, some tried and true Beethoven, the seventh symphony.

BULLETIN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,0[illegible]
OCT 2[illegible] 1970

Bostonians In Concert

NEW YORK — Reminiscent of the old proverb about serving the good wine last, the Boston Symphony's tour de force of its Oct. 16 concert at the Philharmonic Hall, was the second half offering which featured Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7." The Boston now records for Deutsche Grammophon.

It was a brilliant climax to what started off — through no fault of director William Steinberg, or his orchestra — as a rather bland evening. Under Steinberg's baton, the symphony flowed exquisitely from the opening allegro to a triumphant finale.

The first part of the concert, which featured Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" was, though artfully done, somewhat sluggish and uncohesive. The blame for this undoubtedly lies with the composer rather than with the orchestra or its director.

RADCLIFFE JOE

LAST Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony came to town to present the initial concert of its series in Philharmonic Hall. I think I have already pointed out the curious fact that the sound of an orchestra reflects its maestro instead of being something inherent in the orchestra itself, and have said that the Boston Symphony's sound has been completely altered since William Steinberg took over its baton. This new sound is rounder and more robust, with brass instruments using the full, expansive embouchure rather than the delicate, refined one that some other conductors prefer. Certainly the new sound is exactly right for Bruckner symphonies, and Mr. Steinberg presented us with Bruckner's Seventh the other night. I have heard more eloquent performances of this symphony. In fact, I have heard more eloquent performances of it by Mr. Steinberg himself. The air of hushed reverence that should accompany any great Bruckner reading was absent this time, and though no one could fault the performance on technical grounds, it did not reach the mystical heights that this great symphony is capable of attaining. About the symphony itself I shall say nothing; I have already written so much about it.

The evening was an interesting one for another reason. Mr. Steinberg brought along the first performance I have heard in many years of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart. While it is not a work of overwhelming power (Reger wrote a great deal of dull music; this composition stands high among his others), it is still worth listening to. Reger was, among other things, a great orchestrator, and his last variation before the fugue is a wonderfully delicate statement, and it was wonderfully played by the orchestra. This work, along with Reger's Hiller Variations and Böcklin Suite, was popular hereabouts way back in the time of Mengelberg. Maybe these last two compositions would be worth a revival, too.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 17,0[illegible]
OCT 24 1970

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 1[illegible]
JAN 1971

Boston Symphony (Steinberg)

The first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony (October 14 at Philharmonic Hall) found William Steinberg back in command of his second orchestra after his extended absence last year due to illness. The two dishes he served up for the occasion were heavy German fare, with the indigestible potato dumpling being the Mozart Variations of Max Reger. Written at the end of Reger's life in 1914, the Mozart Variations have the reputation of being more sprightly than his usual work, but the sprightliness, if it exists, exists only in contrast. They are heavy, ponderous, and thick, afflicted with phrase constipation and metrical stultification, not to mention lack of any real variational ideas. They do not add up, the way all fine nineteenth-century variations do—Brahms in particular—to a sum greater than the parts, and indeed the final double fugue, which should be outstanding simply by virtue of Reger's reputation as a contrapuntalist, is a feeble and obvious exercise which Benjamin Britten managed far better in his Young People's Guide to the Orchestra.

The second part of the program, Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, is a far better example of late German romanticism, and one better played by the orchestra. Steinberg's way with Bruckner is not to exaggerate anything, but to let it unfold itself. Given the class of his players, what emerges is a very beautiful statement of the work, but one without any special character: a sort of emotional neutrality. There was something else, however, that the Bruckner performance brought out, which was the apprehension of a distance between the orchestra and its music director. Undoubtedly Steinberg's absences have prevented the development of a working relationship between him and his men, for he still sounds like a guest conductor. The Boston Symphony, for all its magnificence, is still not Steinberg's orchestra in the way that it was Koussevitsky's, Munch's, and even Leinsdorf's.

PATRICK J. SMITH

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 19 1970

Symphonic Elegy by Partos Bows Here

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony gave the first New York performance of Oedoen Partos's "Paths," a symphonic elegy, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. Partos, born and educated in Hungary, is now known as an Israeli composer, having settled in Palestine in 1938. He composed this work for the 1970 Ein Gev Festival, and it is the first piece to have been commissioned by the Lotti Steinberg Memorial Foundation set up by William Steinberg after the death of his wife. Mr. Steinberg, who is music director of the Boston Symphony, conducted it here.

Partos, who was born in 1903, seems to have attempted to compose in an idiom that is not really congenial to him. He has tried to be up-to-date by using what he describes as aleatoric and post-serial techniques, but the result sounds generally as though he would have been more comfortable and more convincing with traditional themes and developments.

He has produced a kind of assemblage of sounds, some of which hearken back at least as far as Ravel. Unfortunately, they do not add up to much of anything, although they are easy to listen to.

*

PROVIDENCE CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of three concerts in Providence at Veteran's Memorial Auditorium this evening at 8:30.

BULLETIN
NO. EASTON, MASS.
WEEKLY
OCT 22 1970
CHRONICLE
STOUGHTON, MASS.
WEEKLY
OCT 2 1970

Brown University Herald
Joseph Sullivan III

Boston Symphony Concert 22 October 1970

The Boston Symphony's Providence Series has long been the pet of the While-you're-up-get-me-a-Grant's set of Providence, right in a league with the United Fund and Planned Parenthood. But the series is in trouble. Subscriptions have been falling off for some years now, mainly because the cultarati don't approve of the "cacophony" the BSO has been serving up of late.

The series now consists of only three concerts. Practically nothing is spent on promotion, because what passes for society in Providence hasn't been able to muster much meaningful support for the ailing series and apparently because the orchestra doesn't really seem anxious to make any trips down 95 to Providence. If you want to be unpopular in Providence, confront the natives with something new; they're liable to run you out of town on a rail. But in this case Providence stands to lose one of its most civilizing influences.

Thursday night's program might indicate, however, that the BSO has had a change of heart. They offered some lush Reger, Variations and Fugue on a theme by Mozart, some Hollywood Rachmaninoff, Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini, and just to keep things from getting completely out of hand, some tried and true Beethoven, the seventh symphony.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 24 1970

Bostonians In Concert

NEW YORK — Reminiscent of the old proverb about serving the good wine last, the Boston Symphony's tour de force of its Oct. 16 concert at the Philharmonic Hall, was the second half offering which featured Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7." The Boston now records for Deutsche Grammophon.

It was a brilliant climax to what started off — through no fault of director William Steinberg, or his orchestra — as a rather bland evening. Under Steinberg's baton, the symphony flowed exquisitely from the opening allegro to a triumphant finale.

The first part of the concert, which featured Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart" was, though artfully done, somewhat sluggish and uncohesive. The blame for this undoubtedly lies with the composer rather than with the orchestra or its director.

RADCLIFFE JOE

LAST Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony came to town to present the initial concert of its series in Philharmonic Hall. I think I have already pointed out the curious fact that the sound of an orchestra reflects its maestro instead of being something inherent in the orchestra itself, and have said that the Boston Symphony's sound has been completely altered since William Steinberg took over its baton. This new sound is rounder and more robust, with brass instruments using the full, expansive embouchure rather than the delicate, refined one that some other conductors prefer. Certainly the new sound is exactly right for Bruckner symphonies, and Mr. Steinberg presented us with Bruckner's Seventh the other night. I have heard more eloquent performances of this symphony. In fact, I have heard more eloquent performances of it by Mr. Steinberg himself. The air of hushed reverence that should accompany any great Bruckner reading was absent this time, and though no one could fault the performance on technical grounds, it did not reach the mystical heights that this great symphony is capable of attaining. About the symphony itself I shall say nothing; I have already written so much about it.

The evening was an interesting one for another reason. Mr. Steinberg brought along the first performance I have heard in many years of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart. While it is not a work of overwhelming power (Reger wrote a great deal of dull music; this composition stands high among his others), it is still worth listening to. Reger was, among other things, a great orchestrator, and his last variation before the fugue is a wonderfully delicate statement, and it was wonderfully played by the orchestra. This work, along with Reger's Hiller Variations and Böcklin Suite, was popular hereabouts way back in the time of Mengelberg. Maybe these last two compositions would be worth a revival, too.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY
JAN 1971

Boston Symphony (Steinberg)

The first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony (October 14 at Philharmonic Hall) found William Steinberg back in command of his second orchestra after his extended absence last year due to illness. The two dishes he served up for the occasion were heavy German fare, with the indigestible potato dumpling being the Mozart Variations of Max Reger. Written at the end of Reger's life in 1914, the Mozart Variations have the reputation of being more sprightly than his usual work, but the sprightliness, if it exists, exists only in contrast. They are heavy, ponderous, and thick, afflicted with phrase constipation and metrical stultification, not to mention lack of any real variational ideas. They do not add up, the way all fine nineteenth-century variations do—Brahms in particular—to a sum greater than the parts, and indeed the final double fugue, which should be outstanding simply by virtue of Reger's reputation as a contrapuntalist, is a feeble and obvious exercise which Benjamin Britten managed far better in his Young People's Guide to the Orchestra.

The second part of the program, Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, is a far better example of late German romanticism, and one better played by the orchestra. Steinberg's way with Bruckner is not to exaggerate anything, but to let it unfold itself. Given the class of his players, what emerges is a very beautiful statement of the work, but one without any special character: a sort of emotional neutrality. There was something else, however, that the Bruckner performance brought out, which was the apprehension of a distance between the orchestra and its music director. Undoubtedly Steinberg's absences have prevented the development of a working relationship between him and his men, for he still sounds like a guest conductor. The Boston Symphony, for all its magnificence, is still not Steinberg's orchestra in the way that it was Koussevitsky's, Munch's, and even Leinsdorf's.

PATRICK J. SMITH

26

SEIJI OZAWA

Boston Symphony Appears Tuesday At Woolsey Hall

The Boston Symphony makes its only New Haven appearance this season with guest conductor Seiji Ozawa Tuesday in Woolsey Hall at 8:30 p.m. Ozawa is music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Born in Manchuria in 1935, the colorful Japanese conductor received a Koussevitsky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. In 1961 he was appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors. Later he became music director of the Toronto Symphony.

Ozawa has chosen a varied program for his first local appearance. The concert opens with Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-mid d'un faune. The Prokofiev "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C, opus 26" with the Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini follows. The 28-year-old Pollini won the Warsaw Chopin Competition when he was only 18. He first appeared in the United States in 1969 and made his debut with the Boston Symphony earlier this month. The Tchaikovsky "Symphony No. 6 in B minor" ends the program.

The Woolsey Hall box office opens at 7:30 on concert night.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125
NOV 16 1970

At The Concert

Ozawa And The Boston

The Boston Symphony gave another crowd-pleasing concert Tuesday evening in Woolsey Hall, a triumph which must be shared by the orchestra with a young pianist and a guest conductor. It might have been "International Night." The featured work of the first half was the "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C, op. 26" by the Russian Prokofiev, played marvelously by an Italian pianist, Maurizio Pollini, with Japan's rising conducting star, Seiji Ozawa leading the American orchestra. All went well with the concerto, which is, by the way, one of the masterpieces of this century.

Prokofiev has fashioned a near-perfect concerto, one which features the piano without allowing it to rise out of the orchestral context; a concerto which is full of romantic drama and fire, yet often classical in its formal restraints. It contains the best of both worlds, being both exciting to hear on the emotional level and sensible, or perhaps one should say, artistic in purely musical terms. In short, it is a concerto which sustains interest and pleasure through many hearings.

* * *

To be honest, the virtuosity of the young Pollini was somewhat overshadowed by the dynamism of Ozawa. Pollini seemed more than up to the demands of the concerto, playing strongly, cleanly, and with confidence. It was simply that we had not previously seen Ozawa, certainly not in front of the Boston Symphony, and the temptation to watch him was just too great. It should be noted that as a tribute to all involved, the audience interrupted at the first opportunity with resounding applause, and repeated the gesture at the conclusion of the concerto. That one piece made the concert worth attending.

Following intermission came one of the "chestnuts" which the Boston musicians always seem to offer New Haven audiences, Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B minor," the "Pathetique." During most of the first movement I pondered this practice, consoling myself with memories of the Prokofiev. It seemed that Ozawa was exaggerating the extremes; the slow passages were too slow, the loud ones, too loud, and the fast ones, too fast. He was oversentimentalizing. But then things began to happen. Solo lines were sharply etched and were played perfectly. The second movement was extremely graceful as Ozawa performed his lyric ballet on the podium. The third movement was faster than a Tchaikovsky purist would like (if there is such a thing as a Tchaikovsky purist), but it was exciting and drew immediate applause at its conclusion. And the final movement seemed amply tragic, but within the bounds of 19th century taste. The total effect was one of great success, of high drama and involvement, and I had the thought that it was worth hearing the "Pathetique" if it can be played this well.

The powerful concerto and symphony vastly overshadowed the subtle "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy which opened the concert. This was charming although Miss Dwyer's flute tone is too tremulous for my taste.

* * *

With all due respect to pianist Pollini, it was Ozawa's night. This young, slight, almost delicate conductor has a long ascending future before him. He conducts with grace, with a full sweep of the arm which belies his modest stature. His beat is sure and legible, and his exaggerations can be explained away. He is still gaining experience and he was fronting an orchestra which is easily led into exaggerated expression (Roger Voisan is not a reticent trumpeter). Ozawa is a welcome addition to the depleted ranks of top flight conductors; he is a fine musician, he is skilled and he has a personal magnetism pleasing to audiences.

—Harmon Diers

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 12
NOV 18 1970

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600
NOV 20 1970

BOSTONIANS BRING OZAWA AS LEADER

Guest Conductor at Best in Brief Copland Piece

By RAYMOND ERICSON

At the ripe age of 35, Seiji Ozawa seems to be settling down as a conductor, a bit less so as a program builder. He was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. The concert ended with a staple of sorts, Berlioz's "Symphonie fantastique," but it was preceded by Aaron Copland's Short Symphony, played in honor of the composer's 70th birthday—the actual date was last Saturday—and Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospréres."

It was an interesting juxtaposition of works. Copland's symphony, completed in 1933 just about a century after the Berlioz, was a much better organized piece than its predecessor, yet one that did not sound nearly as original. One might have expected the opposite to be true.

Copland's work is indeed short, lasting 15 minutes. It is compact, constantly growing organically within its span. There is nothing unusual in the scoring. Its complicated rhythms made it difficult to perform at the time it was written, but today it has the virtue of seeming homogeneously and beautifully made, and therefore durable.

Berlioz's symphony, almost epic in size and conception, has its loose-jointed movements, yet its romantic symbolism, its poetic atmosphere and, above all, its striking orchestral effects still generate a visceral excitement.

Ligeti's "Atmospheres," a mere nine years old, seems bland by contrast. It is picturesque in its tonal combinations, but insubstantial, and it is not surprising that it turned up in part as background music to the film "2001: A Space Odyssey." That is where it belongs.

Mr. Ozawa's conducting was honest, even literal, not as flamboyant as has been in the past. He was comfortable in the Copland and Ligeti music, managing the tricky rhythms handily. The performance of the Berlioz was carefully observant of the composer's markings. It had the added strength of smooth tempo transitions and the sustained tension within movements that mark the naturally gifted musician. Unsurprisingly, it was beautifully and excitingly played by the Bostonians.

CRITIC AT LARGE by Byron Belt NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS 19 November 1970

Sophistication, Delirium and '2001'

American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sounds of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Byron Belt

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's Short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie fanstastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the audience in the auditorium. *Sorry!

The Copland Short Symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Ligeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001." While the Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was also used as background music, only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly spatial and other-world composition.

The Hungarian-born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Penderecki and Xenakis, but there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessible to listeners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sounds that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and like that great unknown his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated Friday at 8 p.m.

MUSIC NOTES: We cannot let the Leopold Stokowski performance of the Charles Ives 4th Symphony Sunday and Tuesday pass without notice. With his American Symphony Orchestra in splendid form, the Maestro revived his own magnificent conception of this greatest of all Ives masterpieces. In absolute command of the complex musical forces involved, Stokowski demonstrated once again that he and the American Symphony are among the area's most important artistic forces.

Happily the Fourth is available on Columbia Records in the distinctive Stokowski interpretation, for it is a score both demanding and worthy of intensive study. The Maestro coupled the Ives with Henry Cowell's attractive Largo and Allegro and a far from perfect "Also sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss in which the organ, and concertmistress were particularly distressing.

Jascha Silberstein, solo cellist of the Metropolitan Opera, contributed technically flawed but winning performance of David Popper's flamboyant Opus 24 Concerto for Cello and Orchestra. The Romantic Revival cannot stand too many works of this insipid caliber.

* * *

ON THE same high level as the Stokowski Ives and Cowell was the entire Carnegie Recital Hall program offered by flutist Karl Kraber. A steller member of the celebrated Dorian Woodwind Quintet, Mr. Kraber played a lengthy recital of music by Bach, Couperin, Bach's son K.P.E. Bach and contemporary works by Paul Hindemith, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Gregory Tucker and Jean-Michel Damase.

During Tucker's attractive "Merwan Songs" for Alto Flute and Piano (a New York premiere,) a fuse blew. It was a fitting commentary on the superb virtuoso performances and musical interpretations of Mr. Kraber and his expert associates, Edward Smith, Fred Sherry and Gilbert Kalish.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350
NOV 18 1970

Boston Symphony Excites Woolsey Audience

A young, virtuoso pianist, a youthful conductor and an inspired Boston Symphony Orchestra brought exciting music to those who packed Woolsey Hall Tuesday night on the occasion of the second concert in the Woolsey series.

Under Seiji Ozawa, the 35-year-old conductor who has had a fantastic career throughout the world, the Boston gave out with a new sound Tuesday. The program opened with Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun" which Ozawa read with extraordinary sensitivity so that the delightful fantasy of a dream world came to exquisite life. The delicate theme for the flute, the woodwind chords and the accents by the horns and harp combined to set the stage for the faun's exotic dream. As the work progressed there was the interesting dialogue bewteen the oboe and clarinet and finally the beautiful cello solo joining again with the flute for the colorful ending.

Music In Review

Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3, in C major" brought to New Haven the young Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini, who, at 28, has just made his debut with the Boston Symphony after a distinguished career with leading European and American orchestras.

His dazzling performance in the dramatic concerto, most famous of Prokofiev's five works of this kind, earned him several recalls. Aside from Pollini's virtuoso work, the first movement will also be remembered for the haunting work by the oboe with pizzicato accompaniment and the exciting crescendo as the movement ends. The five variations of the second movement gave Pollini an opportunity to exhibit his fine technique, not only in the sentimental areas of the first variation but in the brilliant figuration which followed for the piano while the orchestra provided snatches of the lovely theme as background. The flashy, brilliant coda which brings the work to a climax following a staccato theme for bassoons and pizzicati strings, brought the audience to its collective feet amid shouts of "bravo."

FLORENCE JOHNSON

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000
NOV 14 1970

CARNEGIE HALL

Sun., Nov. 15: 2:30 p.m., The Antranig Song & Dance Ensemble; 8:30 p.m.: Jan Peerce, tenor, Sergiu Luca, violin, in a benefit concert; Tues., Nov. 17, 8:30 p.m.: David Gilbert conducts National Orchestral Association in works of Mozart, Jonel Perlea, Webern, Debussy; Wed., Nov. 18, 8:30 p.m.: Eugene Istomin, Isaac Stern, Leonard Rose Trio playing works of Beethoven; Thurs., Nov. 19, 8 p.m.: Vic Damone, popular singer, Pat Henry, comedian; Sat., Nov. 21, 8:30 p.m.: Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Debussy, Prokofieff, William Schuman. Maurizio Pollini, piano. Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th St., 247-7459

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000
NOV 14 1970

PHILHARMONIC HALL

Sun., Nov. 15: 2:30 p.m., American Symphony conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Jascha Silberstein, cello, American Symphony Chorus; 7 p.m., Opera on Film: Don Giovanni; Mon., Nov. 16, 7:30 p.m.: Milton Katims conducts N. Y. Philharmonic in works of Beethoven and Prokofiev, Gina Bachauer, pianist; Tues., Nov. 17, 8:30 p.m.: (Repeat of Nov. 15 program.); Wed., Nov. 18, 8:30 p.m.: William Steinberg conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra; Thurs., Nov. 19, 8:30 p.m.: Robert Shaw conducts N. Y. Philharmonic in all Brahms program with chorus and soloists; Fri., Nov. 20; 2 p.m., N. Y. Philharmonic (repeat of Nov. 19 program): 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra (repeat of Nov. 18 program); Sat., Nov. 21: 11 a.m. and 3 p.m., Thomas Scherman conducts the Little Orchestra Society in a concert for young people; 8:30 p.m., N. Y. Philharmonic (repeat of Nov. 19 program). Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, B'way at 65th St., 874-2424

26

SEIJI OZAWA

Boston Symphony Appears Tuesday At Woolsey Hall

The Boston Symphony makes its only New Haven appearance this season with guest conductor Seiji Ozawa Tuesday in Woolsey Hall at 8:30 p.m. Ozawa is music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Born in Manchuria in 1935, the colorful Japanese conductor received a Koussevitsky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. In 1961 he was appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors. Later he became music director of the Toronto Symphony.

Ozawa has chosen a varied program for his first local appearance. The concert opens with Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-mid d'un faune. The Prokofiev "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C, opus 26" with the Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini follows. The 28-year-old Pollini won the Warsaw Chopin Competition when he was only 18. He first appeared in the United States in 1969 and made his debut with the Boston Symphony earlier this month. The Tchaikovsky "Symphony No. 6 in B minor" ends the program.

The Woolsey Hall box office opens at 7:30 on concert night.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125

NOV 16 1970

At The Concert

Ozawa And The Boston

The Boston Symphony gave another crowd-pleasing concert Tuesday evening in Woolsey Hall, a triumph which must be shared by the orchestra with a young pianist and a guest conductor. It might have been "International Night." The featured work of the first half was the "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C, op. 26" by the Russian Prokofiev, played marvelously by an Italian pianist, Maurizio Pollini, with Japan's rising conducting star, Seiji Ozawa leading the American orchestra. All went well with the concerto, which is, by the way, one of the masterpieces of this century.

Prokofiev has fashioned a near-perfect concerto, one which features the piano without allowing it to rise out of the orchestral context; a concerto which is full of romantic drama and fire, yet often classical in its formal restraints. It contains the best of both worlds, being both exciting to hear on the emotional level and sensible, or perhaps one should say, artistic in purely musical terms. In short, it is a concerto which sustains interest and pleasure through many hearings.

* * *

To be honest, the virtuosity of the young Pollini was somewhat overshadowed by the dynamism of Ozawa. Pollini seemed more than up to the demands of the concerto, playing strongly, cleanly, and with confidence. It was simply that we had not previously seen Ozawa, certainly not in front of the Boston Symphony, and the temptation to watch him was just too great. It should be noted that as a tribute to all involved, the audience interrupted at the first opportunity with resounding applause, and repeated the gesture at the conclusion of the concerto. That one piece made the concert worth attending.

Following intermission came one of the "chestnuts" which the Boston musicians always seem to offer New Haven audiences, Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B minor," the "Pathetique." During most of the first movement I pondered this practice, consoling myself with memories of the Prokofiev. It seemed that Ozawa was exaggerating the extremes; the slow passages were too slow, the loud ones, too loud, and the fast ones, too fast. He was oversentimentalizing. But then things began to happen. Solo lines were sharply etched and were played perfectly. The second movement was extremely graceful as Ozawa performed his lyric ballet on the podium. The third movement was faster than a Tchaikovsky purist would like (if there is such a thing as a Tchaikovsky purist), but it was exciting and drew immediate applause at its conclusion. And the final movement seemed amply tragic, but within the bounds of 19th century taste. The total effect was one of great success, of high drama and involvement, and I had the thought that it was worth hearing the "Pathetique" if it can be played this well.

The powerful concerto and symphony vastly overshadowed the subtle "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy which opened the concert. This was charming although Miss Dwyer's flute tone is too tremulous for my taste.

* * *

With all due respect to pianist Pollini, it was Ozawa's night. This young, slight, almost delicate conductor has a long ascending future before him. He conducts with grace, with a full sweep of the arm which belies his modest stature. His beat is sure and legible, and his exaggerations can be explained away. He is still gaining experience and he was fronting an orchestra which is easily led into exaggerated expression (Roger Voisan is not a reticent trumpeter). Ozawa is a welcome addition to the depleted ranks of top flight conductors; he is a fine musician, he is skilled and he has a personal magnetism pleasing to audiences.

—Harmon Diers

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 12

NOV 18 1970

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 850,000

NOV 20 1970

BOSTONIANS BRING OZAWA AS LEADER

Guest Conductor at Best in Brief Copland Piece

By RAYMOND ERICSON

At the ripe age of 35, Seiji Ozawa seems to be settling down as a conductor, a bit less so as a program builder. He was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night. The concert ended with a staple of sorts, Berlioz's "Symphonie fantastique," but it was preceded by Aaron Copland's Short Symphony, played in honor of the composer's 70th birthday—the actual date was last Saturday—and Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospréres."

It was an interesting juxtaposition of works. Copland's symphony, completed in 1933 just about a century after the Berlioz, was a much better organized piece than its predecessor, yet one that did not sound nearly as original. One might have expected the opposite to be true.

Copland's work is indeed short, lasting 15 minutes. It is compact, constantly growing organically within its span. There is nothing unusual in the scoring. Its complicated rhythms made it difficult to perform at the time it was written, but today it has the virtue of seeming homogeneously and beautifully made, and therefore durable.

Berlioz's symphony, almost epic in size and conception, has its loose-jointed movements, yet its romantic symbolism, its poetic atmosphere and, above all, its striking orchestral effects still generate a visceral excitement.

Ligeti's "Atmosphéres," a mere nine years old, seems bland by contrast. It is picturesque in its tonal combinations, but insubstantial, and it is not surprising that it turned up in part as background music to the film "2001: A Space Odyssey." That is where it belongs.

Mr. Ozawa's conducting was honest, even literal, not as flamboyant as has been in the past. He was comfortable in the Copland and Ligeti music, managing the tricky rhythms handily. The performance of the Berlioz was carefully observant of the composer's markings. It had the added strength of smooth tempo transitions and the sustained tension within movements that mark the naturally gifted musician. Unsurprisingly, it was beautifully and excitingly played by the Bostonians.

CRITIC AT LARGE by Byron Belt

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS 19 November 1970

Sophistication, Delirium and '2001'

American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sounds of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Byron Belt

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's Short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie fanstastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the audience in the auditorium. Sorry!

The Copland Short Symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Ligeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001." While the Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was also used as background music, only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly spatial and other-world composition.

The Hungarian-born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Penderecki and Xenakis, but there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessible to listeners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sounds that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and like that great unknown his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated Friday at 8 p.m.

MUSIC NOTES: We cannot let the Leopold Stokowski performance of the Charles Ives 4th Symphony Sunday and Tuesday pass without notice. With his American Symphony Orchestra in splendid form, the Maestro revived his own magnificent conception of this greatest of all Ives masterpieces. In absolute command of the complex musical forces involved, Stokowski demonstrated once again that he and the American Symphony are among the area's most important artistic forces.

Happily the Fourth is available on Columbia Records in the distinctive Stokowski interpretation, for it is a score both demanding and worthy of intensive study. The Maestro coupled the Ives with Henry Cowell's attractive Largo and Allegro and a far from perfect "Also sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss in which the organ, and concertmistress were particularly distressing.

Jascha Silberstein, solo cellist of the Metropolitan Opera, contributed technically flawed but winning performance of David Popper's flamboyant Opus 24 Concerto for Cello and Orchestra. The Romantic Revival cannot stand too many works of this insipid caliber.

* * *

ON THE same high level as the Stokowski Ives and Cowell was the entire Carnegie Recital Hall program offered by flutist Karl Kraber. A steller member of the celebrated Dorian Woodwind Quintet, Mr. Kraber played a lengthy recital of music by Bach, Couperin, Bach's son K.P.E. Bach and contemporary works by Paul Hindemith, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Gregory Tucker and Jean-Michel Damase.

During Tucker's attractive "Merwan Songs" for Alto Flute and Piano (a New York premiere,) a fuse blew. It was a fitting commentary on the superb virtuoso performances and musical interpretations of Mr. Kraber and his expert associates, Edward Smith, Fred Sherry and Gilbert Kalish.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350

NOV 18 1970

Boston Symphony Excites Woolsey Audience

A young, virtuoso pianist, a youthful conductor and an inspired Boston Symphony Orchestra brought exciting music to those who packed Woolsey Hall Tuesday night on the occasion of the second concert in the Woolsey series.

Under Seiji Ozawa, the 35-year-old conductor who has had a fantastic career throughout the world, the Boston gave out with a new sound Tuesday. The program opened with Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun" which Ozawa read with extraordinary sensitivity so that the delightful fantasy of a dream world came to exquisite life. The delicate theme for the flute, the woodwind chords and the accents by the horns and harp combined to set the stage for the faun's exotic dream. As the work progressed there was the interesting dialogue bewteen the oboe and clarinet and finally the beautiful cello solo joining again with the flute for the colorful ending.

Music In Review

Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3, in C major" brought to New Haven the young Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini, who, at 28, has just made his debut with the Boston Symphony after a distinguished career with leading European and American orchestras.

His dazzling performance in the dramatic concerto, most famous of Prokofiev's five works of this kind, earned him several recalls. Aside from Pollini's virtuoso work, the first movement will also be remembered for the haunting work by the oboe with pizzicato accompaniment and the exciting crescendo as the movement ends. The five variations of the second movement gave Pollini an opportunity to exhibit his fine technique, not only in the sentimental areas of the first variation but in the brilliant figuration which followed for the piano while the orchestra provided snatches of the lovely theme as background. The flashy, brilliant coda which brings the work to a climax following a staccato theme for bassoons and pizzicati strings, brought the audience to its collective feet amid shouts of "bravo."

FLORENCE JOHNSON

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000

NOV 14 1970

CARNEGIE HALL

Sun., Nov. 15: 2:30 p.m., The Antranig Song & Dance Ensemble; 8:30 p.m.: Jan Peerce, tenor, Sergiu Luca, violin, in a benefit concert; Tues., Nov. 17, 8:30 p.m.: David Gilbert conducts National Orchestral Association in works of Mozart, Jonel Perlea, Webern, Debussy; Wed., Nov. 18, 8:30 p.m.: Eugene Istomin, Isaac Stern, Leonard Rose Trio playing works of Beethoven; Thurs., Nov. 19, 8 p.m.: Vic Damone, popular singer, Pat Henry, comedian; Sat., Nov. 21, 8:30 p.m.: Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Debussy, Prokofieff, William Schuman. Maurizio Pollini, piano. Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th St., 247-7459

WHERE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 15,000

NOV 14 1970

PHILHARMONIC HALL

Sun., Nov. 15: 2:30 p.m., American Symphony conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Jascha Silberstein, cello, American Symphony Chorus; 7 p.m., Opera on Film: Don Giovanni; Mon., Nov. 16, 7:30 p.m.: Milton Katims conducts N. Y. Philharmonic in works of Beethoven and Prokofiev, Gina Bachauer, pianist; Tues., Nov. 17, 8:30 p.m.: (Repeat of Nov. 15 program.); Wed., Nov. 18, 8:30 p.m.: William Steinberg conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra; Thurs., Nov. 19, 8:30 p.m.: Robert Shaw conducts N. Y. Philharmonic in all Brahms program with chorus and soloists; Fri., Nov. 20; 2 p.m., N. Y. Philharmonic (repeat of Nov. 19 program): 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra (repeat of Nov. 18 program); Sat., Nov. 21: 11 a.m. and 3 p.m., Thomas Scherman conducts the Little Orchestra Society in a concert for young people; 8:30 p.m., N. Y. Philharmonic (repeat of Nov. 19 program). Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, B'way at 65th St., 874-2424

Critic at Large

The right blend for a success

BY BYRON BELT

NEW YORK — American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sound of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's Short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie fantastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, found a willing orchestra on stage and an enthusiastic audience in the auditorium.

* * *

The Copland Short Symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Legeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001." While conductors have lept on the Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which was also used as background music, only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly special and other-world composition.

While the Hungarian-born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Penderecki and Xenakis, there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessable to listeners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sounds that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and, like that great unknown his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated Friday evenings.

* * *

MUSIC NOTES: We cannot let the Leopold Stokowski performances of the Charles Ives 4th Symphony Sunday and Tuesday pass without notice. With his American Symphony Orchestra in splendid form, the Maestro revived his own magnificent conception of this greatest of all Ives masterpieces. In absolute command of the complex musical forces involved, Stokowski demonstrated once again that he and the American Symphony are among the area's most important artistic forces.

Happily the Fourth is available on Columbia Records in the distinctive Stokowski interpretation, for it is a score both demanding and worthy of intensive study. The Maestro coupled the Ives with Henry Cowell's attractive Largo and Allegro and a far from perfect "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss in which the organ, and concertmistress were particularly distressing.

Jascha Silberstein, solo cellist of the Metropolitan Opera, contributed technically flawed but winning performance of David Popper's flamboyant Opus 24 Concerto for Cello and Orchestra.

On the same high level as the Stokowski Ives and Cowell was the entire Carnegie Recital Hall program offered by flutist Karl Kraber. A stellar member of the celebrated Dorian Woodwind Quintet, Mr. Kraber played a lengthy recital of music by Bach, Couperin Bach's son K.P.E. Bach, and contemporary works by Paul Hindemith, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Gregory Tucker and Jean-Michel Demase.

During Tucker's attractive "Merwan Songs" for Alto Flute and Piano (a New York premiere,) a fuse blew. It was a fitting commentary on the superb virtuoso performances and musical interpretations of Mr. Kraber and his expert associates, Edward Smith, Fred Sherry and Gilbert Kalish!

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
NOV 19 1970

Ozawa leads Bostonians in concert

By BYRON BELT

American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sounds of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, had a willing orchestra on stage and an enthusiastic audience in the auditorium.

The Copeland symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Ligeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001," which was also used as background music; only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly spacial and other-world composition.

The Hungarian-born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Pendereoki and Xanakis, but there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessable to listerners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sound that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and like that great unknown, his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated tomorrow. at 8:30 p.m.

Music Last Night

Thomas Conducts Boston Symphony at Auditorium

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Michael Tilson Thomas continued to leave a full-dimensioned impression last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is associate conductor, at Veterans Auditorium. His program had wide musical interest and his direction of it, at all points, came to grips solidly with the material at hand.

Works performed were the Haydn Symphony No. 97, Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Joseph Silverstein the soloist, and Carl Nielsen's fifth symphony. The concerto was a substitute for the Bach D minor originally scheduled, possibly a backstage compromise in the season's planning. But the substitution made small difference.

A reason for that was the conception conductor and soloist seemed to share. The performance was not so much razzle-dazzle as it was songful within the essentially classic refinement both Silverstein and the orchestra brought to it.

The soloist's playing had just the right amount of juice, no more and no less. Pyrotechnics and the sort of flash we are accustomed to in the concerto were minimized in favor of beautiful moderation. And here, as in the Haydn, Thomas' handling of accented phrases made the two works go together extremely well.

The 1922 Nielsen symphony, in two extended movements, was dedicated to Dr. Charles Potter, whose death yesterday morning shocked the community. Nielsen was an original and his fifth symphony indicates reasons why. Melodically it has sweep which is shot through by a tight, acerbic dissonance.

The first movement especially is music with a conscience, where the snare drum's active part must be an anti-martial declaration. Thus, there is a programmatic sense, however abstractly you accept it. The performance throughout had an emotional power that was balanced and detailed wonderfully.

There was a little violin raggedness during the agitated variation in the Haydn second movement. Otherwise the orchestra gave the entire work stylishly. Thomas had the membership in reduced size, thankfully, paying particular attention to violin sections. The warmth of their tone was another of the evening's pleasures.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 298,
DEC 11 1970

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,348
DEC 30 1970

Michel Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, January 6th at 8:30 P.M.

• MUSIC

Carnegie Hall, 154 W. 57th St., 247-1350. Eves. at 8:30. Nov. 21, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa conducting; Nov. 23, Tony Dalli and Orchestra; Nov. 24, Nathan Milstein; Nov. 25, Istomin-Stern-Rose Trio; Nov. 26, Richie Havens and Kathy Smith; Nov. 27, Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha.

HOST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 21 1970

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 20 1970

Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa conducting, presents a concert at Carnegie Hall this Saturday, Nov. 21 at 8:30 P.M. Guest soloist is Maurizio Pollini, pianist. Three works by Debussy, Prokofief and Tchaikovsky will be aired.

Some seats, at prices ranging from $3.50 to $7.50 may be available at the Box Office.

The next concert in the series will be given Saturday, Feb. 20 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Critic at Large

The right blend for a success

BY BYRON BELT

NEW YORK — American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sound of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's Short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie fantastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, found a willing orchestra on stage and an enthusiastic audience in the auditorium.

* * *

The Copland Short Symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Legeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001." While conductors have lept on the Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which was also used as background music, only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly special and other-world composition.

While the Hungarian - born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Penderecki and Xenakis, there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessable to listeners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sounds that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and, like that great unknown his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated Friday evenings.

* * *

MUSIC NOTES: We cannot let the Leopold Stokowski performances of the Charles Ives 4th Symphony Sunday and Tuesday pass without notice. With his American Symphony Orchestra in splendid form, the Maestro revived his own magnificent conception of this greatest of all Ives masterpieces. In absolute command of the complex musical forces involved, Stokowski demonstrated once again that he and the American Symphony are among the area's most important artistic forces.

Happily the Fourth is available on Columbia Records in the distinctive Stokowski interpretation, for it is a score both demanding and worthy of intensive study. The Maestro coupled the Ives with Henry Cowell's attractive Largo and Allegro and a far from perfect "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss in which the organ, and concertmistress were particularly distressing.

Jascha Silberstein, solo cellist of the Metropolitan Opera, contributed technically flawed but winning performance of David Popper's flamboyant Opus 24 Concerto for Cello and Orchestra.

On the same high level as the Stokowski Ives and Cowell was the entire Carnegie Recital Hall program offered by flutist Karl Kraber. A stellar member of the celebrated Dorian Woodwind Quintet, Mr. Kraber played a lengthy recital of music by Bach, Couperin Bach's son K.P.E. Bach, and contemporary works by Paul Hindemith, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Gregory Tucker and Jean-Michel Demase.

During Tucker's attractive "Merwan Songs" for Alto Flute and Piano (a New York premiere,) a fuse blew. It was a fitting commentary on the superb virtuoso performances and musical interpretations of Mr. Kraber and his expert associates, Edward Smith, Fred Sherry and Gilbert Kalish!

• MUSIC

Carnegie Hall, 154 W. 57th St., 247-1350. Eves. at 8:30. Nov. 21, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa conducting; Nov. 23, Tony Dalli and Orchestra; Nov. 24, Nathan Milstein; Nov. 25, Istomin-Stern-Rose Trio; Nov. 26, Richie Havens and Kathy Smith; Nov. 27, Ravi Shankar and Alla Rakha.

HOST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL

NOV 21 1970

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 20 1970

Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa conducting, presents a concert at Carnegie Hall this Saturday, Nov. 21 at 8:30 P.M. Guest soloist is Maurizio Pollini, pianist. Three works by Debussy, Prokofief and Tchaikovsky will be aired.

Some seats, at prices ranging from $3.50 to $7.50 may be available at the Box Office.

The next concert in the series will be given Saturday, Feb. 20 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089

NOV 19 1970

Ozawa leads Bostonians in concert

By BYRON BELT

American rhythmic sophistication, French delirium and the sounds of "2001" dominated last evening's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Guest conductor Seiji Ozawa offered Aaron Copland's short Symphony in honor of the composer's 70th birthday, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique." The mop-haired maestro, who is the artistic co-director of the Tanglewood Festival and music director of the San Francisco Symphony, had a willing orchestra on stage and an enthusiastic audience in the auditorium.

The Copeland symphony had been played only a few days ago by the Philharmonic, with the composer conducting. It is not an easily ingratiating score, but Ozawa found its rhythmic complexities greatly to his liking, and other than surprisingly poor trumpet playing, the performance was most exhilarating.

The high point of the concert was a marvellous presentation of the Ligeti "Atmospheres," one of several scores used in the film "2001," which was also used as background music; only Ozawa seems dedicated to Ligeti's truly spacial and other-world composition.

The Hungarian-born composer writes music of extreme complexity very much as Pendereoki and Xanakis, but there is something appealingly romantic about the textures and mood of his music that makes it more accessable to listerners. "Atmospheres" quite literally creates sound that can only be associated with the vast dimness of outer space, and like that great unknown, his music is shot through with unexpected streaks of light.

The Berlioz symphony is another colorful score, but while the performance was admirable, it failed to develop into a truly satisfying interpretation. The concert will be repeated tomorrow. at 8:30 p.m.

Music Last Night

Thomas Conducts Boston Symphony at Auditorium

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Michael Tilson Thomas continued to leave a full-dimensioned impression last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is associate conductor, at Veterans Auditorium. His program had wide musical interest and his direction of it, at all points, came to grips solidly with the material at hand.

Works performed were the Haydn Symphony No. 97, Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Joseph Silverstein the soloist, and Carl Nielsen's fifth symphony. The concerto was a substitute for the Bach D minor originally scheduled, possibly a backstage compromise in the season's planning. But the substitution made small difference.

A reason for that was the conception conductor and soloist seemed to share. The performance was not so much razzle-dazzle as it was songful within the essentially classic refinement both Silverstein and the orchestra brought to it.

The soloist's playing had just the right amount of juice, no more and no less. Pyrotechnics and the sort of flash we are accustomed to in the concerto were minimized in favor of beautiful moderation. And here, as in the Haydn, Thomas' handling of accented phrases made the two works go together extremely well.

The 1922 Nielsen symphony, in two extended movements, was dedicated to Dr. Charles Potter, whose death yesterday morning shocked the community. Nielsen was an original and his fifth symphony indicates reasons why. Melodically it has sweep which is shot through by a tight, acerbic dissonance.

The first movement especially is music with a conscience, where the snare drum's active part must be an anti-martial declaration. Thus, there is a programmatic sense, however abstractly you accept it. The performance throughout had an emotional power that was balanced and detailed wonderfully.

There was a little violin raggedness during the agitated variation in the Haydn second movement. Otherwise the orchestra gave the entire work stylishly. Thomas had the membership in reduced size, thankfully, paying particular attention to violin sections. The warmth of their tone was another of the evening's pleasures.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,729 (S) 202,

DEC 11 1970

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,348

DEC 30 1970

Michel Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, January 6th at 8:30 P.M.

28

Young Man Does Well On Podium

By JOHN GRUBER

Michael Tilson Thomas, 26-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was highly impressive on the podium last night at UConn's Jorgenson Auditorium, as the Boston Symphony returned there after a year's absence. He is already an excellent conductor and in a few years bids fair to being one of the world's best.

He still has some things to learn, of course, but this is due to lack of experience, rather than to lack of talent. His abilities are easily measurable when one considers that over 100 men, all of whom are this senior, were willing to put forth their best efforts for this newcomer to the musical scene.

The program, a rather long one, was unhackneyed and interesting to most of the capacity crowd that attended. Some, I will admit were bewildered, bored, or even antagonistic to Karlheinz Stockhausen's extremely modern work, "Punkte," but a university audience is definitely the place to introduce a work of this nature. Presumably, at least, you find inquiring and intelligent minds here.

"Punkte" is an early work by this controversial composer, and after the performance was over I was tempted to ask, "Wonderfully well played, but why go to all that effort?" On the other hand I have found that Stockhausen's music does begin to make some sort of crazy sense (if that is possible) after eight or ten hearings, so I hesitate to dismiss the work in cavalier fashion.

The program opened with a Viotti Violin Concerto, No. 22, to be precise. I don't know how long it has been since I have encountered Viotti, who is usually relegated to students as intermediate teaching material. So it was nice to hear the old man presented in full panoply for a change.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, was the featured soloist. He started unevenly, and the first movement was a bit superficial, as well. The second movement sounded very well except for a small portion in the middle where the soloist tended to rush a little bit, but he returned to the serene tempo at which he had begun and the over all effect was fine. The finale went extremely well, but it is the movement of least musical worth, and thus the least demanding part of the whole composition.

Mr. Thomas radically cut his forces for this number, in keeping with the custom of the time at which it was written, and also in the interests of balance with the soloist. The conductor showed that he is a capable accompanist a swell as a thoroughly competent director in other works.

Following the intermission came Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony. Unfortunately there was an error on the printed program. This is one of the few symphonies comprising five movements, only four of which were listed. Consequently many in the audience thought the work was over when there was still the final movement to be heard.

I think this work was the least well conceived and played of the entire program, yet it was well, if not exactly exceptionally, done. I think Mr. Thomas took the scherzo a little too slowly, and the ensuing slow movement a little too fast. The result was a lack of contrast which the interpretation needed.

Here Mr. Thomas employed the full resources of the orchestra, increasing it beyond the size demanded by the composer, and at times doubling parts in order to achieve balance. It wasn't exemplary, but it was very good indeed.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210
JAN 12 1971

Boston Symphony Returns To UConn; Not in Top Form

By The Chronicle's Music Critic

After an absence of some seasons, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the University of Connecticut on Monday evening, and , this time, under the direction of its new associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. The return of this famous orchestra was eagerly anticipated by many of the patrons of these concerts, but it is an unhappy duty to report here that the concert, as performed, did not fulfill the anticipation of many persons.

The program opened with the Violin Concerto No. 2 in A minor by Giovanni Battista Viotti. A work written toward the end of the eighteenth century, it has, nevertheless, sometimes been known as one of the earliest of "modern" violin concertos.

A satisfacoty account of the solo part was given by Joseph Silverstine, the concertmaster, but the accompanying or orchestra just did not "sing." The notes and the phrases were all there but the lyricism was lacking.

Following a brief explanation by the conductor, the orchestra performed "Punkte" by the contemporary composer Karlheinz Stockhausen. It was noted that this was an experience in sound. Perhaps one should take the word of Mr. Thomas for this.

It seems necessary today to give a certain amount of credence to those interested in various kinds of experimentation, but, beyond this point, it is most difficult to accept such a composition as music.

Perhaps the less said the better by those who do not pretend to understand such experiments, but to this listener, at least, "Punkte" was described in sound in five minutes and the remaining twenty to twenty-five minutes were a waste of time.

Heavy and Labored

The Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Opus 97, by Robert Schumann, and popularly knoyn as the "Rhenish," was the major offering following the intermission. Here in a well-known symphony it would be possible to hear the orchestra at its best, particularly following the "experiment in sound."

The "Rhenish" is an ingratiating work presenting a variety of scenes describing the composer's joy in visiting the Rhineland, and it ends in an exalted mood.

However, as performed on Monday evening, it was heavy and labored. Again, as in the opening compsition, the sounds of the orchestra were all technically correct but the composition was not presented as a comprehensive whole. Mr. Thomas gestured, at times excessively, and he strode from one corner of the podium to another, but the end result was not a fine, performance; at best it could be termed as adequate.

Disappointment over the performance of the Boston Symphony was such that a decision was made to go to Hartford on Tuesday evening and hear them play a completely different program. Had the standards of this great orchestra, truly slipped, or had it been just "one of those evenings?"

On Tuesday evening the solo cellist of the orchestra, Jules Eskin, performed quite well, indeed, but the performance of the orchestra was lackluster and the concert served as no basis upon which to alter the evaluation of the Monday evening performance.

The above comments are not written with pleasure, but with regret, for one of the most memorable performances at the University was given by the Boston Symphony some years ago.

The brilliance and purity of tone, plus the excellent precision, were always trademarks of this musical organization. These assets combined with elan and a depth of interpretation are needed to present any musical organization at its best.

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
JAN 15 1971
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony On UConn Stage Monday, Jan. 11

STORRS — One of the oldest orchestras on earth will appear under the baton of one of the youngest conductors in the world, Jan. 11, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra performs at the University of Connecticut.

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old associate conductor of the Orchestra, will lead the 106-member ensemble in its return to the Jorgensen Auditorium stage after a year absence.

Joseph Silverstein will be violin soloist for the recital.

The 8:15 p.m. concert will open with Viotti's "Concerto No. 22."

A highlight of the evening will be the performance of a contemporary piece by this venerable ensemble — "Punkta" by Karlheinz Stockhausen.

Schumann's "Symphony No. 3," will complete the varied program.

Thomas conducted the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra in Los Angeles for four years. He also was conductor and frequently piano soloist for the Ojai Festival Monday Evening Concerts series.

During this time he appeared in several premiere performances of contemporary music by, and with, such composers as Stockhausen, Stravinsky, and Boulez.

Thomas conducted several orchestras in this country and was assistant conductor to Boulez at the Bayreuth Festival in 1966.

Joseph Silverstein, Boston's concertmaster, joined the Orchestra in 1955. In seven years he moved from the last stand of second violins to his present post. He has played with the Houston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadephia Orchestra and as concertmaster with the Denver Symphony.

He is chairman of the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center.

Ticket information may be obtained from the Jorgensen Auditorium Box Office, 429-3311 ext. 1804.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
152,525 (M)
JAN 10 1971

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
JAN 7 1971
New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JAN 8 1971

NEWS
GROTON, CONNECTICUT
DAILY
JAN 8 1971
New England Newsclip

Symphony Brings New Conductor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, was presented in the Bushnell Concert Series at the Memorial Auditorium Tuesday night. Jules Eskin, 'cellist, was guest artist.
The program:
Six Pieces for Orchestra —— Webern
'Cello Concerto ———— Haydn
Mr. Eskin, Soloist

The concert by the Boston Symphony last night brought back an old and favorite orchestra and a new, young conductor who had not been here before.

Michael Tilson Thomas is only in his middle twenties, but he has already distinguished himself to the point where Musical America has picked him as musician of the year.

He proved to be a sound and eloquent interpreter of the works he selected. His manner on the podium was animated, and in addition to cueing in every instrument or choir with the most detailed care, he shaped every phrase or dynamic on the air as if he were there to mime as well as conduct.

Perhaps the most outstanding characteristic of Mr. Thomas' artistry last night was its painstaking poetics, or perhaps its poetic painstaking. He went to the most exquisite lengths to cull all the beauties from all the passages of all the scores. And certainly the works he programmed lent themselves especially to this searchingly affectionate treatment.

Webern, Anyone?

The Webern Six Pieces for Orchestra surely are most lyric in their textures and timbres. The score continues to stir the ire of some members of the Bushnell audience who prefer more syntax and less pure sound in a composition. Actually, the Six Pieces are almost innocuous compared to some of today's far-out writing. In any event, Mr. Thomas set them out very evocatively—almost indeed as if he had already gotten to "les parfums de la nuit" in "Iberia." The kaleidescopic sound just seemed to well up out of the orchestra which, of course in its turn, played them to poetic perfection.

Jules Eskin was soloist in the Haydn 'Cello Concerto, and his warm, heartfelt interpretation of this recently recovered score was entirely of a piece with Mr. Thomas' romantic approach to music all across the evening.

Mr. Eskin draws a bright, colorful tone from his instrument, and in adagio section of the work sound and phrasing were both incandescent. It was a very happy performance in all points of lyricsim. In one or two places, in rapid passages, the intonation was not always quite exact. The overall and larger musical effect of Mr. Eskin's playing were most compelling however, and the house showered him with long applause.

In coming to the symphonic "Images," Mr. Thomas elected to play all three sections—which was a blessing—and ordered them Gigues, Rondes and Iberia. Whether this is a musical improvement over sheet chronology is perhaps a matter of taste. But in any case, Mr. Thomas went after the music and the players with the same poetic painstaking he had shown all evening. Here of course, the care and the poetry served best of all. "Images" does not have to be labeled at this late date a masterpiece of aura and orchestration. Its ingenuity and imagination are long wellknown, and conductor and orchestra made a handsome performance out of the work. This sort of intensely orchestral thing has always been right up the Boston Symphony's alley. Last night the players proved it again in the Webern to start, the Debussy to finish. It was the kind of music-making that has made the orchestra and all its conductors favorite here, and last nigth added the name of Michael Thomas to the list.

—T.H.P.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
152,525 (M)
JAN 13 1971

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(S) 8,260
JAN 13 1971

Boston Symphony Here Under Thomas' Baton

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting and Jules Eskin as cello soloist, will give the fourth concert of the Bushnell Symphony Series Jan. 12 at 8:15 p.m.

Works scheduled for the program include Haydn's Cello Concerto in C Major, Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra and the Debussy Images.

Thomas was only 25 when he was called upon to substitute for William Steinberg, chief of the Boston ensemble, during a performance a year ago at Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center. He was appointed in June as the Symphony's associate conductor.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Thomas will share with Steinberg a considerable portion of the conducting duties when the orchestra tours Europe this coming spring.

Jules Eskin has been principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, since 1964 after holding the same position with the Cleveland Orchestra. He has played extensively with Casals in Puerto Rico and with Casals, Schneider and Serkin in Marlboro.

Eskin teaches at the New England Conservatory and at the Berkshire Music Center and is also a member of the Boston Symphony Players.

For ticket information, call 246-6807.

JALES ELSIN

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
152,525 (M)
JAN 3 1971

Thomas' Opener Puzzled Audience

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas, who is associate conductor of the Boston Symphony at the age of 26, made his first appearance at the Bushnell with this famed aggregation last night.

And on the basis of what I heard last night and what I heard last summer at Tanglewood, I am not persuaded that he is the man to take over the Bostonians. Admittedly, with Steinberg indisposed last season, he was in the unenviable position of assuming a great number of concerts at short notice.

His conducting experience on the West Coast, which was involved with a great deal of contemporary music, has given him a predilection for this music and it was not surprising that he included Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra (Op. 6) on his program here. (At Storrs the night before, he had scheduled Stockhausen's "Punkte").

However, putting the Webern at the head of his program created problems at the Bushnell. There was a minor coughing epidemic for awhile, accompanied by the rustling of programs by those trying to find out what was going on.

Despite these irritations, the conductor managed to get a fairly accurate performance of this challenging work from the orchestra.

The Haydn Cello Concerto in C (which was only recently rediscovered in Prague) was more to the audience's liking, a work of delightful vivacity and charm. The soloist was Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra, who had performed the concerto at Tanglewood in 1965.

After an opening movement that was marred by some intonational problems, the soloist settled down and gave the audience a glowing performance of the Adagio. The finale, which the conductor took at a very crisp jog, was full of infectious rhythms.

Debusy's "Images" for orchestra, brought the full contingent of players back to the stage (Tilson Thomas used a suitably reduced orchestra for the Haydn). This was the major challenge and I am afraid the conductor did not show to good advantage here.

While his busy baton technique underlined the details with clarity, I missed the over all sweep and the interpretive continuity that one found in a performance by Pierre Monteux a few years ago or in the Boulez performances today.

The whole thing was conceived on a small dynamic frame that did not exploit the tonal reserves that the Boston Symphony can command.

The great Cleveland Orchestra will be returning next month on Feb. 11 with the outstanding European conductor, Rafael Kubelik, as the guest conductor.

Boston Symphony concert lacks special excitement

By BYRON BELT

NEW YORK — Michael Tilson Thomas returned to Philharmonic Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, just over a year after his sepctacular local debut.

The brilliant young associate conductor of the Bostonians conducted a varied program with his expected musicality and assurance.

What was missing, in music of Webern, Bach, Dahl and Debussy, was any special sense of occasion of luminous magic. Everything was performed with the kind of Polish and taste associated with the Boston Symphony, yet none of the performances aroused special excitement.

* * *

Thomas began his concert with an impeccable presentation of the six pieces for orchestra of Anton von Webern. Since last evening's concert will be repeated tomorrow evening, and Daniel Barenboim will lead the Philharmonic in a matinee performance of the Webern five pieces for orchestra, the enigmatic serialist composer will be represented by the bulk of his major orchestral output in one day.

Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto was performed by 10 strings and harpsichord. There were two miscalculations by the conductor. The number of strings should have been larger, because the texture, if not the sonority, was too thin. Secondly, to insert the slow movement of a violin sonata is historically doubtful (no matter what the program book may imply) and musically inexcusable.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein was the expert soloist in the Bach, and he is soloist in concert of Mozart and Viotti in the BSO concerts tonight in Carnegie Hall and Saturday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The featured soloist in Ingolf Dahl's fresh concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra was Harvey Pittel, who was superb. Debussy's "images" for orchestra brought the concert to a glowing, if not spectacular, close.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 230,965
JAN 14 1971

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
JAN 14 1971

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
JAN 18 1971

THOMAS CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Leads Bostonians in Viotti, Stockhausen, Schumann

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall into dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

The music follows its own rules of organization and, because it is a work of integrity, "Punkte" makes its points (if a bilingual pun may be allowed). It compels the listener's attention and, by the time it ends, makes him feel that something worthwhile has been going on.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
NOV 8 1970

Music Series Is Beginning

Michael Rabin, violin virtuoso, will play Prokofieff's Concerto No. 2 in G Minor with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, at 8:30 p.m. Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The concert will be the first in the Academy's 1970-71 Orchestra Series.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major, and Hindemith's Concert Music for Brass and Strings. The latter will replace Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," previously scheduled.

During Rabin's career, which began with a recital at Carnegie Hall when he was 14 years of age, he has traveled almost 700,000 miles to give performances on his rare Guarneri del Gesu violin.

Boston to Come

The Orchestra Series will continue with three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 14, Feb. 18 and March 18, and will conclude April 22 with a performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Subscriptions to the five-concert series may be purchased at the academy box office, 30 Lafayette Ave., Brooklyn 11217, telephone 783-3434. Single tickets also are available. For group or student sales, telephone 783-6700, extension 23.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
WEEKLY 4,162
JAN 7 1971

Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall Storrs, Hartford

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, Wednesday and Friday evenings, January 13 and 15, 1971 at 8:30 p.m.

The soloist will be Harvey Pittel, saxophone. The program opens with Webern's "Six pieces for Orchestra," followed by Bach's Brandenburg concerto no. 3.

Then comes Ingolf Dahl's Saxophone concerto (played in memory of the composer) with Mr. Pittel as soloist, and Debussy's Images.

The third of five concerts at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony takes place Saturday evening January 16, 1971 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Orchestra with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, as soloist.

The program includes Viotti's Violin concerto no. 22, Stockhausen's "Punkte" and Schumann's Third symphony.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphon at Jorgenson Auditorium in in Storrs, Connecticut on Monday, January 11 at 8:15 p.m. The program is the same as the Carnegie Hall program.

Mr. Thomas also conducts the Orchestra in Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford, Conn., on January 12 at 8:15 p.m.

The soloist is Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program includes Webern's "Six pieces for Orchestra," Haydn's Cello concerto Debussy's "Impages."

Boston Orchestra To Play At Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas will perform at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Jan. 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert is the second in the Academy's 1970-71 Orchestra Series and will feature violinist Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The program will include Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor, Stockhausen's "Punkte" and Schumann's Shymphony No. 3 in E Flat, Op. 97 ("Rhenish").

Shortly after his appointment as Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1969, Michael Tilson Thomas won the attention and praise of New York critics by filling in for an ailing William Steinberg during a concert at Philharmonic Hall. After conducting some thirty concerts that season, Thomas was named to his present position of Associate Conductor.

Joseph Silverstein has served as Concertmaster for the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, and also performs with its String Trio, String Quartet and Chamber Players. Mr. Silverstein is the Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Tickets for this performance are available at the Academy box office, 30 Lafayette Ave., Brooklyn, 11217, 783-2434 and at Abraham & Straus and Bloomingdale's. For group or student sales call 783-6700 ext. 44.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000
JAN 9 1971

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500
JAN 7 1971

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,621 SUN. 423,790
JAN 6 1971

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JAN 13 1971

Boston Symphony to Perform

Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony in a concert at Carnegie Hall, Jan. 16 at 8:30 p.m. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, will be soloist in the Viotti Concerto No. 22 in A Minor. The orchestra's appearance is part of the International Festival of Visiting Orchestras, sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation. The next event in the Festival will be Feb. 9 when Henry Lewis will conduct the New Jersey Symphony with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JAN 2 1971

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

No wonder it's a thin audience

A FRIEND SAID, "I didn't like your review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the other day," and he spoke in the most unbelligerent manner. He referred to a concert conducted by Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos at Veterans Auditorium, as it happened a debut with the orchestra.

His program had consisted of two works by Falla, El Amor Brujo and The Three Cornered Hat, the Schumann piano concerto and the second suite from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

It must be said the combination of offerings did not look too inviting in advance. Except for the Schumann, which received a tender, affectionate performance by Christoph Eschenbach and the orchestra, the program turned out pretty much as anticipated.

It can be said, too, that the following is intended more as clarification of thought than apology for opinion. You are stuck with opinion no matter what, particularly when it is in public print.

Now we have had three Boston concerts here, and that is the extent of the orchestra's 1970-71 season in Providence. The series was cut by two programs, on the face of it, because of a European tour in the spring. Deeper, the reason may be dwindling subscription audiences over recent years.

Certainly the non-capacity house last week might be construed as a reaction to programming. Whoever was responsible for the choice of music ought to think of this. It was perfectly Fruehbeck's right to conduct whatever he wished. On the other hand, it was management's duty to advise him his program was mish-mash for a tour city.

Falla is an attractive, frequently stunning composer. There is no more sensuous music than the Pantomime in El Amor Brujo and there are enthralling memories of Leonide Massine and Tamara Toumanova dancing in The Three Cornered Hat.

Yet the composer hardly can be rated on a level which demands two pieces for a concert's openers. They simply do not command that kind of attentive respect for all the delight of their content.

Then, there is the matter of the Ravel. How many times, do you suppose, has the orchestra played it?

This listener could not stay to hear more than the opening, "Daybreak," section. He did twice hear subsequent FM broadcasts, noting that broadcasts can never convey dimensions of live performances. Nonetheless, nothing vivid enough in the interpretation came through to justify its inclusion on such a program menu.

The music came through as filler, which, since originally only Falla and Schumann had been scheduled, is exactly what you may suspect it was. The Bostonians hardly had to strain to produce its lush sonorities; the ease of their playing made it seem just another Daphnis and Chloe.

Really, most of us have no intention of going after an orchestra because it is, like Big Daddy, highly respected and thus apparently invulnerable. Nor do we wish to be undeservedly inhospitable to a new conductor.

Fruehbeck clearly showed, in collaboration with the young Eschenbach, he has an able, musical intelligence. He only suggested a strange sense of programming.

Where he could have served us meat, he presented a surfeit of hors d'oeuvres. The diet might have been substantial enough for a summer Sunday afternoon in the Tanglewood music shed, where the day and surroundings tend to soften reactions.

But in Veterans Auditorium, just as in Symphony Hall, music is the thing, first and last, especially on a cold winter's evening. Somebody should have told the conductor.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,72S (S) 20
FEB 7 1971

Boston Symphony concert lacks special excitement

By BYRON BELT

NEW YORK — Michael Tilson Thomas returned to Philharmonic Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, just over a year after his sepctacular local debut.

The brilliant young associate conductor of the Bostonians conducted a varied program with his expected musicality and assurance.

What was missing, in music of Webern, Bach, Dahl and Debussy, was any special sense of occasion of luminous magic. Everything was performed with the kind of Polish and taste associated with the Boston Symphony, yet none of the performances aroused special excitement.

* * *

Thomas began his concert with an impeccable presentation of the six pieces for orchestra of Anton von Webern. Since last evening's concert will be repeated tomorrow evening, and Daniel Barenboim will lead the Philharmonic in a matinee performance of the Webern five pieces for orchestra, the enigmatic serialist composer will be represented by the bulk of his major orchestral output in one day.

Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto was performed by 10 strings and harpsichord. There were two miscalculations by the conductor. The number of strings should have been larger, because the texture, if not the sonority, was too thin. Secondly, to insert the slow movement of a violin sonata is historically doubtful (no matter what the program book may imply) and musically inexcusable.

* * *

Joseph Silverstein was the expert soloist in the Bach, and he is soloist in concert of Mozart and Viotti in the BSO concerts tonight in Carnegie Hall and Saturday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The featured soloist in Ingolf Dahl's fresh concerto for alto saxophone and wind orchestra was Harvey Pittel, who was superb. Debussy's "images" for orchestra brought the concert to a glowing, if not spectacular, close.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 290,965
JAN 14 1971

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
JAN 14 1971

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
JAN 18 1971

THOMAS CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Leads Bostonians in Viotti, Stockhausen, Schumann

Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be making it clear that as long as he is around the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its programs—or those he is responsible for, at least—will not fall nto dreary routine. After giving prominent play to music by Webern and Dahl in a concert here last Wednesday, he took up the cause of Karlheinz Stockhausen Saturday night at Carnegie Hall.

The work offered was early Stockhausen, to be sure, but "Punkte," which was composed in 1952 and revised in 1964 and 1966, is still pretty far out for most listeners. It is 20 minutes long, and there is virtually no conventional melody, harmony or counterpoint in it.

The music follows its own rules of organization and, because it is a work of integrity, "Punkte" makes its points (if a bilingual pun may be allowed). It compels the listener's attention and, by the time it ends, makes him feel that something worthwhile has been going on.

Mr. Thomas did not deal gingerly with "Punkte"—as though it were something distasteful he had to go through for the sake of appearances. It is clearly viable music to him, and by getting the orchestra to play it convincingly, he made it seem viable to others.

The program began with Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Silverstein played skillfully, but the rapport between him and the orchestra was not ideal, and the work did not seem so shapely as it might have been.

The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), the style of which Mr. Thomas may still find somewhat elusive.

ALLEN HUGHES.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
NOV 8 1970

Music Series Is Beginning

Michael Rabin, violin virtuoso, will play Prokofieff's Concerto No. 2 in G Minor with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, at 8:30 p.m. Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The concert will be the first in the Academy's 1970-71 Orchestra Series.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major, and Hindemith's Concert Music for Brass and Strings. The latter will replace Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," previously scheduled.

During Rabin's career, which began with a recital at Carnegie Hall when he was 14 years of age, he has traveled almost 700,000 miles to give performances on his rare Guarneri del Gesu violin.

Boston to Come

The Orchestra Series will continue with three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 14, Feb. 18 and March 18, and will conclude April 22 with a performance by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Subscriptions to the five-concert series may be purchased at the academy box office, 30 Lafayette Ave., Brooklyn 11217, telephone 783-3434. Single tickets also are available. For group or student sales, telephone 783-6700, extension 23.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
WEEKLY 4,162.
JAN 7 1971

Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall Storrs, Hartford

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducts the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, Wednesday and Friday evenings, January 13 and 15, 1971 at 8:30 p.m.

The soloist will be Harvey Pittel, saxophone. The program opens with Webern's "Six pieces for Orchestra," followed by Bach's Brandenburg concerto no. 3.

Then comes Ingolf Dahl's Saxophone concerto (played in memory of the composer) with Mr. Pittel as soloist, and Debussy's Images.

The third of five concerts at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony takes place Saturday evening January 16, 1971 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas again conducts the Orchestra with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, as soloist.

The program includes Viotti's Violin concerto no. 22, Stockhausen's "Punkte" and Schumann's Third symphony.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphon at Jorgenson Auditorium in in Storrs, Connecticut on Monday, January 11 at 8:15 p.m. The program is the same as the Carnegie Hall program.

Mr. Thomas also conducts the Orchestra in Bushnell Memorial Hall in Hartford, Conn., on January 12 at 8:15 p.m.

The soloist is Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program includes Webern's "Six pieces for Orchestra," Haydn's Cello concerto Debussy's "Impages."

Boston Orchestra To Play At Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas will perform at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Jan. 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert is the second in the Academy's 1970-71 Orchestra Series and will feature violinist Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The program will include Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22 in A minor, Stockhausen's "Punkte" and Schumann's Shymphony No. 3 in E Flat, Op. 97 ("Rhenish").

Shortly after his appointment as Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1969, Michael Tilson Thomas won the attention and praise of New York critics by filling in for an ailing William Steinberg during a concert at Philharmonic Hall. After conducting some thirty concerts that season, Thomas was named to his present position of Associate Conductor.

Joseph Silverstein has served as Concertmaster for the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, and also performs with its String Trio, String Quartet and Chamber Players. Mr. Silverstein is the Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Tickets for this performance are available at the Academy box office, 30 Lafayette Ave., Brooklyn, 11217, 783-2434 and at Abraham & Straus and Bloomingdale's. For group or student sales call 783-6700 ext. 44.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000
JAN 9 1971

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500
JAN 7 1971

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,[illegible] SUN. 428,700
JAN 6 1971

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JAN 13 1971

Boston Symphony to Perform

Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony in a concert at Carnegie Hall, Jan. 16 at 8:30 p.m. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, will be soloist in the Viotti Concerto No. 22 in A Minor. The orchestra's appearance is part of the International Festival of Visiting Orchestras, sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation. The next event in the Festival will be Feb. 9 when Henry Lewis will conduct the New Jersey Symphony with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JAN 2 1971

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

No wonder it's a thin audience

A FRIEND SAID, "I didn't like your review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the other day," and he spoke in the most unbelligerent manner. He referred to a concert conducted by Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos at Veterans Auditorium, as it happened a debut with the orchestra.

His program had consisted of two works by Falla, El Amor Brujo and The Three Cornered Hat, the Schumann piano concerto and the second suite from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe.

It must be said the combination of offerings did not look too inviting in advance. Except for the Schumann, which received a tender, affectionate performance by Christoph Eschenbach and the orchestra, the program turned out pretty much as anticipated.

It can be said, too, that the following is intended more as clarification of thought than apology for opinion. You are stuck with opinion no matter what, particularly when it is in public print.

Now we have had three Boston concerts here, and that is the extent of the orchestra's 1970-71 season in Providence. The series was cut by two programs, on the face of it, because of a European tour in the spring. Deeper, the reason may be dwindling subscription audiences over recent years.

Certainly the non-capacity house last week might be construed as a reaction to programming. Whoever was responsible for the choice of music ought to think of this. It was perfectly Fruehbeck's right to conduct whatever he wished. On the other hand, it was management's duty to advise him his program was mish-mash for a tour city.

Falla is an attractive, frequently stunning composer. There is no more sensuous music than the Pantomime in El Amor Brujo and there are enthralling memories of Leonide Massine and Tamara Toumanova dancing in The Three Cornered Hat.

Yet the composer hardly can be rated on a level which demands two pieces for a concert's openers. They simply do not command that kind of attentive respect for all the delight of their content.

Then, there is the matter of the Ravel. How many times, do you suppose, has the orchestra played it?

This listener could not stay to hear more than the opening, "Daybreak," section. He did twice hear subsequent FM broadcasts, noting that broadcasts can never convey dimensions of live performances. Nonetheless, nothing vivid enough in the interpretation came through to justify its inclusion on such a program menu.

The music came through as filler, which, since originally only Falla and Schumann had been scheduled, is exactly what you may suspect it was. The Bostonians hardly had to strain to produce its lush sonorities; the ease of their playing made it seem just another Daphnis and Chloe.

Really, most of us have no intention of going after an orchestra because it is, like Big Daddy, highly respected and thus apparently invulnerable. Nor do we wish to be undeservedly inhospitable to a new conductor.

Fruehbeck clearly showed, in collaboration with the young Eschenbach, he has an able, musical intelligence. He only suggested a strange sense of programming.

Where he could have served us meat, he presented a surfeit of hors d'oeuvres. The diet might have been substantial enough for a summer Sunday afternoon in the Tanglewood music shed, where the day and surroundings tend to soften reactions.

But in Veterans Auditorium, just as in Symphony Hall, music is the thing, first and last, especially on a cold winter's evening. Somebody should have told the conductor.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 20
FEB 7 1971

30

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

FEB 19 1971

Music: A Neglected Schoenberg Work

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in ~~Philharmonic~~ Hall on Wednesday evening, gave New Yorkers a chance to hear Arnold Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra (Op. 31). But not everybody availed himself of the chance; there were many empty seats in the hall. And this even though the program was cannily built around two of the most popular works in the repertory—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra.

•

The Schoenberg Variations (not to be confused with the later Theme and Variations) is a score not often heard. It was finished in 1928 and contains many elements of the serial style that he had worked out about five years previously. But Schoenberg's serialism was not Webern's highly condensed, pointillistic, aphoristic serialism. Schoenberg never got the 19th century entirely out of his blood, and his lineage extends back to "Tristan und Isolde."

Strongly serial as much of the Variations for Orchestra is, the music nevertheless holds no terrors. The opening is highly post-Romantic and expressive, and the serial manipulations of the theme almost gives a feeling of consonance. This is not, I think, a successful score all the way through. It bogs down toward the end, and theory seems to usurp the kind of expressivity found elsewhere. But Schoenberg was, of course, a seminal figure, and it is important to hear his neglected works.

Mr. Leinsdorf is nothing if not a thorough conductor, and the Variations received a smooth, propulsive performance. Always happy with music that demands intellectual rigor and offers technical problems, Mr. Leinsdorf clarified the sound in an interpretation that had all elements in fine balance. Even after all these years the Variations for Orchestra is not an easy score to conduct or play, but the Boston Symphony — which presumably had a couple of performances in Boston already under its belt—handled it with the finesse and power that only a great orchestra could accomplish.

In the Schubert "Unfinished," Mr. Leinsdorf did not attempt to make it "his" score. He did not yank it out of shape, he did not go in for artificial effects, and he contented himself with a hearty, well-planned performance. One of the nice things about this performance was the fact that Mr. Leinsdorf never suggested that he was bored with the score. Some conductors, who have been doing the "Unfinished" for too many years, tend to fool around with it.

•

Much the same remarks could be said about the Bartók Concerto for Orchestra. This received a powerful reading. Again, standing a little outside the music, Mr. Leinsdorf acted as an engineer, guiding the various sections of the orchestra with a firm hand, putting everything together with neatness and style, building a structure in sound. He does this kind of thing very well indeed. Is it imagination, or did Mr. Leinsdorf at this concert appear more relaxed than during those years he was musical director of the Boston Symphony?

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with the Cantata Singers. At Philharmonic Hall.
Symphony No. 8 ("Unfinished") ..... Schubert
Variations for Orchestra (Op. 31) ..... Schoenberg
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,348

FEB 8 1971

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, February 20, at 8:30 P.M.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,030,906 SUN. 3,221,849

FEB 18 1971

Leinsdorf To Conduct

Erich Leinsdorf will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight in a Brooklyn Academy of Music concert featuring Mozart's Posthorn Serenade and Stravinsky's Petrouchka. Tickets are available at the academy, 30 Lafayette Ave., or at Abraham & Straus and Bloomingdale's. For student and group rates, call 783-6700, extension 44.

CATHOLIC TRANSCRIPT
HARTFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY 75,000

OCT 30 1970

Pursued At

Annhurst Arts Center Steals The Show

By D. R. LESCARBEAU

South Woodstock — Residents of this small northeastern Connecticut community recently joined with the administration, faculty and students of Annhurst College in the dedication of the school's new Cultural Center. The light brick structure incorporates many unique features.

The opening of the Cultural Center marked the completion of the second phase of Annhurst's $5.5 million development program. The Catholic college for women is conducted by the Daughters of the Holy Spirit.

The arts complex contains a 1,018 seat auditorium, the largest theater in the area. It is equipped with a four story "fly-loft" over the stage for the storage of sets and props.

The auditorium is joined to the art and music wing by a spacious glassed-in lobby. The lobby can double as an organ recital hall.

The octagonal art and music wing contains a 66-seat "minitheater," an art and music library, several practice rooms and three music studios.

The second floor of this wing houses the art department, with studios for painting, drawing, sculpture and pottery. Central to this area is an octagonal art gallery.

The center was dedicated Oct. 11 by Bishop Vincent J. Hines of Norwich. The ceremonies included a concert by 19 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, known as the Boston Symphony Players.

The pictures on this page were taken at an open house the day after the dedication ceremonies.

Approaching building (above and top right), visitors admire large reflecting pool and fountain. Jo Ann Walsh, Denise Slachetka and Joan Beauregard (right), tour art exhibit in the second floor gallery.

e preparations for rtrude Bonin (left), te and Jeanne Gos- " Sister Gertrude Roque in electronic

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Director, Violin Soloist

RALPH GOMBERG
Oboe Soloist

SHERMAN WALT
Bassoon Soloist

University Soloists In Concert

(Photographs of new buildings to be dedicated Sunday at Annhurst College appear in this issue on page 10).

A major musical event for the area is scheduled for Sunday at 3:30 p. m., when the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players appear in a concert in the new Arts Center, which is to be dedicated along with Madonna Hall, a new dormitory for students.

The following program will be given for their Annhurst appearance.

Bach, Concerto in A minor for violin and strings. Allegro, Adagio, Allegro assai. Joseph Siverstein, soloist.

Vivaldi, Concerto in E minor for bassoon, Allegro, Largo, Allegro. Sherman Walt, soloist. for oboe, Largo, Allegro, Adagio, Allegro. Rlaph Gomberg, soloist.

Haydn, Concerto in C major

(Continued on Page 27)

WINDHAM COUNTY
OBSERVER
PUTNAM, CONN
WEEKLY 4,250

OCT 7 1970

—University

(Continued From Page 1)

for violins and orchestra. Allegro, Adagio, Allegro. Joseph Silvertstein, soloist.

Mozart, Serenade in G major, K. 525, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." Allegro no troppo, Andante, Menuet, Allegro molto.

BSO CHAMBER PLAYERS

31

BSO CHAMBER PLAYERS

Approaching build reflecting pool an Joan Beauregard (

Company members (far left) make last-minute preparations for "Death of a Salesman" in auditorium. Sister Gertrude Bonin (left), and Sister Stella Bergeron (right), coach Annette and Jeanne Gosselin as they perform duet in "mini-theater." Sister Gertrude (above) monitors Maria DeCompos and Rose Roque in electronic piano lab.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Director, Violin Soloist

RALPH GOMBERG
Oboe Soloist

SHERMAN WALT
Bassoon Soloist

University Soloists In Concert

(Photographs of new buildings to be dedicated Sunday at Annhurst College appear in this issue on page 10).

A major musical event for the area is scheduled for Sunday at 3:30 p. m., when the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players appear in a concert in the new Arts Center, which is to be dedicated along with Madonna Hall, a new dormitory for students.

The following program will be given for their Annhurst appearance.

Bach, Concerto in A minor for violin and strings. Allegro, Adagio, Allegro assai. Joseph Siverstein, soloist.

Vivaldi, Concerto in E minor for bassoon, Allegro, Largo, Allegro. Sherman Walt, soloist. for oboe, Largo, Allegro, Adagio, Allegro. Rlaph Gomberg, soloist.

Haydn, Concerto in C major

(Continued on Page 27)

WINDHAM COUNTY
OBSERVER
PUTNAM, CONN
WEEKLY 4,250

OCT 7 1970

—University

(Continued From Page 1)

for violins and orchestra. Allegro, Adagio, Allegro. Joseph Silvertstein, soloist.

Mozart, Serenade in G major, K. 525, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." Allegro no troppo, Andante, Menuet, Allegro molto.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CONCERT GALA

MASSACHUSETTS CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

SYMPHONY HALL

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING QUARTET

Sunday evening November 15 at 8.30

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
MAX HOBART violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
GERALD BERLIN clarinet, assisting artist

MOZART	Quartet in G major K. 387
RAVEL	Quartet in F
BRAHMS	Quintet for clarinet and strings

Tickets may be purchased at the Box Office, Symphony Hall or at The Civil Liberties Union, telephone 227-9459, 227-5210.

Ticket prices: $7.50, $5, $3.50, $2.

Payments made to the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation Inc. in excess of the purchase price of the tickets are deductible for Federal Income Tax purposes.

Proceeds will be devoted in their entirety to Massachusetts Civil Liberties activities.

String Quartet Will Present Concert Sunday

The Boston Symphony String Quartet will present a concert gala honoring the fiftieth anniversary of the Massachusetts Civil Liberties Union this Sunday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Members of the group are Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello.

The program will include quartets of Mozart (K. 387) and Ravel, and the Brahms Clarinet Quintet, with assisting artist Gerald Berlin. Tickets are available at Symphony Hall or at the Civil Liberties Union. Payments in excess of purchase price are deductible for federal income tax purposes. Proceeds will benefit the Union's Massachusetts activities.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,30F (S) 293,557

NOV 12 1970 N
En

Civil Liberties Union concert

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 16 1970 N
Engl

The Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts marked its 60th anniversary last night with a concert of chamber music by the Boston Symphony String Quartet in Symphony Hall. The concert featured an appearance by Gerald Berlin, a vice chairman of CLUM, as clarinet soloist.

The program included the Mozart Quartet in G-Major, K. 387; the Ravel Quartet in F, and the Brahms Clarinet Quintet in B-Minor, Op. 165.

Berlin, a lawyer and father of three boys, has been affiliated with CLUM since he came to Massachusetts 23 years ago. This was the fourth time he had performed with the Boston Symphony String Quartet in concerts of this type.

In addition to serving as a chairman in CLUM, Berlin has tried many cases for the organization. He is currently involved with the litigation concerning the musical "Hair."

When asked how he managed to practice law, attend to CLUM duties and still keep up with his muic, Berlin admitted that he did not practice every day unless he was working on something like the concert.

However, the musicians expect me to know what I'm doing when we perform," he said.

The members of the quartet, as well as Berlin, donated their time to the CLUM concert, the purpose of which was to raise funds for CLUM's Massachusetts litigation program.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CONCERT GALA

MASSACHUSETTS CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

SYMPHONY HALL

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING QUARTET

Sunday evening November 15 at 8.30

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
MAX HOBART violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
GERALD BERLIN clarinet, assisting artist

MOZART	Quartet in G major K. 387
RAVEL	Quartet in F
BRAHMS	Quintet for clarinet and strings

Tickets may be purchased at the Box Office, Symphony Hall or at The Civil Liberties Union, telephone 227-9459, 227-5210.

Ticket prices: $7.50, $5, $3.50, $2.

Payments made to the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation Inc. in excess of the purchase price of the tickets are deductible for Federal Income Tax purposes.

Proceeds will be devoted in their entirety to Massachusetts Civil Liberties activities.

String Quartet Will Present Concert Sunday

The Boston Symphony String Quartet will present a concert gala honoring the fiftieth anniversary of the Massachusetts Civil Liberties Union this Sunday at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. Members of the group are Joseph Silverstein and Max Hobart, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello.

The program will include quartets of Mozart (K. 387) and Ravel, and the Brahms Clarinet Quintet, with assisting artist Gerald Berlin. Tickets are available at Symphony Hall or at the Civil Liberties Union. Payments in excess of purchase price are deductible for federal income tax purposes. Proceeds will benefit the Union's Massachusetts activities.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 296,557

NOV 12 1970 N
En

Civil Liberties Union concert

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 16 1970 N
Engl

The Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts marked its 60th anniversary last night with a concert of chamber music by the Boston Symphony String Quartet in Symphony Hall. The concert featured an appearance by Gerald Berlin, a vice chairman of CLUM, as clarinet soloist.

The program included the Mozart Quartet in G-Major, K. 387; the Ravel Quartet in F, and the Brahms Clarinet Quintet in B-Minor, Op. 165.

Berlin, a lawyer and father of three boys, has been affiliated with CLUM since he came to Massachusetts 23 years ago. This was the fourth time he had performed with the Boston Symphony String Quartet in concerts of this type.

In addition to serving as a chairman in CLUM, Berlin has tried many cases for the organization. He is currently involved with the litigation concerning the musical "Hair."

When asked how he managed to practice law, attend to CLUM duties and still keep up with his muic, Berlin admitted that he did not practice every day unless he was working on something like the concert.

However, the musicians expect me to know what I'm doing when we perform," he said.

The members of the quartet, as well as Berlin, donated their time to the CLUM concert, the purpose of which was to raise funds for CLUM's Massachusetts litigation program.

S. Woodstock Center Opened With Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

SOUTH WOODSTOCK, Conn. — The high musical standard of the Boston Symphony Chamber Soloists did justice to the handsome new cultural center and dormitory at Annhurst College that were dedicated yesterday by Bishop Vincent J. Hines of the Norwich Diocese.

A conceet of baroque and classic works was played by 14 top ledger players from the Boston Symphony in the 1,018-seat theater.

Adjoining the tasteful brick-walled auditorium are a magnificent foyer, minitheater seating 66, studios, practice rooms and a fine arts library.

Welcoming Address

The audience of invited guests numbered about 800. A brief welcoming address was given by Sister Cecile Comtois, F.S.E., president of Annhurst. An all electrical award was presented by Frederick J. Riggs of the Connecticut Light and Power Company.

One of the auditorium's most valuable assets, in addition to beauty and comfort, is excellent acoustics.

Yesterday's program was a stringent test, consisting of fragile, filigreed works. Minutest details were clearly projected to all areas of the hall.

The only work of wide acquaintance was Mozart's G major Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Balance comprised valuable items best known to aficionados of chamber music.

Playing was such that all of it received engrossed attention.

Bach's A minor Concerto was beautifully lucid at an unrushed tempo. Although Joseph Silverstein's violin intonation wasn't perfection, his quality, phrasing and style were top order.

Silverstein and the ensemble gave Haydn's C major Concerto finely polished classic lines. It had symphonic stature and vitality. The soloist produced a vibrant tone in the rather naive largo with its plucked-string background.

Bassoon soloist Sherman Walt gave a stellar account of Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor. His tone retained its strenth through heavily note-populated passages. The slow movement was beautiful in sound and romantic in spirit.

Shortly after the start of Handel's Concerto in G minor, oboe soloist Ralph Gomberg seemed dissatisfied with the instrument and made a number of adjustments.

Whatever the problem, Gomberg played with a clear, vibrant tone that remained unwavering. His dexterity in the two swift movements was effortless and there was little spottiness in tone.

PROGRAM

Concerto in A minor, for violin and strings Joseph Silverstein, violin	Bach
Concerto in E minor for bassoon Sherman Walt, bassoon	Vivaldi
Concerto in G minor for oboe Ralph Gomberg, oboe	Handel
Concerto in C major for violin and orchestra Joseph Silverstein, violin	Haydn
Serenade in G major, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"	Mozart

Boston Symphony Group To Perform At Annhurst Dedication Exercises

The two latest buildings in Annhurst College's $5.5 million development program will be dedicated Sunday, October 11, at 3:30 p. m. by the Most Rev. Vincent J. Hines, Bishop of Norwich. More than 1000 invited guests are expected to attend the formal ceremonies for the Cultural Center, and Madonna Hall, a dormitory residence.

Highlight of the celebration will be the first use of the 1018-seat theater with a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The group consists of 16 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and includes three soloists: Joseph Silverstein, conductor and violinist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist; and Ralph Gomberg, oboeist. The concert will present works by Bach, Vivaldi, Handel, Haydn and Mozart. It will be the first of several such concerts given at the Center during the coming months.

During the dedication ceremonies, the college will be presented an all-electric award by Connecticut Light and Power Company.

The Cultural Center contains the largest theater in the area. The 1018 seats all provide an unobstructed view of the 4500 square foot stage. A 4-story high "fly-loft" over the stage houses settings and scenery.

The Fine Arts Building, devoted to art and music, is connected to the theater by a spacious and striking glassed-in lobby. The building has its own mini-theater seating 66 people and used for rehearsals and small concerts. It also houses numerous studios and practice rooms, as well as a music and fine arts library.

In front of the center, which is on the west side of Route 169, is a large reflecting pool and floodlit fountain.

Madonna Hall is a four-story residence hall accommodating 235 students living in single and double rooms. The building has 2 elevators. Both new buildings are all-electric and architecturally match the other structures built since 1965.

The dedication of the new buildings marks the completing of Phase two of Annhurst College's development program. Phase 1 was launched in 1965 with groundbreakings for Goundrey Hall, a 128-student residence hall; an academic-library building; and a student center containing dining halls, kitchen, bookstore, lounges, offices and meeting rooms.

Phase two began with the announcement of the Cultural Center and Madonna Hall in July, 1967.

Because of space limitations, the October 11 ceremonies will be for invited guests only. The following Sunday, October 18, an open house for the public will be held between 1 and 5 p. m., with both buildings open for inspection. Refreshments will be served at the Student Center.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra established a new role for its first desk members with the formation of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in 1964. Under the management of the orchestra, the Chamber Players offer numerous concerts of chamber music to the public, in Boston and across the country.

The Chamber Players are more flexible than a single ensemble with a fixed number of performers. They take advantage of their special situation to draw upon the wide variety of instrumental combinations available among the orchestra's virtuoso principal players. This enables them to present chamber music which is not frequently performed, from duos to septets and nonets, as well as works for the more standard ensembles.

They have recorded for RCA Victor, Desutche Grammaphon Gesellschaft mbH. Their first album, released in the spring of 1966, received a Grammy from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences as the year's best Chamber Music Performance. Their two subsequent albums have received much favorable critical acclaim. They have just recorded Fred Lerdahl's "Wake" for string trio, percussion, harp, and voice, under the auspices of the Acoustic Research Contemporary Music Project.

CULTURAL CENTER: A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra soloists will mark the dedication of the new Cultural Center at Annhurst Sunday.

NEW BUILDING AT ANNHURST: Madonna Hall, which will be dedicated on Sunday.

OCT 7

INCORRECT PAGINATION

32

Culture Comes to Harvard

By Michael J. Ryan

A LOT of people don't like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This has nothing to do with the quality of the music they play, or how they play it. A lot of people don't like the BSO because its ticket prices are high, its concerts are sold out, and it doesn't seem very sympathetic to the music lover without much money in his wallet.

The BSO knows that some people don't like it, and lately the orchestra management has been trying to improve its relations with the community, especially with students. Open rehearsals, student tickets, last-minute rush seats have brought the orchestra to a larger audience in the past few years, and improved its public image. But the BSO, like the Bruins, almost always sells out, and, unlike the Bruins, it doesn't offer its fans the option of watching performances on color TV in the privacy of their homes. One way the orchestra makes its music available to the people who can't get into Symphony Hall is the Sanders Theatre Series of the BSO Chamber Players, which starts this Sunday afternoon at 4. The orchestra accepts a financial loss to present the series of three concerts at Harvard every year, in the hope that a large proportion of the audience will come from the student community. The Chamber Players, who are the BSO's first chair soloists, use the opportunity to perform a variety of styles and periods chosen by the players themselves.

Joseph Silverstein is the BSO's concertmaster, and first violin of the Chamber Players. An affable middle-aged man with very long sideburns, he could pass for the principal of an affluent and progressive suburban high school. It is easy to understand why the BSO's press officers like to have him act as a spokesman for the orchestra: he has a pleasant, reassuring manner and a way of keeping in control of interviews. Sitting in a comfortable armchair in a Symphony Hall anteroom, he seems to actually enjoy being asked the same old questions once more. (As we talk, two Symphony Hall employees pass through. "Oh Joey," says the first, "are you being intervicwed?" And to me, "Be sure to write that he's groovy. The staff loves him.")

Silverstein is a remarkably un-phony man, who is sensitive to student criticism of the BSO. "Over the past seven years interest in the BSO on the part of the student community has eroded. With a student population of almost a quarter million around Boston, it would seem that the BSO is not doing its job." He talks of the effort the orchestra has made to win back students — the rush tickets, the open rehearsals, advisory committees of students from local colleges. The Sanders Theatre series, if it sold out, would still lose money for the BSO, he says, since subscriptions for the three concerts start at $4.00.

If the prices weren't enough to attract an audience, the performers and the program would be. The Chamber Players include some fine instrumentalists, among them flautist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, clarinetist Harold Wright, trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, and horn player James Stagliano. The programs, decided on co-operatively by the entire group, are diverse: this Sunday, the group will do a Rossini Quartet for Strings, Piston's Woodwind Quintet, and the Schubert Octet op. 166.

The Chamber Players give their concerts on the side, in addition to their orchestra duties. In order to get the experience of performing chamber works on a regular basis, they give up huge chunks of their time. "For the Schubert Octet, we will probably have had twenty-five hours of rehearsal," Silverstein says. A similar amount of time spent on every work on the program would amount to almost eighty hours of preparation for a single concert, over and above regular BSO rehearsals.

The Chamber Players are not complete sacrifices, of course. Playing in a chamber group is a beneficial, almost vital, experience for any first-rate instrumentalist. But the Sanders Theatre Series is a great benefit to the

HARVARD CRIMSON
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
(M) 4,500

DEC 12 1970

Boston Chamber Players: Brilliant Opening at Sanders

by Bob Blattner

"That was the best performance of this piece that I've ever heard," said Walter Hamor Piston on Sunday, December 13 after hearing his Quintet for Woodwinds performed by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The Quintet was one of three compositions in the well-balanced and brilliantly executed opening of the Sanders Theatre Concert Series.

The first half of the concert consisted of Rossini's Quartet no. 2 in A for Strings and the Quintet by Piston. The first movement of the quartet featured each of the four instruments in turn, while the last two favored the first violin, played by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This lively, cheerful piece was a good piece with which to open the concert on that miserable afternoon.

While there is no doubt that the performance of Piston's Quintet for Woodwinds (flute, clarinet, oboe, horn, basoon) was technically excellent, I found the composition itself somewhat long and boring. Fans of Dr. Piston (Harvard Class of '24, Professor of Music 1944-60) and of twentieth century music were pleasantly surprised when Piston, who had been sitting in the audience, came on stage to personally thank and congratulate each of the performers at the end of the quintet.

The second half of the program consisted of Schubert's Octet in F for Strings and Winds which lasted 56 minutes! The third movement was fiery and majestic, contrasting greatly with the fourth movement which was much slower – very melodious in parts. Each movement of the Octet is like a short composition in itself, and sometimes only a few of them are performed. It was quite an experience to hear the piece played in its entirety.

The concert provided a wide variety of music; there really was something for everyone. All the musicians were superb, displaying excellent intonation, timing and control.

The Boston Chamber Players was founded seven years ago. Since 1963, they have performed over 150 compositions and have recorded between 35 and 40 works of music.

The Chamber Players gave their first performances at Sanders Theatre, but left when construction work began nearby. For a few years, they performed at Jordan Hall. Then, last year, they returned to Sanders Theatre and began the Sanders Theatre Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra subsidizes the series and probably looses more money on it than on any other single venture. However, says Mr. Silverstein, the Boston Symphony feels it has a responsibility to offer good music to students at low prices. (Tickets for each performance range from $1.50-$3.00).

Unfortunately, only about 300 people attended the December 13th concert. Mr. Silverstein feels this was primarily due to poor weather conditions and the competition provided by other musical events on that day.

For their next two Sunday afternoon concerts (January 24 and February 14) The Chamber Players will perform selections from Brahms, Mendelssohn, Stravinsky, Mozart, Varese, Ravel and others.

For $1.50, you really cannot afford to miss them.

THE HARVARD INDEPENDENT

January 14-20, 1971

Chamber Players at Sanders Theater

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

With the Boston Symphony Chamber Players you never can tell if you are going to get performances or something just beyond sight-reading. Their Sanders Theater concert yesterday afternoon had two examples of each: real performances of Webern's String Trio, Op. 20 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello) and of Mendelssohn's D minor Piano Trio, Op. 49 (Silverstein and Eskin with Gilbert Kalish) but only an unfocused playing of the notes of the Brahms Trio for clarinet, cello, and piano, Op. 114 (Eskin and Kalish with Harold Wright) and of Varese's "Octandre" (Joseph Silverstein conducting an ensemble of seven winds and bass.)

It was a pleasure to hear Webern's fascinatingly spare yet dense Trio. The recognition of Webern has tended to work in favor of the more colorfully scored pieces. The Trio, written 1927, is exceedingly demanding for players and listeners and has not been done often in concert. (Curiously enough, after being so left alone, it gets another hearing in Cambridge quite soon — at the Feb. 2 Musica Viva concert at the Busch-Reisinger Museum.) The Silverstein-Fine-Eskin performance of it was lively as well as careful. As part of the carefulness, all three played from full scores rather than from individual parts. That was a very good idea, except insofar as it produced a couple of disruptively long pauses for page-turning (flap, crash, smack), though that is, I am sure, a fairly easily solved technical problem.

The Mendelssohn, a beautifully made, inventive piece in his elegantly impassioned vein, went with lots of energy and some brilliance, and I could imagine that with another pianist something exceptionally attractive might have come out. Kalish, two seasons ago, succeeded Richard Goode, who had in turn succeeded Claude Frank, both of whom had been first-rate. At the end of a year, Kalish was bumped in favor of the more glamorous Michael Tilson Thomas, whose playing failed to please his colleagues. So this year Kalish was brought back. Kalish is an intelligent, serious musician, and he gets around the keyboard all right; he is, however, a rather hard, inflexible and certainly charmless player, and both the Brahms and Mendelssohn Trios suffered from it.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377

JAN 25 1971

BSO in Chamber

It is nearly impossible for musical performers to retain their musical sensitivity and simultaneously belong to a large symphony orchestra. That was the message of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert last Sunday afternoon. The idea of forming a chamber music group from the ranks of the best Symphony players is an excellent one. Unfortunately, one leaves most of their concerts with a sense of deep frustration. Players who are paid all week to satisfy a conductor's ego seem to have the greatest difficulty in listening to each other and in reacting either subtly or spontaneously to the music they are playing.

The Players' program consisted of Rossini's String Quartet in A (with doublebass instead of viola), Piston's Woodwind Quintet and Schubert's great Octet for Strings and Winds. The Octet combines a beautiful sense of texture and instrumentation, a sensitively thought-out harmonic plan and the composer's characteristic lyricism.

The piece features soloistic contributions by the violin and clarinet. Messrs. Silverstein and Wright should have been the basis for an exquisite performance of the Octet. The former is a thoughtful musician with unusually solid technical endowments. The latter is one of my favorite clarinetists, controlled and exquisitely subtle. Silverstein's playing, although incredibly competent in every definable way, lacked the final touch of spontaneity. When Wright's slow movement solo dominated the music, a real performance took shape. The finale too had a robustness and energy otherwise lacking. Jules Eskin's lackadaisical playing in the trio section of the scherzo typified the rest of the performance.

The Rossini featured some lovely violinism from Silverstein, but it is a poor excuse for a string quartet. The Piston is a fine and charming contribution to the wind literature. One could hardly deduce that from the Players' performance, which combined inattention to detail with a general joyless apathy. It made me wonder why the concert was given.

—M. F.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY

DEC 28 1970

BSO chamber music

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have announced their 1970-71 series of three concerts to be presented on Sunday afternoons at 4 p.m. in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the auspices of the Harvard University Department of Music and the Boston Symphony. The membership of the chamber group comprises all first desk players in the orchestra.

Rossini's Quartet for Strings, Walter Piston's Quintet for Horn and Woodwinds, and the Schubert Octet for Strings and Winds were heard on the opening program on Dec. 3. Pianist Gilbert Kalish will be the guest in the programs on Jan. 24 and Feb. 14. Subscriptions are available at Symphony Hall, and through ticket services at Harvard, Boston University, and MIT.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,859

DEC 18 1970

WHRB HARVARD RADIO BROADCASTING CO., INC.
45 QUINCY STREET CAMBRIDGE, MASS. 02138
TELEPHONE 864-9550

REVIEW OF BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS CONCERT
OF 2/14/71; BROADCAST ON WHRB 2/15 . by PERRIN WHITE

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players came to Sanders Theater yesterday for their third and last of a series of concerts jointly sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard University Department of Music. This group consists of the principal players of the various sections of the orchestra.

The program opened with Mozart's Piano Quartet in E flat, K.493. This was performed by Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, 'cello, Burton Fine, viola; the guest pianist was Gilbert Kalish. Their rendition was quite competent but, while the musicians looked as if they were quite moved by the music, this didn't really come through in the performance, This Mozart is lovely music and I would have liked a less restrained approach.

Next was Riegger's Concerto for piano and woodwinds Op.53, a twentieth century American work. Performers forthis work were Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Harold Wright, clarinet, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon and James Stagliano, horn. The pianist was again Mr. Kalish. The style in this work runs from the edge of atonality in the middle movement to a Stravinskyish neoclassicsm in the last movement. The performance was about as nice as one could ask for, and the music itself was not unpleasant to listen to, but this work ed of two ction and Allegro

t, and the famous rformers for Ann Hobson, harp,
If I close my ne stars coming ic for the soul.
ernoon, both in
I thought the tone well have been trumpet, bassoom, luded William Gibson,

Firth. The piece
st narration,
he uninterrupted over four minutes),
r disjointed
no reflection

hich is quite an scheduled in the served it. This iated with

Harvard's Music Department and it is to be hoped that we have the Boston Symphony Players in Cambridge next season.

First Desk Men

RECORDS IN REVIEW

SCHUBERT: Trio in B-flat, Op. 99, for violin, cello and piano; MILHAUD: Pastorale for oboe, clarinet and bassoon; HINDEMITH: Kleine Kammermusik, Op. 24 No. 2, for woodwind quintet; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA Stereo.

This is the recording that Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, told us at the New College Music Festival last spring would be issued shortly. He referred, of course, to the Schubert Trio, which he performed at the festival with Jules Eskin and Leonid Hambro. The only change in personnel is the pianist; here it is Claude Frank.

It is the general impression that orchestra men cannot perform chamber music with the same kind of total responsiveness and philosophic dedication as long-established chamber groups who play nothing else. This Schubert performance, however, belies the theory.

The change-about may have come because orchestra players are more and more varying their repertoires with chamber music played with colleagues, and oftener and oftener putting in strenuous weeks at chamber music festivals.

PERHAPS what it boils down to now is that groups of virtuosos cannot play chamber music with the same rhapsodic skill as died-in-the-wool chamber players; we still consider that a truism.

The protagonists here follow the music, never ride it and never push it. They sound personally comfortable and happy with it, absorbed in it, delighted by its grace, beauty and wealth of enchanting lyricism.

There is not a great deal of dynamic change throughout the four movements, but in the B-flat Trio that's not really wanted. The players propel the work with a kind of dreamy precision that is delightful. They understand it, they have the technical accomplishments to do it well, and they give themselves to it. That's more than enough.

Joseph Silverstein
. . . Shubert trio

Floyd Cramer
. . . 'pops' from Nashville

THE TWO wind pieces are also beautifully performed — the Milhaud by Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, and Sherman Walt, bassoon, and the Hindemith by Doriot Anthony, flute, James Stagliano, horn, and Gomberg, Cioffi and Walt.

The five-movement early Hindemith piece is the more important and musically distinguished. The Milhaud is a slight but sound little work that can fill in nicely on all-wind programs.

This is the fourth disc produced by first-desk men of the Boston Symphony. Pianist Frank is a guest.

—Reviewed by Doris Rene

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,009 SUN. 443,090
SEP 20 1970

There are two excellent new records of the wonderful B flat major Trio, Op. 99 an expansive, luscious performance by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin and Maurice Gendron (Angel) and another, leaner in sound and in some ways musically more concentrated, by Claude Frank, Joseph Silverstein, and Jules Eskin, all of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (RCA).

Both have given me great pleasure, the Boston one on balance even more so. The fillers might help you decide: the Menuhins give an innocuous Trio movement, also in B flat, by the 15-year old Schubert; Boston, less congruously, Milhaud's Pastorale for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon, and Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik" for wind quintet, played professionally, but without distinction, by other members of the Chamber Players.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377
NOV 1 1970

Listening to
BSO Group and MIT Symphony

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Quick notes on two Sunday concerts in the crowded calendar that are worth remembering.

At Sanders Theater in the afternoon the BSO Chamber Players did a distinguished job on Rossini's Quartet for Strings (No. 2, in A), Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956) and the Schubert Octet for winds and strings. The two violins, cello and double bass (Rossini) gave a warm reading to a novelty worth resurrecting—first movement thoroughly developed through all instruments (somewhere between Haydn and Schubert in style). The second a lovely Italian Andantino — singing melody — the third a lilting counterpoint. Piston's Quintet has never had a more skilful and eloquent performance (the composer was pleased).

The complexities of rhythm and counterpoint were clean, exciting and — in the second movement — moving. Nothing in Piston is ever cliche or complacent and the first-desk players kept it balanced with keen life from inside-out. The addition of Harold Wright's sensitive musicianship on the clarinet now equalizes the Chamber Players (as it does the Symphony).

His playing in the Octet, where his role is especially important (without flute and oboe) gave the final touch to another magnificent performance of a unique work. It can sound clumsy, for all its inspiration, but here all was glowing without strain. Of the six movements, the second (Adagio) got closest to the troubled dream of Schubert. Silverstein's leadership was unobtrusively perfect.

Joseph Silverstein then put on his tails and soloed with David Epstein's M.I.T. Symphony, in the evening, at Kresge Auditorium. The large orchestra had done its homework for an ambitious program of Schubert (Unfinished), Perle (Three Movements for Orchestra, 1960) and the great Violin Concerto by Alban Berg. Schubert was warmly alive and still satisfying. Perle was an interesting pattern of complex chord building and change — good practice for students and audience to listen harmonically —relatively static. The Berg, now a treasured classic of 'modern music — had all of history in it, plus new sounds and sensibilities. Silverstein played with all-out warmth of tone and virtuosity in this so-human work, somehow responsive to the youth of the orchestra and the full-house of young audience. Orchestra and conductor did well with a difficult score, synchronizing in time and intention, but only seldom finding the delicate combinations of tone that sounded in the ear of Berg. It was a valuable effort and approximation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
DEC 17 1970

was nonetheless rather ordinary.

The second half of the program consisted of two somewhat better known works: Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, string quartet, flute and clarinet, and the famous L'Histoire du Soldat by Igor Stravinsky. Performers for the first included Max Hobart, violin, and Ann Hobson, harp, in addition to already mentioned personnel. If I close my eyes while listening to this piece, I see the stars coming out on a late summer night....it's good music for the soul. This was the best-performed piece of the afternoon, both in this reviewer's and the audiences' opinion. I thought the tone of Ann Hobson's harp a bit dry, but this may well have been due to the acoustics of the hall.

The Stravinsky is written for trombone, trumpet, bassoom, clarinet, bass and percussion. Musicians included William Gibson, Armando Ghitalla, Henry Fortnoi and Everett Firth. The piece normally has three speaking parts, or at least narration, but for time reasons was here performed as the uninterrupted suite. As the movements are very short (none over four minutes), this is one of those works that sounds rather disjointed without the spoken parts. This is of course no reflection of the players' fine performance.

The chamber players had a full house, which is quite an improvement over the second concert which was scheduled in the middle of Harvard's exam period. They well deserved it. This is one of the most profitable endeavors associated with Harvard's Music Department and it is to be hoped that we have the Boston Symphony Players in Cambridge next season.

First Desk Men

RECORDS IN REVIEW

SCHUBERT: Trio in B-flat, Op. 99, for violin, cello and piano; MILHAUD: Pastorale for oboe, clarinet and bassoon; HINDEMITH: Kleine Kammermusik, Op. 24 No. 2, for woodwind quintet; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA Stereo.

This is the recording that Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, told us at the New College Music Festival last spring would be issued shortly. He referred, of course, to the Schubert Trio, which he performed at the festival with Jules Eskin and Leonid Hambro. The only change in personnel is the pianist; here it is Claude Frank.

It is the general impression that orchestra men cannot perform chamber music with the same kind of total responsiveness and philosophic dedication as long-established chamber groups who play nothing else. This Schubert performance, however, belies the theory.

The change-about may have come because orchestra players are more and more varying their repertoires with chamber music played with colleagues, and oftener and oftener putting in strenuous weeks at chamber music festivals.

PERHAPS what it boils down to now is that groups of virtuosos cannot play chamber music with the same rhapsodic skill as died-in-the-wool chamber players; we still consider that a truism.

The protagonists here follow the music, never ride it and never push it. They sound personally comfortable and happy with it, absorbed in it, delighted by its grace, beauty and wealth of enchanting lyricism.

There is not a great deal of dynamic change throughout the four movements, but in the B-flat Trio that's not really wanted. The players propel the work with a kind of dreamy precision that is delightful. They understand it, they have the technical accomplishments to do it well, and they give themselves to it. That's more than enough.

Joseph Silverstein
. . . Shubert trio

Floyd Cramer
. . . 'pops' from Nashville

THE TWO wind pieces are also beautifully performed — the Milhaud by Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, and Sherman Walt, bassoon, and the Hindemith by Doriot Anthony, flute, James Stagliano, horn, and Gomberg, Cioffi and Walt.

The five-movement early Hindemith piece is the more important and musically distinguished. The Milhaud is a slight but sound little work that can fill in nicely on all-wind programs.

This is the fourth disc produced by first-desk men of the Boston Symphony. Pianist Frank is a guest.

—Reviewed by Doris Reno

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,009 SUN. 443,090

SEP 20 1970

There are two excellent new records of the wonderful B flat major Trio, Op. 99 an expansive, luscious performance by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin and Maurice Gendron (Angel) and another, leaner in sound and in some ways musically more concentrated, by Claude Frank, Joseph Silverstein, and Jules Eskin, all of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (RCA).

Both have given me great pleasure, the Boston one on balance even more so. The fillers might help you decide: the Menuhins give an innocuous Trio movement, also in B flat, by the 15-year old Schubert; Boston, less congruously, Milhaud's Pastorale for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon, and Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik" for wind quintet, played professionally, but without distinction, by other members of the Chamber Players.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

NOV 1 1970

Listening to
BSO Group and MIT Symphony

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Quick notes on two Sunday concerts in the crowded calendar that are worth remembering.

At Sanders Theater in the afternoon the BSO Chamber Players did a distinguished job on Rossini's Quartet for Strings (No. 2, in A), Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956) and the Schubert Octet for winds and strings. The two violins, cello and double bass (Rossini) gave a warm reading to a novelty worth resurrecting—first movement thoroughly developed through all instruments (somewhere between Haydn and Schubert in style). The second a lovely Italian Andantino — singing melody — the third a lilting counterpoint. Piston's Quintet has never had a more skilful and eloquent performance (the composer was pleased).

The complexities of rhythm and counterpoint were clean, exciting and — in the second movement — moving. Nothing in Piston is ever cliche or complacent and the first-desk players kept it balanced with keen life from inside-out. The addition of Harold Wright's sensitive musicianship on the clarinet now equalizes the Chamber Players (as it does the Symphony).

His playing in the Octet, where his role is especially important (without flute and oboe) gave the final touch to another magnificent performance of a unique work. It can sound clumsy, for all its inspiration, but here all was glowing without strain. Of the six movements, the second (Adagio) got closest to the troubled dream of Schubert. Silverstein's leadership was unobtrusively perfect.

Joseph Silverstein then put on his tails and soloed with David Epstein's M.I.T. Symphony, in the evening, at Kresge Auditorium. The large orchestra had done its homework for an ambitious program of Schubert (Unfinished), Perle (Three Movements for Orchestra, 1960) and the great Violin Concerto by Alban Berg. Schubert was warmly alive and still satisfying. Perle was an interesting pattern of complex chord building and change — good practice for students and audience to listen harmonically —relatively static. The Berg, now a treasured classic of 'modern music — had all of history in it, plus new sounds and sensibilities. Silverstein played with all-out warmth of tone and virtuoslty in this so-human work, somehow responsive to the youth of the orchestra and the full-house of young audience. Orchestra and conductor did well with a difficult score, synchronizing in time and intention, but only seldom finding the delicate combinations of tone that sounded in the ear of Berg. It was a valuable effort and approximation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

DEC 17 1970

was nonetheless rather ordinary.

The second half of the program consisted of two somewhat better known works: Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, string quartet, flute and clarinet, and the famous L'Histoire du Soldat by Igor Stravinsky. Performers for the first included Max Robart, violin, and Ann Hobson, harp, in addition to already mentioned personnel. If I close my eyes while listening to this piece, I see the stars coming out on a late summer night....it's good music for the soul. This was the best-performed piece of the afternoon, both in this reviewer's and the audiences' opinion. I thought the tone of Ann Hobson's harp a bit dry, but this may well have been due to the acoustics of the hall.

The Stravinsky is written for trombone, trumpet, bassoon, clarinet, bass and percussion. Musicians included William Gibson, Armando Ghitalla, Henry Fortnoi and Everett Firth. The piece normally has three speaking parts, or at least narration, but for time reasons was here performed as the uninterrupted suite. As the movements are very short (none over four minutes), this is one of those works that sounds rather disjointed without the spoken parts. This is of course no reflection of the players' fine performance.

The chamber Players had a full house, which is quite an improvement over the second concert which was scheduled in the middle of Harvard's exam period. They well deserved it. This is one of the most profitable endeavors associated with Harvard's Music Department and it is to be hoped that we have the Boston Symphony Players in Cambridge next season.

First Desk Men

RECORDS IN REVIEW

SCHUBERT: Trio in B-flat, Op. 99, for violin, cello and piano; MILHAUD: Pastorale for oboe, clarinet and bassoon; HINDEMITH: Kleine Kammermusik, Op. 24 No. 2, for woodwind quintet; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA Stereo.

Joseph Silverstein
. . . Shubert trio

Floyd Cramer
. . . 'pops' from Nashville

This is the recording that Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, told us at the New College Music Festival last spring would be issued shortly. He referred, of course, to the Schubert Trio, which he performed at the festival with Jules Eskin and Leonid Hambro. The only change in personnel is the pianist; here it is Claude Frank.

It is the general impression that orchestra men cannot perform chamber music with the same kind of total responsiveness and philosophic dedication as long-established chamber groups who play nothing else. This Schubert performance, however, belies the theory.

The change-about may have come because orchestra players are more and more varying their repertoires with chamber music played with colleagues, and oftener and oftener putting in strenuous weeks at chamber music festivals.

PERHAPS what it boils down to now is that groups of virtuosos cannot play chamber music with the same rhapsodic skill as died-in-the-wool chamber players; we still consider that a truism.

The protagonists here follow the music, never ride it and never push it. They sound personally comfortable and happy with it, absorbed in it, delighted by its grace, beauty and wealth of enchanting lyricism.

There is not a great deal of dynamic change throughout the four movements, but in the B-flat Trio that's not really wanted. The players propel the work with a kind of dreamy precision that is delightful. They understand it, they have the technical accomplishments to do it well, and they give themselves to it. That's more than enough.

THE TWO wind pieces are also beautifully performed — the Milhaud by Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, and Sherman Walt, bassoon, and the Hindemith by Doriot Anthony, flute, James Stagliano, horn, and Gomberg, Cioffi and Walt.

The five-movement early Hindemith piece is the more important and musically distinguished. The Milhaud is a slight but sound little work that can fill in nicely on all-wind programs.

This is the fourth disc produced by first-desk men of the Boston Symphony. Pianist Frank is a guest.

—Reviewed by Doris Reno

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,009 SUN. 443,090

SEP 20 1970

There are two excellent new records of the wonderful B flat major Trio, Op. 99 an expansive, luscious performance by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin and Maurice Gendron (Angel) and another, leaner in sound and in some ways musically more concentrated, by Claude Frank, Joseph Silverstein, and Jules Eskin, all of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (RCA).

Both have given me great pleasure, the Boston one on balance even more so. The fillers might help you decide: the Menuhins give an innocuous Trio movement, also in B flat, by the 15-year old Schubert; Boston, less congruously, Milhaud's Pastorale for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon, and Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik" for wind quintet, played professionally, but without distinction, by other members of the Chamber Players.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E
(S) 566,377

NOV 1 1970

Listening to
BSO Group and MIT Symphony

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Quick notes on two Sunday concerts in the crowded calendar that are worth remembering.

At Sanders Theater in the afternoon the BSO Chamber Players did a distinguished job on Rossini's Quartet for Strings (No. 2, in A), Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956) and the Schubert Octet for winds and strings. The two violins, cello and double bass (Rossini) gave a warm reading to a novelty worth resurrecting—first movement thoroughly developed through all instruments (somewhere between Haydn and Schubert in style). The second a lovely Italian Andantino — singing melody — the third a lilting counterpoint. Piston's Quintet has never had a more skilful and eloquent performance (the composer was pleased).

The complexities of rhythm and counterpoint were clean, exciting and — in the second movement — moving. Nothing in Piston is ever cliche or complacent and the first-desk players kept it balanced with keen life from inside-out. The addition of Harold Wright's sensitive musicianship on the clarinet now equalizes the Chamber Players (as it does the Symphony).

His playing in the Octet, where his role is especially important (without flute and oboe) gave the final touch to another magnificent performance of a unique work. It can sound clumsy, for all its inspiration, but here all was glowing without strain. Of the six movements, the second (Adagio) got closest to the troubled dream of Schubert. Silverstein's leadership was unobtrusively perfect.

Joseph Silverstein then put on his tails and soloed with David Epstein's M.I.T. Symphony, in the evening, at Kresge Auditorium. The large orchestra had done its homework for an ambitious program of Schubert (Unfinished), Perle (Three Movements for Orchestra, 1960) and the great Violin Concerto by Alban Berg. Schubert was warmly alive and still satisfying. Perle was an interesting pattern of complex chord building and change — good practice for students and audience to listen harmonically —relatively static. The Berg, now a treasured classic of 'modern music — had all of history in it, plus new sounds and sensibilities. Silverstein played with all-out warmth of tone and virtuosity in this so-human work, somehow responsive to the youth of the orchestra and the full-house of young audience. Orchestra and conductor did well with a difficult score, synchronizing in time and intention, but only seldom finding the delicate combinations of tone that sounded in the ear of Berg. It was a valuable effort and approximation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON
WEEKLY

DEC 17 1970

BLANK PAGE

34

RADIO AND TV ANNOUNCEMENTS

Pianist Grant Johannesen In Beethoven Concerto

Beethoven's Emperor Concerto is performed by Pianist Gran Johannesen and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf on NET Festival, Tuesday, Sept. 22 at 9 p.m. in color on the New Hampshire Network, channels 11 Durham, 15 Hanover, 40 Berlin, 49 Littleton and 52 Keene.

As a part of the observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the program includes an informal studio session in which Mr. Johannesen demonstrates the "infinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 (much like one once owned by Beethoven himself) and on a moder Steinway.

The pianist contrasts the sound and construction of both pianos noting that Beethoven composed pieces which pianos of his day could not accomodate. Mr. Johannesen, who has been playing the Beethoven piano concertos for most of his professional life, has often wondered what a performance would be like on a piano of Beethoven's time. He played a Broadwood for the first time on this program.

OBSERVOR
SALEM, N. H.
WEEKLY 5,500

SEP 16 1970

Beethoven's Works Featured in Show

As part of the observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, WBRA-TV will present a program devoted to the composer's "Emperor" Concerto Tuesday at 9 p.m. on Channel 15.

The major segment will feature pianist Grant Johannesen performing the "Emperor" (Concerto No. 5 in E Flat) with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The NET Festival program, entitled "Beethoven: The Emperor," will also include an informal studio session in which Johannesen demonstrates the "infinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 and on a modern Steinway. The antique was built by John Broadwood of London.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
D. 49,000

SEP 19 1970

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 4,500

SEP 23 1970

8 - 9 (13) NET FESTIVAL. "Beethoven: The Emporer." As part of a celebration of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, a special treat featuring pianist Grant Johannesen as soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, filmed in Tanglewood, Mass.

NET Festival — "Beethoven: The Emperor." Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" is performed by pianist Grant Johannesen and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. We are also privy to an informal scene with Johannesen playing an 1804 Broadwood piano, similar to that used by Beethoven. (Channel 13, 8 p.m., C.)

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
D. 32,000

SEP 23 1970

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 144,038 SUN. 198,228

SEP 20 1970

Beethoven: Special Set for Airing Tuesday

As part of its observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, NET will present a program devoted to the composer's "Emperor" Concerto at 9 Tuesday night on WCVE's Channel 23 (UHF).

The major segment will feature pianist Grant Johannesen performing the "Emperor" (Concerto No. 5 in E Flat) with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "NET Festival" program, entitled "Beethoven: The Emperor," also will include an informal studio session in which Johannesen demonstrates the "intinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 and on a modern Steinway. The antique was built by John Broadwood of London and is very similar to one that was owned by Beethoven himself.

The pianist contrasts the sound and construction of both pianos, noting that Beethoven composed pieces that pianos of his day could not accommodate. Johannesen, who has been playing the Beethoven piano concertos for most of his professional life, has often wondered what a performance would be like on a piano of Beethoven's time. He played a Broadwood for the first time on this program.

The "NET Festival" program concludes with the performance of Beethoven's "Emperor," filmed at Tanglewood."

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

OCT 1 1970

Four Channel Stereo Concerts Presented By WGBH and WCRB

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season Sept. 25 and for the 13th consecutive year all Friday and Saturday concerts will be broadcast by WGBH radio live from Symphony Hall.

The Friday programs at 2 p.m. will be in two-channel stereo, the Saturday concerts at 8:30 p.m. in four-channel stereo with WCRB AM and FM.

This is the second season the two stations have joined forces to offer live concerts in four-channel stereo, making Boston the only city in the country where this kind of broadcast can be heard on a regular basis.

For his opening concerts on Sept. 25 and 26, the Boston Symphony's music director William Steinberg has chosen three works: "The Planets," Op. 51 by Gustav Holst; "Paths", a symphonic elegy by Partos; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7. The New England Conservatory Women's Chorus will join the Boston Symphony in the Holst work.

WGBH-FM will also broadcast most of the orchestra's Tuesday concerts, live from Symphony Hall in two-channel stereo.

"Bracken's World" episode and doing a dramatic reading on a Tom Jones show.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra colorcast of the season will be aired Friday evening, Oct. 9, on Ch. 2 at 9 p.m. William Steinberg will conduct and the soloist will be pianist Theodore Lettvin. Two other colorcasts have been scheduled for Friday evenings.

On Oct. 30, Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct, and on Nov. 13 the conductor will be Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa.

There's no end to the versatility of Charles Nelson Reilly who is now on the Dean Martin show. He writes commercials and has had over 20 on the air. Several have won awards.

When PERRY COMO visits Flip Wilson's show Thurs-

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 1 1970

BUZZ OF THE BURG

By ING

QUOTE FOR TODAY — "Only the ignorant know everything." — Dagobert D. Runes.

THOUGHTS WHILE SITTING — On Tuesday, Sept. 22, we listened to a Beethoven program by the Boston symphony on Channel 7. The featured pianist in this finished production was Grant Johannsen. Members of the Pocatello Community Concert Association will recall having heard this great artist in one of the Association's programs in Frazier Hall in Pocatello. Over the years it is remarkable the number of great artists who have appeared on our local programs, many of wifom were just at the beginnings of their rising careers when they made their Pocatello appearances.....

POCATELLO, IDAHO
IDAHO STATE JOURNAL
D. 15,500

OCT 5 1970

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

OCT 18 1970

2nd Tanglewood Concert Monday

By JENNIE LEA BIRD

The second in the series of beautiful Tanglewood concerts will be heard Monday at 9 p.m. over WBAL-FM.

Performed and recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last July 31, the all-Beethoven concert presentation was done in memory of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell. Claude Frank is featured as piano soloist.

Opening the program is the "Marcia Funebre" from Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat, opus 55 "Eroica." Claude Frank performs Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, opus 19; followed by the Overture to "Leonore No. 3," opus 72b; and Symphony No. 8 in F, opus 93.

Station WBAL-FM, long known as Maryland's fine arts radio station, has launched an experiment in programming with the presentation of rock music, broadcast in stereo, nightly, Mondays through Saturdays, following the 11 p.m. news.

"The Rosko Show" deriving its name from its host Rosko, otherwise known as William Mercer, who originated the show's format, gives contemporary music a chance to be heard in a manner which is not necessarily incompatible with the station's fine arts image. It includes a mixture of progressive rock, folk music, jazz, blues, with some numbers last-

WILLIAM STEINBERG
... Conducts Boston Symphony

ing up to nine minutes, performed by serious musicians.

RADIO AND TV ANNOUNCEMENTS

Pianist Grant Johannesen In Beethoven Concerto

Beethoven's Emperor Concerto is performed by Pianist Gran Johannesen and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf on NET Festival, Tuesday, Sept. 22 at 9 p.m. in color on the New Hampshire Network, channels 11 Durham, 15 Hanover, 40 Berlin, 49 Littleton and 52 Keene.

As a part of the observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the program includes an informal studio session in which Mr. Johannesen demonstrates the "infinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 (much like one once owned by Beethoven himself) and on a moder Steinway.

The pianist contrasts the sound and construction of both pianos noting that Beethoven composed pieces which pianos of his day could not accomodate. Mr. Johannesen, who has been playing the Beethoven piano concertos for most of his professional life, has often wondered what a performance would be like on a piano of Beethoven's time. He played a Broadwood for the first time on this program.

OBSERVOR
SALEM, N. H.
WEEKLY 5,500

SEP 16 1970

Beethoven's Works Featured in Show

As part of the observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, WBRA-TV will present a program devoted to the composer's "Emperor" Concerto Tuesday at 9 p.m. on Channel 15.

The major segment will feature pianist Grant Johannesen performing the "Emperor" (Concerto No. 5 in E Flat) with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The NET Festival program, entitled "Beethoven: The Emperor," will also include an informal studio session in which Johannesen demonstrates the "infinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 and on a modern Steinway. The antique was built by John Broadwood of London.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
D. 49,000

SEP 19 1970

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 4,500

SEP 23 1970

8 - 9 (13) NET FESTIVAL. "Beethoven: The Emporer." As part of a celebration of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, a special treat featuring pianist Grant Johannesen as soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, filmed in Tanglewood, Mass.

NET Festival — "Beethoven: The Emperor." Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" is performed by pianist Grant Johannesen and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. We are also privy to an informal scene with Johannesen playing an 1804 Broadwood piano, similar to that used by Beethoven. (Channel 13, 8 p.m., C.)

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
D. 32,000

SEP 23 1970

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 144,039 SUN. 192,228

SEP 20 1970

Beethoven: Special Set for Airing Tuesday

As part of its observance of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth, NET will present a program devoted to the composer's "Emperor" Concerto at 9 Tuesday night on WCVE's Channel 23 (UHF).

The major segment will feature pianist Grant Johannesen performing the "Emperor" (Concerto No. 5 in E Flat) with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "NET Festival" program, entitled "Beethoven: The Emperor," also will include an informal studio session in which Johannesen demonstrates the "infinite variety of Beethoven's writing" on a Broadwood piano built in 1804 and on a modern Steinway. The antique was built by John Broadwood of London and is very similar to one that was owned by Beethoven himself.

The pianist contrasts the sound and construction of both pianos, noting that Beethoven composed pieces that pianos of his day could not accommodate. Johannesen, who has been playing the Beethoven piano concertos for most of his professional life, has often wondered what a performance would be like on a piano of Beethoven's time. He played a Broadwood for the first time on this program.

The "NET Festival" program concludes with the performance of Beethoven's "Emperor," filmed at Tanglewood."

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

OCT 1 1970

Four Channel Stereo Concerts Presented By WGBH and WCRB

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 90th season Sept. 25 and for the 13th consecutive year all Friday and Saturday concerts will be broadcast by WGBH radio live from Symphony Hall.

The Friday programs at 2 p.m. will be in two-channel stereo, the Saturday concerts at 8:30 p.m. in four-channel stereo with WCRB AM and FM.

This is the second season the two stations have joined forces to offer live concerts in four-channel stereo, making Boston the only city in the country where this kind of broadcast can be heard on a regular basis.

For his opening concerts on Sept. 25 and 26, the Boston Symphony's music director William Steinberg has chosen three works: "The Planets," Op. 51 by Gustav Holst; "Paths", a symphonic elegy by Partos; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7. The New England Conservatory Women's Chorus will join the Boston Symphony in the Holst work.

WGBH-FM will also broadcast most of the orchestra's Tuesday concerts, live from Symphony Hall in two-channel stereo.

"Bracken's World" episode and doing a dramatic reading on a Tom Jones show.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra colorcast of the season will be aired Friday evening, Oct. 9, on Ch. 2 at 9 p.m. William Steinberg will conduct and the soloist will be pianist Theodore Lettvin. Two other colorcasts have been scheduled for Friday evenings.

On Oct. 30, Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct, and on Nov. 13 the conductor will be Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa.

There's no end to the versatility of Charles Nelson Reilly who is now on the Dean Martin show. He writes commercials and has had over 20 on the air. Several have won awards.

When PERRY COMO visits Flip Wilson's show, Thurs-

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

OCT 1 1970

BUZZ OF THE BURG

By ING

QUOTE FOR TODAY — "Only the ignorant know everything." — Dagobert D. Runes.

THOUGHTS WHILE SITTING — On Tuesday, Sept. 22, we listened to a Beethoven program by the Boston symphony on Channel 7. The featured pianist in this finished production was Grant Johannsen. Members of the Pocatello Community Concert Association will recall having heard this great artist in one of the Association's programs in Frazier Hall in Pocatello. Over the years it is remarkable the number of great artists who have appeared on our local programs, many of whom were just at the beginnings of their rising careers when they made their Pocatello appearances.....

POCATELLO, IDAHO
IDAHO STATE JOURNAL
D. 13,500

OCT 5 1970

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,590 SUN. 318,425

OCT 18 1970

2nd Tanglewood Concert Monday

By JENNIE LEA BIRD

The second in the series of beautiful Tanglewood concerts will be heard Monday at 9 p.m. over WBAL-FM.

Performed and recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last July 31, the all-Beethoven concert presentation was done in memory of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell. Claude Frank is featured as piano soloist.

Opening the program is the "Marcia Funebre" from Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat, opus 55 "Eroica." Claude Frank performs Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, opus 19; followed by the Overture to "Leonore No. 3," opus 72b; and Symphony No. 8 in F, opus 93.

Station WBAL-FM, long known as Maryland's fine arts radio station, has launched an experiment in programming with the presentation of rock music, broadcast in stereo, nightly, Mondays through Saturdays, following the 11 p.m. news.

"The Rosko Show" deriving its name from its host Rosko, otherwise known as William Mercer, who originated the show's format, gives contemporary music a chance to be heard in a manner which is not necessarily incompatible with the station's fine arts image. It includes a mixture of progressive rock, folk music, jazz, blues, with some numbers lasting up to nine minutes, performed by serious musicians.

WILLIAM STEINBERG ... Conducts Boston Symphony

36

Sunday Radio Classics

Classical music scheduled to be broadcast over radio stations WTIP and WTIO-FM at 5 p.m. today includes:

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in D Minor, Op. 74" with Dimitri Mitropolus conducting the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; and Rachmaninoff's "Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, Op. 18" featuring Ivan Davis at the piano with the Andre Kostelanetz Orchestra.

At 9:30 p.m. the stations will air "Selections from the Masters" by the Boston Pops, Boston Symphony and the RCA Victor Orchestras.

George Gershwins "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Concerto in F" will be performed by Phillipe Entremont with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra at 10 p.m.

At 10:30 p.m. excerpts from "Fiddler on the Roof" starring the original cast will be broadcast.

CHARLESTON W. VA.
GAZETTE-MAIL
SUN. 107,000
NOV 29 1970

HAMPTON NEWS BUREAU
Hampton, N.H.

TIMES
NEWMARKET, N. H.
WEEKLY 1,500

New England
DEC 2 1970 DEC 2 1970

A series of thirteen monthly concerts will be brought to New Hampshire viewers on channel 11 through arrangements made with the cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, WGBH–TV, and the N.H. friends of the BSO. Beginning in January of 1971 and continuing through January of 1972 the concerts will be presented on Fridays at 9 p.m.
(Photo Courtesy of N.H. Network)

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
DEC 27 1970

FM's Best Bets

(Selected by Byron Belt

TODAY

12:05-3 WNCN (104.3) Special program with Mate Edwards featuring music of Anton Bruckner's little-known composition pupil Franz Schmidt.

5-5:55 WNYC (93.9) DAVID RANDOLPH CONCERT. Noted commentator and conductor features this week Schubert's "Rosamunde."

8:06-10 WQXR (96.3) BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Seiji Ozawa conductor. A performance of the glorious Berlioz Requiem, in memory of Charles Munch.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
JAN 24 1971

8:06-10 WQXR Week's Highlight BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHRESTRA William Steinberg conducts the Max Reger Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Mozart and the Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner. When this concert was performed in Philharmonic Hall we acclaimed the Bruckner one of the truly great performances. Not to be missed!

Four Orchestras On Radio

Four leading orchestras will be heard in recorded concerts this week on KNIK-FM radio. The schedule begins on Sunday with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That recorded concert begins at 8 p.m. and features Bach's "Suite No. 4 in D," Piston's "Symphony No. 2" and Ravel's "La Valse." Paul Zukofsky is featured soloist for Schumann's "Violin Concerto."

William Smith conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in a recorded concert heard Monday at 8 p.m. The program opens with Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 in F Major" followed by three chorale-preludes by Brahms and Thomson. The Singing City Choirs, with Elaine Brown directing, will be featured in "Naenie, for Chorus and Orchestra," by Brahms. Beethoven's "Symphony No. 4" concludes the program.

PAUL ZUKOFSKY

Tuesday's 8 p.m. concert features the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. It includes the "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz, the "Overture to 'Oberon'" of Weber, "Clair de Lune" by Debussy and the "Bacchanale" from "Samson and Delilah" of Saint Saens. William Stokking is featured soloist in the "Violoncello Concerto No. 1 in A Minor" of Saint Saens. The concert closes with traditional Pops encores.

The Swingle Singers and William Hebert, playing the piccolo, are featured artists in the Cleveland Orchestra's recorded concert at 8 p.m. Thursday. Conducted by Louis Lane, the orchestra opens with Vivaldi's "Concerto in C Major for Piccolo and String Orchestra." This is followed by Gerio's "Sinfonia." The concert closes with "Sprach Zarathustra," by Strauss.

KNIK-FM Stereo is located at 105.5 mhz on your FM radio dial.

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA
TIMES
31,500
JAN 23 1971

Concerts Scheduled On Radio

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, will be heard Sunday at 8 p.m. in a recorded concert which features Reger's "Variations" and "Fugue on a Theme" by Mozart, as well as the "Symphony No. 7 in E" of Bruckner.

Eugene Ormandy conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in Monday's 8 p.m. recorded concert. The program opens with the first performance in the United States of the "Symphony No. 14" of Shostakovich. The "Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major for Piano and Orchestra" by Brahms follows. Featured soloists include Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Simon Estes, baritone and Alexis Weissenberg, Pianist.

Tuesday at 8 p.m. a recorded concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Erich Kunzel, will be broadcast. The program opens with the "Introduction to Act 3" from "Lohengrin" by Wagner, followed by the "Roman Carnival Overture" by Berlioz. Also included in the concert are the overture to "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky, the overture to "Die Fledermaus" by Strauss and Gershwin's "An American in Paris."

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA
TIMES
31,500
JAN 30 1971

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H
(M&E) 57,003
JAN 30 1971

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performs Friday, Feb. 5 at 9 p. m. in color, with Georg Semkow conducting Mozart's "Abduction From the Seraglio," Scriabin's Symphony No. 41.

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
(E) 9,318
JAN 30 1971

NEWS-LETTER
EXETER, N. H.
WEEKLY 4,900
FEB 4 1971

ARGUS-CHAMPION
NEWPORT, N. H.
WEEKLY 4,103
FEB 4 1971

COURIER
LISBON, N. H.
WEEKLY COMB. 5,586
FEB 4 1971

FOSTER'S
DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
FEB 2 1971

REPUBLICAN JOURNAL BELFAST, ME.
WEEKLY 6,000
JAN 7 1971

SUN
LEWISTON, MAINE
(M) 32,602
JAN 6 1971

BOOTHBAY REGISTER
BOOTHBAY HARBOR, ME.
WEEKLY 3,400
JAN 7 1971

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE
(M) 55,812
JAN 7 1971

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
(E) 9,318
JAN 7 1971

GRANITE STATE
GAZETTE
HANOVER, N. H.
WEEKLY 1,747
JAN 7 1971

OBSERVOR
SALEM, N. H.
WEEKLY 5,500
JAN 6 1971

ARGUS-CHAMPION
NEWPORT, N. H.
WEEKLY 4,103
JAN 7 1971

COURIER
LITTLETON, N. H.
WEEKLY 5,500
JAN 7 1971

FOSTER'S
DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
JAN 7 1971

NEWS
MEREDITH, N. H.
WEEKLY 2,280
JAN 7 1971

ENTERPRISE
BRISTOL, N. H.
WEEKLY 2,000
JAN 14 1971

CITIZEN
LACONIA, N. H.
(E) 6,420
JAN 5 1971

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bach's Wedding Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' "A German Requiem" on Friday, January 8 at 9:00 p.m. in the first of a series of monthly BSO concerts brought to Granite State viewers by the NHN through a grant made by the Frederick Smyth Institute of Music.

Color Concerts On Educational Television

1971 brings with it a new series of monthly concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in color, on the state's four educational television channels. Beginning January 9 at 9:00, once a month, the Maine Educational Broadcasting Network will offer a concert by the Symphony from Boston.

The first program features Erich Leinsdorf conducting a performance of Bach's Wedding Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' "A German Requiem" with Seramae Endich and David Clatworthy as soloists. Then, on February 5th, Georg Semkow conducts Mozart's Symphony No. 41, music from Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio," and Scriabin's Symphony No. 2.

Made possible by a grant from the Maine Commission on the Arts and Humanities, "Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be broadcast over WMEB-TV, Channel 12, Orono, WMEM-TV, Channel 10, Presque Isle, WMED-TV, Channel 13, Calais, and WCBB, Channel 10, Augusta.

Arts Commission Grants To Fund 8 State Programs

AUGUSTA—Ten grants were made in the last quarter of 1970 by the Maine Commission on the Arts and Humanities. They will provide the following cultural programs:

A part-time concert master for the Bangor Symphony and two "runout" concerts by the symphony at the University of Maine in Machias and in Farmington.

Appearance of the University Singers of Orono in choral concerts in Aroostook high schools.

Aid in starting a community art and craft center in Waterville.

A multimedia program for Lewiston - Auburn grades 6-8, and a series of quality films for low income children there.

An exhibition of renderings of restored building facades on Water Street at Hallowell, opening a campaign to persuade building owners to use preservation techniques in developing the street.

A lyric soprano artist-in-residence who will spend a month on University of Maine campuses.

Thirteen Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts on ETV.

A planning grant to assist in the Greater Portland Arts Festival July 9-11 this year.

A total of $11,700 was made available through the commission with the help of the Naaional Endowment for the Arts.

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE
(M) 55,812
JAN 28 1971

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003
MAR 2 1971

The Boston Symphony Orchestra performs Strauss's "Ariadne Auf Naxos," featuring Beverly Sills, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, Friday, March 5 at 9 p.m. in color.

RECORDINGS

Constantine Manos—Magnum

Thomas and Boston Symphony for Deutsche Grammophon: Americanizing

Classical-Record Crisis

The American classical-recording industry is in big trouble. The crisis has been building quietly for nearly a decade, as Mozart and Bach have lost ground steadily to other longhairs like the Beatles and the Stones.

What happened in the '60s was unreal. Pop-record sales ballooned from a healthy annual $250 million in 1960 to a colossal $1 billion-plus in 1969. Meanwhile, serious music was plummeting from 12 per cent of the market in 1960 to a low of less than 5 per cent—and it is falling. Peter Andry of Britain's EMI, the world's largest recording company (whose American classical subsidiary is Angel), predicts that "there will be total collapse of the American classical-recording system within five years unless someone figures out a more economic one."

Falling sales percentages reflect the story of youth turned off by the concert hall's irrelevance, a shrinking number of serious-record stores, a union that has almost priced orchestras out of the market, radio stations dominated by pop releases, a record-buying public that only responds to a few glittering names, a repertory glutted by old war-horses.

Today the cost of recording a new classical record is more than $25,000. This forbidding figure is partly the result of the American Federation of Musicians' symphonic-recording rate, which is now $88 a musician for a three-hour session and will rise to $95 a session Oct. 1. Opera recording, in which the name of the orchestra is not nearly as important as the prima donna's, has long since fled to Europe. In London, recording costs are one-third of what they are in the U.S. Consequently, the London Philharmonic has doubled its recordings since 1960, from 40 to 80 sides, while the London Symphony Orchestra tripled its output during the same period, reaching a whopping total of some 170 sides.

But conditions in the U.S. market have made cutbacks inevitable in the stagnating classical divisions of America's two record giants, RCA and Columbia. RCA's top-of-the-line Red Seal label, with its familiar dog and old-fashioned Victrola, has been reducing its releases, from 111 in 1965 to 70 in 1969. Only about 60 Columbia Masterworks records—close to half Columbia's annual output—contain newly released material. And Masterworks recordings are being cut back. This austerity won't show for a year or two, according to John McClure, director of Masterworks, because of the backlog of tapes left over from Leonard Bernstein's era as conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein recorded at "two or three times the normal release rate." But since he stepped down from the Philharmonic podium, the orchestra's recordings have diminished by a third.

Bomb: Perhaps five Columbia releases break even in their first year. (Of course, unlike short-lived pop, classical recordings enjoy a long life—if the record companies do not grow impatient at the snail's-pace sales.) It takes roughly 40,000 copies to break even. Many important records now sell 4,000 a year where they once would have reached 7,000 or 8,000. In the two years since it was released, RCA's recording of Elliott Carter's brilliant "Concerto for Piano" has not even sold 5,000 copies. "It's a heartbreaker to see a record you really believe in bomb," says John McClure. "From a corporate point of view there are better places to invest than in this marginal, or money-losing, industry. Still, Columbia has been investing $1.5 million to $2 million in classics annually."

This vote of confidence appears to have been defeated. Columbia has quietly terminated its 31-year-old exclusive recording contract with the peerless Cleveland Orchestra. And RCA, after 52 years, has disengaged itself from the venerable Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Magnetism: The Boston Symphony, despite its high level of musicianship, lacked the sine qua non of orchestral salability—a glamorous conductor. A prime example of drawing power is Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic. It is because of Mehta's magnetism (they call him "Zubi baby") that the Los Angeles Philharmonic is under contract to London Records, the American subsidiary of England's Decca, which flies the equipment for an entire recording studio from London to Los Angeles to record its favorite son. Why not? As London Records' classical manager, Terry McEwen, says: "The people who make money in this business can be counted on the fingers of one hand."

One exception to this rule of sales appeal is the Cleveland Orchestra, whose conductor, George Szell, dead last week at the age of 73, had proven star quality. But the Cleveland, in spite of being one of the world's greatest orchestras, suffers from an unjust taint of provincialism. Rocco Laginestra, executive vice president of RCA Records, says: "Szell conducting the New York Philharmonic sells. Szell conducting the Cleveland doesn't."

Burst: Even without the Boston Symphony, RCA has its hands full with the Philadelphia Orchestra, which it signed away from Columbia in a burst of optimism in 1968. The contract reportedly guarantees the orchestra an unheard-of $2 million, spread over five years. Industry insiders have been wagging their heads over the deal ever since, arguing that the huge expense of the Philadelphia deal is hurting RCA Red Seal. In response, Laginestra says, "Any major record company would be delighted to have the Philadelphia Orchestra because it is unquestionably the greatest-selling orchestra on records. After eighteen months we are very pleased and optimistic."

Even though Columbia still has the New York Philharmonic and RCA the Philadelphia, none of the other three (Boston, Chicago, Cleveland) of the "Big Five" American orchestras boasts a contract with an American company. And most other fine symphonies, including those in San Francisco, Houston, St. Louis, Minneapolis and Detroit, make no records at all. Oddly enough, the Utah Symphony, under Maurice Abravanel, has profitably made 55 records for Vanguard Records, including an extensive Mahler repertory. The Utah owes its good fortune to the combination of subsidy from its board and a special dispensation from the musicians' union.

Surprisingly, while the two major American companies have been divesting seventeen May department stores in southern California, says, "Already our Boston Symphony sales are down. Just as there are some people who won't buy a German car, some devoted music lovers won't buy a German record. Old wounds run too deep." DGG will also be sending in members of its stable of conductors, such as Herbert von Karajan and Claudio Abbado, to record with the Boston and give it some sex appeal. In knowledgeable quarters of the industry it is assumed that DGG will even have a say in naming the BSO's next conductor when 71-year-old, ailing William Steinberg steps down.

DGG will also attempt to internationalize the Boston by footing part of the bill for a 1971 European tour, the orchestra's first trip there since 1956. "Our contract with the Boston Symphony," says tall, dark-haired Kurt Kinkele, 48, DGG senior vice president in Hamburg, "is a move that will increase the worldwide standing of DGG." And DGG will be plugging the BSO worldwide through its network of far-flung facilities, including Nippon Grammophon, one of Japan's two leading classical record companies. Japan, which buys $33 million worth of classical records a year, second only to the U.S., seems to prefer German musicians: the most popular conductors there are Karajan, the late Wilhelm Furtwängler, Karl Böhm and Karl Richter.

Newsweek—A.J. Calvo

Packaging Mozart: Getting across to the kids

While the Europeans scurry about, the Americans are convinced the foreigners will never recoup their investment. "They are in for some rude shocks," observes John McClure. "By the time they really get into it, the market will have evaporated. Van Cliburn isn't going to happen again. We've come to the end of an era. The same thing will happen in Europe, later. I'm not crepe-hanging, though. Classical music has a future. It will just be differently done."

The future, according to RCA's Laginestra, "is a question of getting across to the kids." RCA is packaging records in slickly appealing jackets: its "Carmina Burana" design features a woman with an exposed breast. In the wake of the pop hit based on Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" from the Ninth Symphony, London is readying the complete work—but with a crowd shot of the Woodstock festival on the sleeve. DGG, putting on its Americanized face, has sent six miniature records to disk jockeys. Arranged properly, their covers show a nude blonde cradling a bust of Mozart between her thighs.

Apathy: None of these market ploys looks like a real solution to the accelerating plunge in sales of classical records. A&R men, those involved with artists and repertory, ponder the slump with great sadness; but they insist, like Dickens's Mr. Micawber, that "something will turn up." What, they aren't sure.

The basic trouble lies deeper than rising costs or marketing techniques. There exists a primal apathy toward classical music in America—on the part of buyer and seller alike. Since record companies find it easy to sell pop music profitably, why bother with the classics? Why wait years for an investment to pay off? And the companies don't care enough to shore classical divisions up with part of bumper pop profits.

As for the public, what it buys mostly is novel, like music for the Moog synthesizer, or glamorous, like "My Favorite Chopin" by Van Cliburn. Nearly all the classical music most of the music-loving public wants to hear was written before 1900—and has been recorded more than enough. Only so many Beethoven Fifths can be absorbed. In 1970 the public seems to be absorbing less and less of anything classical.

More than a setback for the classical-record business, it is a tragedy for young music and musicians. Says EMI's Andry: "I can see that very soon these orchestras may not be as efficient as they have been. When musicians lose the extra recording money, they may just go off and become shoemakers instead."

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W 1 095 000
AUG 10 1970

MUSIC

George Szell, 1897-1970

In 1937, George Szell became head of he Scottish Orchestra, succeeding John Barbirolli, the new conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Years later Szell became senior guest conductor of the Philharmonic. The years brought glory to both men, and last week both died—Barbirolli at 70, in London from a heart attack; Szell, 73, in Cleveland from complications of cancer and heart disease.

George Szell stood before the world immovable in his musical convictions, in he face of stony words hurled at him: tyrant, autocrat, inhuman, merciless, arrogant. In reality, what lay behind his imperious indifference was the opposite of pride. It was real humility. "Authority," he responded, "is more important than popularity." In the service of music, he accepted calumny without flinching. "I love music more than my own convenience," he once said. "Actually I love it more than myself—but it is vastly more lovable."

Szell's austere, subdued podium style did not call attention to him. He was economical of gesture, but his beat was firm and his left hand suggested the shape of music in the thin air. He was 6 feet tall but he said, "Tall or short, conductors must give unmistakable signals to the orchestra, not choreography to the audience." For Szell the best contact with the orchestra was through the eyes, and any musician who had that glittering eye fixed on him never forgot.

If Szell was less than lovable, respect was a by-product of uncompromising musicianship. He attacked the music on all levels, leaving nothing to chance, scrutinizing the scores with an eye for detail worthy of an Internal Revenue man.

Heart: To many, Szell's meticulous style inhibited expansiveness. Aware of that himself, he was wary of overlooking the forest for the trees. "It's getting too overphrased," was his frequent comment in rehearsals. In his performances there were no accidents, no musicial ups and downs. He planned every note, every interval, every balance. As pianist Gary Graffman said last week, "He even rehearsed the inspiration."

On the podium, he was human enough. Unreasonably annoyed by a young soloist's long hair, Szell cried, "I know, you're protesting. You protest by looking like a mattress. I understand your need to protest: it's a sorry world. But what kind of protest is long hair? I protest all the time, in my heart." And he could have added, with his music.

Once Glenn Gould held up a Cleveland rehearsal interminably while he fidgeted with his piano stool, unable to reach just the right height. "Mr. Gould," said Szell, "perhaps if we sliced an inch off your backside, we could begin." Szell refused thereafter to conduct for Gould. But he saw to it that Gould was invited back to play with the Cleveland. Szell, attending one Gould concert, remarked, "There's no question but that nut's a genius."

Burk Uzzle—Magnum

Szell: 'He even rehearsed the inspiration'

Once, because of a bitter clash with New York Philharmonic musicians, years passed before Szell returned to that podium. At the first rehearsal of the all-Beethoven program, everyone expected fireworks. Szell raised his baton, started the rehearsal, never spoke or stopped until the end—and walked off the stage.

Szell had been a child piano prodigy in Vienna where his family had moved from Budapest after his birth. At 17 he became Richard Strauss's protégé. "I always wanted to be a conductor," Szell once said. "The piano didn't satisfy me as an instrument." Only an orchestra would, and after years of seasoning Szell accepted the musical directorship of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1946. He built his own orchestra. He built the best.

Of its 94 members, twelve were fired and ten quit in the first season—under fire. Szell raised the number to 106, including 35 survivors of the original group. "We begin to rehearse," said Szell, "when other orchestras are finished." He has infused unparalleled American technical excellence with a warm Middle European combustibility. It is precise, it is flexible, it has power to spare and disk brakes. It has no characteristic sound, wants none, needs none. It is protean, transforming itself easily into an instrument equally useful for the singularity of Bach or Beethoven, or Debussy or Stravinsky. Says Pierre Boulez, "Of all the orchestras I guest-conduct, I prefer the Cleveland. It is the most flexible."

The poet Yeats wrote: "Whatever flames upon the night/Man's own resinous heart has fed." In mankind's battle to hold back the night George Szell contributed his whole heart.

—HUBERT SAAL

Ray Green—Camera Press

Barbirolli: English enough

John Barbirolli, 1899-1970

A less courageous man than John Barbirolli might have folded under the criticism during his seven years as conductor of the New York Philharmonic, suceeding Arturo Toscanini in 1937. But Barbirolli stayed to win respect and then returned to England in 1943 to take over Manchester's war-depleted Hallé Orchestra, reduced to 23 musicians. Barbirolli even seduced a lady trombonist away from the Salvation Army in his restoration of the orchestra to 70 strong and a reputation as good as any. Not until 1968 did he change his Hallé title as conductor in chief to laureate conductor for life.

Small, vital, Barbirolli was a lyric and energetic musician. He inherited his style from his Italian father and grandfather violinists who had both played at the first performance of Verdi's "Otello" in 1887. Even so, and even though he had been baptized Giovanni Battista, Barbirolli was thoroughly English, born over a bakery shop in London. He was English enough to be knighted in 1949 by King George VI and English enough to say last week on the day before he died, "I must go on until I drop. There is no other way for me."

—H.

themselves of their orchestral fiefs, thr European-based international giants ha rushed in to claim them. Germany Deutsche Grammophon Gesellscha (DGG) recently signed an exclusive co tract with the Boston Symphony Orche tra that matches the BSO's old RCA co tract, which guaranteed it a minimum five LP's a year—minuscule compare with the London orchestras' output.

BSO general manager Thomas Per indicated that BSO's recording chan was primarily a matter of getting off sinking RCA ship. RCA's Laginestra say "I don't buy the premise that in fi years we won't be there. We've alwa been in the classical business and it's business we'll be in as long as we're business."

Vacuum: Two English companies ha also laid claim to their part of the Ame can orchestral market. EMI's America subsidiary, Angel, and Decca's Lond are both recording the Chicago Symph ny, and Angel is recording the Clevela Orchestra, a relationship recently hig lighted by a performance of the Brahm Double Concerto with David Oistrak and Mstislav Rostropovich.

Just how can foreign companies pa the crippling costs of recording in Ame ica and still expect to make money, at time when RCA and Columbia are pu ing in their horns? EMI's Peter And explains that his firm was racking its co porate brains to find ways to make i biggest market—America—even bigge The vacuum being left by Columbia an RCA gave it a chance to move in. "W want to top up our product," says En lishman Andry, a leading record pr ducer, who calls American orchestra "the most efficient, the best music-makin machines going." Andry expects to tap enough repertory in America in five yea to give Angel's catalogue an America tone for many years beyond that.

London Records' Terry McEwen say "We did it for our conductors who can to the U.S., Solti to Chicago and Meh to Los Angeles. Besides that, as a Eur pean company, we have other adva tages. The only people who have fai in classical music today seem to be th European companies. We believe classical music and we have the stab European markets to support it."

Image: Of the three European com panies, Deutsche Grammophon has mad the most thoroughgoing commitment an American orchestra. Jerry Schoe baum, president of Polydor, the firm American branch, intends to use the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra as part of h campaign to give DGG, owned by Si mens, the German electrical firm, a ne image as "an American company" and t to overcome anti-German prejudice. U der its new aegis one of the orchestra first releases will be works by two Ame cans—Charles Ives and Carl Ruggles conducted by 26-year-old Michael Ti son Thomas, whose grandparents helpe found the Yiddish theater in New York.

Jeanne Hansen, record buyer for th

August 10, 1970

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

AUG 10 1970

Burk Uzzle—Magnum

Szell: 'He even rehearsed the inspiration'

no question but that nut's a genius."

Once, because of a bitter clash with New York Philharmonic musicians, years passed before Szell returned to that podium. At the first rehearsal of the all-Beethoven program, everyone expected fireworks. Szell raised his baton, started the rehearsal, never spoke or stopped until the end—and walked off the stage.

Szell had been a child piano prodigy in Vienna where his family had moved from Budapest after his birth. At 17 he became Richard Strauss's protégé. "I always wanted to be a conductor," Szell once said. "The piano didn't satisfy me as an instrument." Only an orchestra would, and after years of seasoning Szell accepted the musical directorship of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1946. He built his own orchestra. He built the best.

